[3] Upon the question of the prior incumbrance it may be said that in decreeing the specific performance of the contract the court expressly excepted the right of way previously conveyed the lumber company for its railroad. Moreover, the testimony shows that appellee knew of this easement, and it will therefore be presumed that he proposed to purchase subject to it. Appellee did not prepare the deed, but sent to appellant a blank to be used, and appellant had both the right and the opportunity to prepare and return to appellee a deed specifically exempting this easement if he thought it essential so to do.

[4] It is true, of course, that appellant could not have been required to close the deal through the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank at Gurdon; he not having agreed to do so. But appellee did not impose this as a condition. The letter of July 5th must be treated as a suggestion whereby the deal could be closed without delay, and, as the appellant did not ask that the deal be closed in some other manner, he is no position to say that appellee imposed a condition which was not satisfactory.

[5] So, too, in regard to the tender. Appellant did not exact cash, but the reference to cash must be treated as referring to the time of payment rather than to the manner of payment, as in ordinary transactions a check or draft is regarded as the equivalent of money. Appellant would have been within his legal rights in demanding money, but common fairness demanded that after his offer had been accepted he give appellee a chance to pay in money if that condition was to be imposed. We think a binding contract was made when appellee, by his letter of July 5th, accepted appellant's proposition, contained in the letter of June 28th, and that the statement about sending the draft to the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank was not an additional and unagreed upon condition, but was a mere suggestion to expedite the consummation of a contract which the letter itself closed by accepting unconditionally appellant's offer to sell.

We conclude, therefore, that the court correctly decreed the specific performance of the contract, and that decree is affirmed.

ANDERSON-TULLY CO. v. GILLETT LUMBER CO. (No. 279.)

1. Specific performance §116½ — Bill not rendered demurrable by exhibits.

In a suit for specific performance, a complaint alleging a contract by defendant for the sale of standing timber was not rendered demurrable by letters and telegrams constituting the alleged contract and filed as exhibits in response to defendant's motion, though they showed a contract with B. without showing who he was or what authority he had to bind defendant.

2. Specific performance §64—Conveyance of standing timber is conveyance of "interest in land."

As respects specific performance, a contract to convey standing timber is a contract to convey an "interest in the land" itself, notwithstanding Acts 1905, p. 361, making timber in certain cases personal property for the purposes of taxation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interest.]

3. Specific performance §116½—Complaint alleging insolvency and inadequacy of remedy is good.

In a suit for specific performance, a complaint alleging defendant's insolvency and a consequent inadequacy of remedy is good as against demurrer.

4. Specific performance §65 — Contract to convey standing timber may be enforced.

Specific performance of a contract to convey standing timber may be granted.

5. Specific performance §29(1)—Contract to convey merchantable timber may be enforced if proof shows definiteness.

A contract for the conveyance of merchantable timber on described land may be specifically enforced if the proof shows the term "merchantable timber" to be one of such definite signification as to be a sufficient designation of the timber sold.

Appeal from Arkansas Chancery Court; John M. Elliott, Chancellor.

Suit by the Anderson-Tully Company against the Gillett Lumber Company. From a decree for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

T. J. Moher, of Gillett, and John L. Ingram, of Stuttgart, for appellant.

W. N. Carpenter, of De Witt, for appellee.

SMITH, J. Appellant, hereafter referred to as plaintiff, filed a complaint against appellee, hereafter referred to as defendant, containing the following allegations: That both plaintiff and defendant are corporations. That on or about August 13, 1919, defendant was the owner of Spanish grants 2358 and 2406, in Arkansas county, Ark., and that on or about that date defendant, by letters and telegrams, sold plaintiff all the merchantable timber standing on said lands, except the pecan and hackberry, for the price and sum of $6,000. That defendant had refused to perform said contract, and was attempting to sell the timber to other parties, and would do so unless restrained. That plaintiff "had purchased this particular tract of timber for its kind, character, and quality of timber thereon, for a particular use and purpose, and that they cannot obtain any other of like kind, character, and quality that will suit and fulfill the purposes for which they purchased this particular tract." Plaintiff alleges its willingness and readiness to purchase the timber, and tenders into court $6,000 for that purpose.

The insolvency of the defendant was alleged, and there was a prayer for a temporary restraining order to prevent defendant from selling the timber, and for a decree for the specific performance of the contract to sell.

A motion was filed by defendant to require plaintiff to file the letters and telegrams constituting the contract, and in response to this motion plaintiff filed the letters and telegrams passing between plaintiff, Anderson-Tully Company, and one Cal Balmer, which make a complete and valid contract, except that it does not appear from this correspondence who Cal Balmer was, nor what authority, if any, he had to act for the defendant.

[1] The point is made that this is a case in equity, and that the exhibits above referred to are the foundation of the action and will control the averments of the complaint, and that these exhibits show no authority for Balmer to act for defendant, and that therefore defendant is not bound.

It is also insisted that under Act No. 146, Acts 1905, p. 361, timber which has been sold apart from the land on which it stands becomes personalty, and that specific performance should be denied on that account.

It is true the exhibits to the complaint do not disclose who Balmer is, nor what authority he had to act for and bind the defendant. But that is a matter of proof. The complaint alleges a valid contract for the sale of the timber, and the exhibits do not conflict with that allegation. When the case has been developed, these exhibits may or may not prove sufficient to bind the defendant. That will depend on Balmer's authority to act for it. But the exhibits do not, on their face, show Balmer to have been without authority, and we must therefore, in testing the sufficiency of the complaint on demurrer, say that, by intendment, the contrary is alleged.

portance here. The title to the act is "An act to make timber in certain cases in this state personal property for the purposes of taxation." In a number of cases prior to the passage of this act, we recognized timber as a part of the realty and held that a conveyance of it as such conveyed an interest in the land itself; and we think there was no legislative intent to overturn those decisions. And in a number of cases since that act we have reiterated the doctrine that a conveyance of the timber on a certain tract of land is a conveyance of an interest in the land itself, and that the timber is real estate until it is severed from the soil. Griffith v. Ayer-Lord Tie Co., 109 Ark. 223, 159 S. W. 218; Graysonia-Nashville Lbr. Co. v. Saline Development Co., 118 Ark. 192, 176 S. W. 129, and cases there cited. The act is intended to make timber sold separately and apart from the land on which it stands personalty for the purposes of taxation, so that the land and the timber may be separately assessed and the owner of the land be not required to pay the taxes on the timber, which would otherwise be charged to him as a part of the land.

[3] The demurrer should not have been sustained because there is an allegation of insolvency and a consequent inadequacy of remedy, and it may be that testimony can be adduced showing a special and peculiar value in the timber which gives it a value to the plaintiff which a judgment for damages could not adequately compensate. But we do not decide the point, as it is not especially insisted upon in the briefs and is evidently not the question which will be decisive of the case when the cause is tried out on its merits, upon the remand of the cause for that purpose.

[4] The point to which counsel have chiefly directed attention, and the difficult question in the case, is whether specific performance will lie to compel a conveyance of timber. It appears from the exhibits that the parties contemplated a deed from defendant to plaintiff. This deed would have evidenced, not only the timber conveyed, but that reserved, and would likewise have evidenced the time given for the removal of the timber, which was five years.

In the article on Specific Performance in 25 R. C. L. p. 238, it is said that—

"In similar manner an option to sell standing timber, after being unconditionally accepted by the vendee, may be specifically enforced against the vendor."

In support of that text the case of Bryant Timber Co. v. Wilson, 151 N. C. 154, 65 S. E. 932, 134 Am. St. Rep. 982, is cited. The contract there ordered specifically performed is not essentially different from the one here under review, and in that case the Supreme Court of North Carolina said:

"The contract is definite and certain as to its subject-matter, its stipulations, its purposes, its parties, and the circumstances under which it was made. Its meaning is plain and its various provisions carefully and clearly stated. There is a valuable consideration. The agreement is mutual. Specific performance is not only entirely practicable, but is necessary in order to give the plaintiff the full benefit of the contract, and there is nothing inequitable in its enforcement. In short, the contract has every requisite which is usually regarded as necessary to authorize a court of equity to compel specific performance. Pomeroy, Eq. Jurisprudence, §§ 1400, 1505. Then, again, the contract does not deal with personal property. It plainly savors of the realty. Growing trees are often, especially in the older cases, regarded as a part of the land, and the sale thereof as a sale of an interest in land. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 537, and cases cited. In this state growing trees have ever been regarded as part of the realty, and deeds and contracts concerning them are governed by the laws applicable to land. [Cases cited.]"

In the case of Omaha Lbr. Co. v. Co-operative Inv. Co., 55 Colo. 271, 133 Pac. 1112, a contract for the sale of timber provided that the title to the timber was to remain in the grantor until removed, and it was therefore contended that this was a contract for the sale of chattels, and not for an interest in real estate, and that, for that reason, it could not be specifically enforced. The Supreme Court of Colorado said this contention could not be sustained, and in the opinion in that case it was said:

"It seems to be quite well settled that a contract for the sale of timber such as we are now considering may be specifically enforced. The English rule was stated to be: 'Thus a contract for a sale of timber can be specifically executed, although the timber is to be cut down at a future time or at intervals, and the money to be paid by installments. It is a certain contract, and the manner of dealing with the thing sold, by future cuttings, is no objection to a specific performance. The one man sells the timber, and the other pays for it the price contracted for. Here part of this contract is at once capable of a specific execution. This admits of no doubt.' Gervais v. Edwards, 2 Drury & Warren, 83."

See, also, other cases there cited, and Gilfillan v. Gilfillan, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 734, 739; Davis v. Martin Stave Co., 113 Ark. 331, 168 S. W. 553.

[5] It is finally insisted that the contract was not sufficiently definite to support this action, for the reason that it does not define the term "merchantable timber." In reply, it may be said that the proof may show this to be a term of such definite signification as to be a sufficient designation of the timber sold without explanatory words accompanying it in the contract. Liston v. Chapman & Dewey Land Co., 77 Ark. 120, 91 S. W. 27.

The decree of the court below is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

HOME PROTECTIVE ASS'N v. MORSE.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. March 29, 1920.)

1. Insurance §815(3)—Reply to answer not counterclaim or set-off not necessary.

In an action against a fraternal insurance order on a life policy, it was not necessary to file a reply to put in issue allegations in the answer alleging that the constitution and by-laws of the fraternal order expressly provided that no person over 60 years of age was eligible for membership and that the application provided that an answer to the query therein as to age of the applicant was a warranty, in view of Kirby's Dig. § 6108.

2. Insurance §817(2)—Insurance order must introduce constitution, by-laws, and application containing provisions relied on as defense.

In an action against a fraternal insurance order on a life policy, it was incumbent upon the defendant to introduce in evidence the constitution, by-laws, and applications containing provisions to the effect that persons over 60 years of age were ineligible for membership and that answers to queries in application as to age constituted warranties, relied upon as a defense.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Crawford County; James Cochran, Judge.

Suit by Cassie Morse against the Home Protective Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John Mayes, of Fayetteville, for appellant.
E. D. Chastain, of Van Buren, for appellee.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellee instituted suit against appellant, a fraternal insurance order, in the Crawford circuit court, to recover $637.50, a 12 per cent. penalty, and an attorney's fee, on a certificate of insurance No. 662, roll No. 2 on the life of her husband, in which she was named as beneficiary. It was alleged in the complaint that, during the life of the policy, her husband, the insured, died, and that, although all requirements of the policy had been complied with and proof of death made, appellant had failed to pay the amount due her on the policy.

Appellant answered, admitting the execution of the policy, the payment by the insured of all assessments thereon, the death and proof of death of the insured, and the demand for and refusal of payment of the amount claimed under the terms of the policy; but interposed, as defenses to the claim, first, fraud of the insured in the procurement of the policy by representing his age to be 58 when in fact he was 68 years old, and, second, the warranty of the insured in his application for insurance that he was not over 60 years old, and eligible for membership under the constitution and by-laws of the association which prohibited persons over that age from joining the order.

The cause was submitted to a jury upon the pleadings, evidence, and instructions of the court, which resulted in a verdict and judgment against appellee for $637.50. From that judgment, an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court.

[1, 2.] Appellant insists that the court submitted the case upon the sole issue of whether or not the policy was obtained by the insured through a misrepresentation of his age and committed reversible error in withdrawing the other issue—that of warranty of age—from the consideration of the jury. It was alleged as a matter of defense in the answer that the constitution and by-laws of the fraternal order expressly provided that no person over 60 years of age was eligible for membership therein, and that the application signed by the insured to obtain the certificate of insurance, made the basis of this action, provided that the answer to the query therein as to the age of the applicant was a warranty. The evidence abstracted revealed that the insured was more than 60 years of age at the time he applied for the certificate of insurance. The constitution and by-laws of the order and the application for insurance, signed by the insured, were not introduced in evidence and do not appear in the abstract of the bill of exceptions. Learned counsel for appellant asserts that appellee admits that a party over 60 years of age is not eligible to membership in said insurance company, and that the statements as to the application were made warranties by the contract. We find no such admission in the record. We presume the admission grows out of the inference that it was necessary for appellee to file a reply denying these allegations in the answer. It was not necessary to file a reply to the answer in order to put the allegations thereof in issue. A reply is only necessary under our Code where the allegations in the answer are in the nature of a counterclaim or set-off. Kirby's Digest, § 6108. In addition to tendering the issue in the answer, appellant should have and it was incumbent upon him to introduce in evidence the constitution, by-laws, and application containing the provisions relied upon as a defense. Not having done so, there was no evidence upon which to send the issue to the jury as to whether the answer to the query as to the age constituted a warranty. This court said, in the case of National Annuity Association v. McCall, 103 Ark. 201

"Where an insurance company, being sued on a policy of insurance, relied on the falsity of certain answers in the application for insurance, the burden is upon it to prove the execution of the application by the insured, and that he had made the answers as alleged, as well as their falsity."

No error appearing, the judgment is affirmed.

MITCHELL v. SCHULTE. (No. 221.)

1. Mechanics' liens §132(1) — Void unless filed within ninety days.

A materialman's lien not filed within 90 days from the time the last item of material was furnished is void.

2. Contracts §71(3)—Promise to pay doubtful obligation in consideration of forbearance binding.

If a doubtful or void claim is in good faith believed to be well founded, a forbearance to prosecute until a certain time is a sufficient consideration to support an agreement to pay it.

3. Contracts §193—Letter not promise to pay void mechanic's lien.

A letter, "I write you in regard to lien filed by L., formerly known as B. L. Company, on my house for unpaid lumber bill. Please do not file suit but give me more time, say until December 1, 1917, and I will pay same," was a promise only to pay the lien and not to pay any debt which the contractors owed the materialman, and, the lien being void, the writer was not liable for any amount by reason of such promise.

McCulloch, C. J., and Smith, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Sebastian Chancery Court; J. V. Bourland, Chancellor.

Suit by L. D. Mitchell against Ella Schulte and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff for part of the relief demanded, the plaintiff appeals, and the named defendant prosecutes a cross-appeal. Affirmed on direct appeal, and reversed and remanded on cross-appeal, with instructions.

Dally & Woods, of Ft. Smith, for appellant.
T. P. Winchester, of Ft. Smith, for appellee.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellant instituted suit in the chancery court of Sebastian county, Ft. Smith district, against appellee, the owner of a lot in Ft. Smith, and Foster & Paget, contractors, to recover a balance of $268.26 and to enforce a materialman's lien against the lot, on account of material alleged to have been sold to, and used by, the contractors in the construction of a dwelling thereon.

The material averments in the complaint were that appellee owned the lot; that appellant's predecessor in business, H. B. Boyer, sold Foster & Paget, contractors, the material for the construction of a dwelling thereon; that they owed a balance of $268.26 on the account; that he gave the required notice to appellee and filed a materialman's lien against the property within the time fixed by law; that appellee agreed in writing to pay the amount of the lien in consideration of an extension of time for the enforcement of the lien by suit. The prayer was for a personal judgment against the contractors and appellant, the declaration of a lien against the property, and an order of sale to satisfy same.

Appellee filed an answer, denying each material allegation in the complaint, and, in addition, alleged, in substance, that she had paid the contractors the contract price for the dwelling erected by them on said lot in the spring of 1917, except $137 which she paid to appellant after the lien was filed; that the lien was filed more than 90 days after the last item of material was furnished for the construction of the dwelling; that the written promise only bound her to pay any valid and enforceable lien against her property; that the amount for which the lien was claimed had been paid to appellant and improperly credited by him to the Traylor job, for whom the contractors were building a house at the same time they were constructing her dwelling.

The cause was submitted to the chancellor upon the pleadings, the statutory notice to appellee, and the lien filed on October 22, 1917, pursuant thereto, the assignment of the lien by H. B. Boyer to appellant, the letter of date October 24, 1917, written by appellee to appellant's attorney, the attorney's reply thereto, and the evidence, which resulted in a decree in favor of appellant against O. B. Foster for $268.26, against appellee for $67.56, and a denial of the lien.

From the refusal of the court to adjudge the full amount of the claim against appellee and to fix and enforce a lien therefor against the property, appellant has prosecuted an appeal; and, from the decree against appellee for $67.56, appellee has prosecuted a cross-appeal and the cause is before this court for trial de novo.

[1] Appellant's predecessor in business, H. B. Boyer, furnished O. B. Foster and his partner, Paget, the material used by them in constructing the residence for appellee on the lot in question. Appellee paid Foster the contract price, except $137 retained by her to force the contractors to finish the house, which they never did. During the construction of the residence, the contractors were also building a house for ——— Traylor. According to a preponderance of the evidence, a payment of $200 by O. B. Foster on appellee's job was improperly credited to Traylor's job, and an item for screen material, of date July 26, 1917, was improperly charged against appellee's job. These findings of fact, after a careful consideration of the evidence, dispose of appellant's contention that the findings by the chancellor in these particulars were contrary to the preponderance of the evidence. After notice to appellee of appellant's intention to file a lien, she paid appellant the amount of $137 withheld by her to force a completion of the house. This payment, together with a deduction of $200 item paid by Boyer on appellee's job and improperly credited to the Traylor job, and the item of $1.40 for screening improperly charged against appellee's job, reduced appellant's claim against appellee to $67.56, which formed the basis for the judgment rendered against her by the chancellor, from which she has prosecuted a cross-appeal. Eliminating the item improperly charged for screening, the last item of material furnished to the contractors by appellant for the construction of appellee's house was furnished July 10, 1917. The lien was filed October 22, 1917, more than 90 days after the last item was furnished and, in consequence of the failure to file it within the statutory period, was a void lien. This finding of fact also disposes of appellant's contention that the chancellor's finding that no lien existed against the property was contrary to the weight of the evidence.

[2, 3] Appellant contends that notwithstanding the invalidity of the lien appellee is bound to pay the debt in consideration of a forbearance by appellant to institute proceedings immediately to enforce the claim. It is suggested that if the claim be regarded as doubtful, or void and in good faith believed to be well founded, a forbearance to prosecute it until December 1, 1917, was a sufficient consideration to support an agreement to pay it. A number of decisions are cited in support of that doctrine. Matthews v. Morris, 31 Ark. 222; Lay v. Brown, 106 Ark. 1, 151 S. W. 1001; Brinkley Car Works & Mfg. Co. v. Cook, 110 Ark. 325, 161 S. W. 1005. While the rule thus announced is sound, it does not reach the real point for determination in this case. The real point involved here is whether by the writing appellee bound herself to pay appellant's claim. This must be determined by a proper interpretation of the letter written by appellee to appellant's attorney and his reply thereto. The letters are as follows:

"Mr. Harry E. Daily, City—Dear Sir: I write you in regard to lien filed by L. D. Mitchell, formerly known as Boyer Lumber Company, on my house, 2308 Tilles avenue, for unpaid lumber bill. Please do not file suit but give me more time, say until December 1, 1917, and I will pay same.

"Yours truly, Ella Schulte,
"2308 Tilles Ave."

"Miss Ella Schulte, 2308 Tilles Avenue, Ft. Smith, Arkansas—Dear Miss Schulte: We are in receipt of your letter of the 24th inst. with respect to the L. D. Mitchell lien, in which you agree to pay same on December 1, 1917, and in reply thereto beg to state that this meets with the approval of our clients, and no action will be taken by us before that time.

"Very truly yours, Kimpel & Daily."

Appellant's contention is that the writing is broad enough to obligate appellee to pay the entire claim or indebtedness. We do not think the contention sound. The language of the letter written by appellee to appellant's attorney indicates appellee's intention to liquidate a valid and subsisting lien against her property, if given time. The promise was to pay the lien, not to pay any debt which the contractors owed appellant for material furnished for the construction of the house. That it was the lien to which appellee was addressing herself is more clearly evidenced by the reply of the attorney, which, in part, is as follows:

"We are in receipt of your letter of the 24th inst. with respect to the L. D. Mitchell lien, in which you agree to pay same on December 1, 1917."

We are unable to construe the language of the letter into an obligation to pay a void lien which did not imperil her property or to pay the debt of another which did not hazard her property. Under this interpretation of her obligation, it was improper to render the personal judgment against her for $67.56.

The decree on the direct appeal is therefore affirmed, but reversed and remanded on the cross-appeal, with instructions to dismiss the bill against appellee for the want of equity.

McCULLOCH, C. J. (dissenting). The decision of the majority totally disregards the contract between the parties as evidenced by the two letters set forth in the opinion. They say that the correspondence refers to the lien, but not to the payment of the debt, and refers to a lien filed in apt time, not to one which, for any reason, is invalid. In this view of the matter the contract had no binding force whatever; for, if the lien was valid, it needed no new promise to make it effective, and if the promise did not amount to an obligation to pay the debt for which the lien was asserted, it did not rise to the dignity of a contract at all.

There was a conflict in the testimony as to the payments on the account of appellant, as well as to the time of completion of appellee's house by Foster, the contractor; but it may be conceded that the finding of the chancellor on these disputed questions of fact were not against the preponderance of the evidence. There is, however, no dispute as to the correspondence between appellant and appellee, nor as to the circumstances under which it arose. Appellant had, after giving notice to appellee, filed a lien in accordance with the statute (Kirby's Digest, § 4981), which provides that persons asserting such liens must file—

"with the clerk of the circuit court of the county in which the building, erection or other improvement to be charged with the lien is situated, and within ninety days after the things aforesaid shall have been furnished or the work or labor done or performed, a just and true account of the demand due or owing to him, after allowing all credits, and containing a correct description of the property to be charged with said lien, verified by affidavit."

It is well settled by numerous decisions of this court that forbearance to institute legal proceedings for a time on an asserted claim, or to refrain therefrom altogether, is sufficient consideration to support a new obligation, and that the agreement for compromise of a disputed claim, even one which is in fact without merit, also constitutes a sufficient consideration for a new promise. Those principles are distinctly recognized in the opinion of the majority and authorities are cited in support of them. Other cases not mentioned in the opinion may be cited. Buckner v. McIlroy, 31 Ark. 631; Willingham v. Jordan, 75 Ark. 268, 87 S. W. 424; Fender v. Helterbrandt, 101 Ark. 335, 142 S. W. 184; Nothwang v. Harrison, 126 Ark. 552, 191 S. W. 2; Jonesboro Hardware Co. v. Western Tie & Timber Co., 134 Ark. 543, 204 S. W. 418; Simonson v. Patterson, 213 S. W. 23; First National Bank v. Allen, 216 S. W. 1039.

But the majority hold that these authorities have no application, for the reason that, under proper interpretation of the correspondence, appellee did not promise to pay the debt, nor to discharge any lien, except a valid one filed in apt time. This is a narrow view to take of the language of the letters. The lien had been filed, stating the amount of the debt claimed, and notice thereof to appellee had been given. The letter referred to the filing of the lien "for unpaid lumber bill," and promised, in consideration of forbearance, to "pay same." Pay what? The debt for which the lien was asserted. There was nothing else to pay, and that is what the letter meant, if any meaning at all is to be attributed to it. And, even if the lien was filed too late, the promise to discharge it in consideration of forbearance for a time to sue constituted a waiver of the failure to file within the time prescribed by statute, or at least an agreement not to plead it.

BLACKFORD et al. v. GIBSON et al. (No. 10.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 24, 1920.)

1. Exceptions, bill of \S 56(1)—Bill must be presented to chancellor for approval.

It was duty of parties to suit in equity to present their bill of exceptions to the chancellor for his approval, or to have had the testimony brought into the record by some of the familiar methods to bring testimony before the Supreme Court; mere certificate of a stenographer that testimony which he had transcribed contained all the oral evidence introduced in the suit, which, as recited by the bill of exceptions, was heard on the complaint, affidavits, demurrer, and answer of defendants, and oral evidence, being insufficient.

2. Appeal and error \S 907(4)—Presumption that missing evidence sustained decree.

In the absence of oral evidence heard by the chancellor, the presumption on appeal is that the missing evidence sustains his decree.

3. Highways \S 90—Road district void for insufficiency of description.

Ozark Trail road district No. 2, sought to be created by Acts 1920, No. 104, held void for insufficiency of the description of the road, section 3, describing the proposed road according to government survey, being totally at variance with the description according to courses and distances.

Appeal from Craighead Chancery Court; E. L. Westbrook, Special Chancellor.

Suit by B. G. Gibson and others against John Blackford and others. From decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Appellees brought this suit in equity against appellants to enjoin them from proceeding further in the construction of a road under Act No. 104 of the General Assembly of the state of Arkansas, approved February 7, 1920, entitled An act to create the Ozark Trail road improvement district No. 2.

The court granted the prayer of the plaintiffs, and enjoined the commissioners from taking any further steps tending to carry out the provisions of said act, and from incurring any obligations as commissioners of the district, or from attempting to fix any charge upon the land of the district either by assessment, levy, or for preliminary expenses. The case is here on appeal.

Rose, Hemingway, Cantrell & Loughborough, of Little Rock, and T. A. Turner, of Jonesboro, for appellants.

Lamb & Frierson, of Jonesboro, for appellees.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] It is first insisted that the decree must be affirmed because there is no bill of exceptions in the record. The bill recites that the case was heard before the chancellor upon the complaint, the affidavits of certain designated persons, the demurrer and answer of the defendants, and the oral evidence of certain persons named in the decree. There is no bill of exceptions contained in the record.

It is true there is a certificate of a stenographer that certain testimony which he has transcribed contains all the oral evidence introduced in the cause, but there is nothing to indicate that the parties agreed that the oral testimony should be reduced to writing and filed as evidence in the case, or that the court ordered it so filed. The certificate of the stenographer that his transcribed notes contained all the oral testimony that was introduced in the cause avails nothing. It was the duty of the parties to present their bill of exceptions to the chancellor for his approval, or to have had the testimony brought into the record by some of the familiar methods of bringing such testimony before this court. While chancery causes are heard de novo in this court, they are tried upon the same record as was made in the chancery court. The presumption in cases like this is that the missing evidence sustains the decree of the chancellor. We must assume that every question of fact essential under the pleadings to sustain the decree is established by the oral testimony which is not properly brought into the record. State, Use, etc., v. Leatherwood, 127 Ark. 274, 192 S. W. 218, and cases cited. Neither was section 19 of the Practice Act of 1915 complied with. Acts of 1915, p. 1081.

[3] Again it is insisted that the decree should be upheld because the road described in the act creating the district is not an established public road and a part of it lies without the proposed district. On the other hand, counsel for the defendants base their right to a reversal of the decree on the ground that the Legislature committed a clerical error in describing the road. Counsel concede that, when tested by the description of the road according to the government survey, the district is void, but they claim that the road is sufficiently described by known monuments, and that these should control over the government survey. It is contended that the testimony omitted from the record would have shown that the description according to the government survey would have fitted another public road, as well as the one in question, and that it would have also shown that there were no known monuments that would have established the road attempted to be improved. Section 3 of the act contains the description of the road. It is very lengthy, and need not be set out herein. According to the description as there set out, the district is void. It is the duty of courts to ascertain the meaning of an act from the language used by the Legislature. The description of the proposed road according to the government survey is totally at variance with that according to the courses and distances described in the act. There is nothing to indicate which one the Legislature intended to adopt, and the chancery court was correct in holding that the act was void because of the legislative mistake in describing the road to be improved. Jones v. Lawson, 220 S. W. 311.

It follows that the decree will be affirmed.

ANCIENT ORDER OF UNITED WORKMEN et al. v. PARAGOULD SPECIAL SCHOOL DIST. NO. 1 et al. (No. 356.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 26, 1920.
On Rehearing, May 24, 1920.)

1. Schools and school districts §154—Act allowing transfer of children to another district applies to transfer to or from a single school district.

Kirby's Dig. §§ 7639, 7640, providing for transfer of children of any person residing in a particular school district to an adjoining school district, and that when such transfer is ordered the school tax of such person shall be added to the revenues of the district to which he has been transferred, applies to the transfer of children for educational purposes to or from a single school district.

2. Schools and school districts §110—Complaint insufficient to show complainant district entitled to school taxes of enumerated persons.

A complaint by a school district and a creditor thereof, alleging that taxes collected from the lands owned by three residents of the district had been by the county officers credited to another school district, and praying decree restraining the crediting of such taxes to the other district, is not, in view of Kirby's Dig. §§ 7639, 7640, allowing the transfer of persons from one school district to another, and providing that the school tax of such person shall be added to the revenues of the district to which he has been transferred, sufficient to state cause of action at least for an injunction, not showing that the enumerated residents had not been transferred.

3. Schools and school districts §110—Creditor of school district cannot object to transfer of residents to another district without any showing of injury.

A creditor of a school district cannot object to the transfer of residents to another district and the crediting of their revenues to the second district, where there is no showing that such transfer will diminish the revenues of the district to the extent that they will be insufficient to pay the debt.

On Rehearing.

4. Schools and school districts §110—Complaint seeking to restrain crediting of taxes to another district defective in failing to show complainant's right to taxes.

A complaint seeking to enjoin county officers from crediting taxes from lands of residents of the complainant district to another school district is defective, in failing to allege that complainant was entitled to such taxes, and such defect can be reached by demurrer.

5. Constitutional law §143—Transfers from one district to another do not impair obligation of contract because of debt of district.

The power of the Legislature to transfer children of a resident of one school district to another, and to provide for the transfer of the taxes, is plenary, and cannot be questioned on the ground that it would work an impairment of the obligation of a contract, merely because the district from which the transfer was made was at the time indebted; there being nothing to show that its financial ability would be impaired to the extent of endangering security of bondholders.

6. Schools and school districts §110—Transfers of children and taxes from one district to another cannot be denied, on the ground that those remaining would incur added burdens.

The right of a resident of one school district to have his children transferred to another, and his taxes paid to the second district, cannot be denied, on the ground that the first district was indebted, on the theory that a greater burden would be thrown on those remaining within the district, and, if there are special circumstances, they must be pleaded in a suit to enjoin the transfer.

Appeal from Greene Chancery Court; Archer Wheatley, Chancellor.

Suit by the Mt. Carmel Rural Special School District No. 18 of Greene County and the Ancient Order of United Workmen against the Paragould Special School District No. 1. From a decree dismissing the complaint for want of equity, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

W. W. Bandy, of Paragould, for appellants.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. This is an action instituted in the chancery court of Greene county by the Mt. Carmel rural special school district No. 18 of Greene county and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, a fraternal insurance society, against Paragould special school district No. 1 and the county judge, the county clerk, and the collector of said county, to restrain the county officers from crediting to the Paragould special school district the school taxes levied and collected on certain lands situated in Mt. Carmel school district.

[1, 2] It is alleged in the complaint that said districts were organized by orders of the county court of Greene county as single school districts, pursuant to the general statutes of the state on that subject; that Mt. Carmel special school district was, in the year 1912, authorized to borrow money for building purposes, and did borrow from its coplaintiff, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the sum of $2,500, and had from year to year voted a special tax to raise funds to pay said indebtedness, but that the taxes collected from the lands owned by O. B. Justice, Dick Buchanan, and J. E. Purcell, who are residents of Mt. Carmel special school district, had been by the county officers credited to Paragould special school district No. 1. The amount of taxes alleged to have been so credited is charged to be the sum of $63.80. The prayer of the complaint was for judgment against Paragould Special School District No. 1 in said sum and for a decree restraining the county judge, county clerk, and collector from, in the future, crediting the taxes collected on said lands to the account of the Paragould special school district. The court sustained the demurrer to the complaint and dismissed it for want of equity; the plaintiffs declining to amend.

The defendant has not appeared in this court, nor does counsel for plaintiff in his brief indicate the specific ground on which the court sustained the demurrer, and we are left to search for ourselves to discover the defects in the complaint. It is alleged that the taxes which have been, or are about to be improperly credited, were levied and collected on the property of Justice, Buchanan, and Purcell, and that they are residents and landowners in the Mt. Carmel special school district; but it is not alleged that the lands of those persons were subject to taxation for school purposes in that district. The statutes of this state provide that the county courts shall have power, upon the petition of any person residing in a particular school district, to transfer the children of such persons for educational purposes to an adjoining district, and that when such transfer is ordered the school tax of such person "shall be added to the school revenues of the district to which he has been transferred, and shall not be included in the school revenues of the district where he resides." Kirby's Digest, §§ 7639, 7640.

We have held that this statute applies to the transfer of children for educational purposes to or from a single school district. Special School District No. 33 v. Eubanks, 119 Ark. 117, 177 S. W. 900. For aught that appears from the allegations of the complaint in this case the children of the three landowners mentioned in the complaint may have been transferred from one of the districts to the other, and consequently the lands of those parties were not subject to taxation for school purposes in the district where they are located. In other words, the allegations in the complaint are not sufficient to show that Mt. Carmel special school district is entitled to the school taxes on the lands of the persons mentioned in the complaint, and that district is therefore not entitled to maintain this action. At least, the complaint does not allege facts which call for the extraordinary relief by injunction.

[3] The other plaintiff, Ancient Order of United Workmen, fails to state a cause of action, in that it is not shown that injury will result if the amount of taxes mentioned in the complaint is improperly credited to another school district. In order to make out a cause of action in favor of a creditor of the district, it must be shown that injury will result from the alleged wrongful act, or that the transfer of children and property by order of the county court, if there was in fact such a transfer, diminished the revenue of the district to the extent that the revenues pledged to the payment of the debt will be insufficient for that purpose.

The chancery court was therefore correct in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint. Decree affirmed.

On Rehearing.

[4] It is contended by learned counsel for appellant that the fact that there has been a transfer from Mt. Carmel rural special school district to Paragould special school district No. 1, if it constituted a defense to this action, should have been pleaded by answer, and could not have been reached by a demurrer. Appellant is invoking an extraordinary remedy, and, if the transfer constituted a defense, his failure to negative the transfer in the allegations of the complaint constituted an omission which could have been reached by demurrer. In other words, the failure to allege that these three taxpayers, who are named in the complaint, were subject to taxation in Mt. Carmel school district, is an omission which goes to the equity of the complaint.

[5] Again it is very earnestly insisted that under the statute creating the Mt. Carmel district the building fund authorized to be levied was pledged to the payment of the bonds issued by the district, and that it is beyond the power of the Legislature to provide for transfers to another district of the taxes pledged for that purpose, and the attempt to do so would constitute an impairment of the obligations of the contract evidenced by the bonds. We have decided that the power of the Legislature over that subject is supreme, and that the failure to provide by statute for the adjustment of equities does not defeat the legislative action. Special School District No. 2 v. Special School District, 111 Ark. 379, 163 S. W. 1164. That principle controls in the present controversy, and leads to the conclusion, announced in the original opinion, that neither of the appellants show facts sufficient to constitute a right of action, in that they did not allege that the transfer of the taxes of the particular parties named was sufficient to deplete the funds of the district to the extent that it endangered the securities held by the bondholders, or that it placed an additional burden on the other taxpayers.

[6] It is now contended that the other taxpayers in the district might complain because the transfer of a part of the taxable property from the district creates a heavier burden on the main taxpayers. If this were true, the statute authorizing the transfer of children from one district to another would not be effective at all in any case where there was an indebtedness of the district. But the theory upon which it is allowed to be done is that those that remain in the district get the benefit of any improvements in the way of buildings in which the borrowed money was invested. If, however, there are peculiar circumstances which create an additional burden on the remaining property owners by reason of the transfer of the children and taxes of some of them, this must be especially pleaded and proved, in order to call for extraordinary equitable relief. The same can be said with respect to the claim of bondholders, for unless the revenues of the district are depleted to such an extent as to impair the securities of the bondholders they are not entitled to ask for extraordinary relief. This is the idea we intended to express in the original opinion in, stating the reasons why the decree should be affirmed.

We must adhere to those conclusions, and the petition for rehearing is overruled.

BRUNDIDGE et al. v. CRUTCHFIELD. (No. 27.)

Municipal corporations §—459—Special act authorizing improvement district to exceed limit of expenditures held unconstitutional.

Where the laws existing at the time of the organization of a street improvement district limited expenses of improvements to 20 per cent. of the assessed value of the real property in the district, a special act authorizing the district to expend 35 per cent. of the assessed value is unconstitutional.

Appeal from Hempstead Chancery Court; James D. Shaver, Chancellor.

Suit by C. H. Crutchfield against J. P. Brundidge and others, Commissioners of Street Improvement District No. 1 of Hope. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. H. Crutchfield, an owner of real property within the limits of street improvement district No. 1 of Hope, Ark., brought this suit in equity against the commissioners of the street improvement district to enjoin them from proceeding with the construction of the improvement. The complaint, alleges that, under the laws existing at the time of the organization of the district, it could expend in making the improvements only 20 per centum of the assessed value of the real property of the district. It further alleges that by the provisions of a special act passed at the extra session of 1920 the district was authorized to expend 35 per cent. of the assessed value of the real property in the district, but that this act is unconstitutional and void. The defendants demurred to the complaint. The chancery court overruled the demurrer, and, the defendants, electing to stand on the demurrer, a final decree enjoining them from proceeding with the work was entered of record. The case is here on appeal.

Rose, Hemingway, Cantrell & Loughborough, of Little Rock, and U. A. Gentry, of Hope, for appellants.

Jas. H. McCollum, of Hope, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). The decision of the chancellor was right in holding the act to be unconstitutional. The record brings this case squarely within the rule announced in Skipper v. Street Imp. Dist. Nos. 1 and 2 of the City of Morrilton et al., 221 S. W. 866, and this case is ruled by the opinion in that case.

It follows that the decree must be affirmed.

MOLINE TIMBER CO. v. TAYLOR.
(No. 29.)

1. Master and servant §291(4)—Instruction held applicable to evidence.

In an employe's action for injuries received while operating a band cut-off saw, an instruction with reference to a broken condition of the guide was not objectionable, as abstract, where there was evidence that the absence of the guide had caused the saw to cut out a place, so that it had a vibration, making its use dangerous.

2. Master and servant §288(15)—Assumption of risk after promise to repair held for jury.

In an employe's action for injuries received while operating a band cut-off saw, whether plaintiff assumed the risk of a defective guide by going to work on Monday morning, after a promise of the foreman on Saturday morning to repair, held for the jury.

3. Master and servant §221(6)—Assumption of risk suspended by promise to repair.

The effect of a promise to repair, and of reliance thereon, is to create a new stipulation, whereby the master assumes the risk impendent during the time specified for the repairs to be made; and where no definite period is specified, the suspension of the master's right to avail himself of the defense continues for a reasonable time.

4. Appeal and error §1064(1) — Erroneous instruction as to damages for injuries to minor harmless in view of estoppel of father.

In an action by servant for injuries, an instruction authorizing recovery for loss of time from date of injury, which occurred while he was still a minor, was not prejudicial, in that plaintiff's father was entitled to the earnings during the remaining period of plaintiff's minority, where the father brought the action as next friend, and thereby estopped himself from claiming anything on account of plaintiff's services.

5. Estoppel §68(2)—Father, suing as next friend, estopped from making claim for child's services.

A father, who sues minor son's master for damages for personal injuries as next friend of his son, is estopped personally from claiming anything on account of loss of plaintiff's services.

6. Appeal and error §231(9)—General objection to instruction not inherently erroneous does not require reversal.

Since an instruction that a servant is entitled to recover for loss of time from date of an injury is not inherently erroneous, a judgment for a servant will not be reversed, although at the time of injury he was a minor and his father was entitled to his earnings, where defendant's objection to the instruction in the court below was only a general one.

7. Damages §132(13)—$12,500 excessive for loss of two fingers and portion of hand, and reduced to $8,000.

$12,500 held excessive for the loss of two fingers and a portion of a left hand of servant 18 years of age, earning $4.25 per day, and is reduced to $8,000.

Humphreys, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hempstead County; James S. Steel, Special Judge.

Action by C. W. Taylor, by next friend, J. W. Taylor, against the Moline Timber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Gaughan & Sifford, of Camden, and T. D. Wynne, of Fordyce, for appellant.

D. D. Glover, of Malvern, and Pace, Campbell & Davis, of Little Rock, for appellee.

SMITH, J. Appellee sustained an injury while operating a band cut-off saw in appellant's sawmill. The saw ran through a slot in a table having an iron apron. On top of the iron apron was a board 15 or 18 inches wide and 6 or 7 feet long, through which the cut-off saw ran through a slit or groove corresponding with the slit or groove in the iron apron of the table, and appellee claims that his injury was due to the fact that the board on top of the table was defective, in that it had cupped up and had split for a distance of several inches, and that there was a broken guide above the table, which gave the saw too much play, and that on account of the broken condition of this guide the saw had cut out a space, where it went through the table, larger than it had originally been, thereby giving the saw more play and making it more dangerous to operate.

Appellee was only 18 years old at the time of his injury, yet he was an experienced and skillful sawmill man, and had worked in various departments of the mill. He had been engaged at the table at which he sustained his injury only a few days, yet he discovered its dangerous condition, and reported that fact to Anderson, his foreman. Appellee testified that the attention of the foreman was called to the defective and dangerous condition under which the saw was being used on Saturday morning, and the foreman promised to repair the defect as soon as he could, and appellee relied upon this promise and continued in the service. On the following Monday morning appellee reported for duty, and went to work at the table in question, and between 9 and 10 o'clock that morning received the injury to compensate which this suit was brought. The injury resulted in the loss of appellee's little finger, and the one next to it, and the loss of half that hand down to the wrist joint. Appellant saved exceptions to the instructions which were given, and also to the refusal of the court to give other instructions which it requested.

[1] The first instruction given recited the alleged cause of negligence upon which a recovery was asked. It is conceded that the instruction correctly declared the law as an abstract proposition; but it is contended that it was error for the court to instruct with reference to the broken condition of the guide, for the reason that, if the guide was in a defective condition, that fact had nothing to do with the injury. But appellee testified that the absence of the guide had caused the saw itself to cut out a place possibly three-quarters of an inch wide at a place which was properly just a crack, and had cut a hole nearly twice as long as the saw was wide, and that the saw thus had a vibration or play which made its use dangerous. The operator of this saw stood in front of the table and pushed the dimension stuff he was sawing up against the saw, using both hands in doing so, and appellee was thus employed when he was injured. The objection that the instruction was abstract does not, therefore, appear to be well taken.

It is very earnestly insisted that the court should have told the jury that appellee assumed the risk of operating the machine, and should have given a requested instruction to that effect, and that error was committed in so modifying the instruction as to submit that question to the jury. This instruction was based upon the premise that, even though the foreman had promised to repair the defect in the machine, yet if appellee understood these repairs were to be made before he resumed work on Monday morning, and the repairs were not so made, and he knew that the defect of which he had complained still existed when he went to work Monday, that he assumed the risk of operating the machine in its then existing condition.

[2] The theory of the instruction, as requested, was that the time had expired during which appellee would be relieved of the assumption of risk on account of the promise to repair. It is true that appellee did say that he understood the repair would be made by Monday; but he did not say that the foreman had promised the repair would be made by Monday. His testimony on that point, when amplified, was that the foreman had promised to make the repair as soon as he could, and that he supposed it would be made by Monday morning; but he still expected the repairs would be made, and went to work under that assumption. He also testified that the foreman—

The modification of the instruction was not improper, because, without the modification, the instruction would have told the jury that there was no suspension of the assumption of risk beyond Monday morning, whereas, if appellee was still relying upon the promise to repair, and had the right to do so, then it could not be said, as a matter of law, that there was a suspension of the assumption of risk, and the modification properly submitted that question of fact to the jury.

[3] We have many cases discussing the effect of the master's promise to repair, but nowhere is the law stated more clearly than in the case of St. L., I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Holman, 90 Ark. 565, 120 S. W. 150, where it was said:

"The effect of a promise to repair by the master, and of the continuance in his service by the servant, in reliance upon the promise, is to create a new stipulation whereby the master assumes the risk independent during the time specified for the repairs to be made. Where no definite period is specified in which the given defects are to be remedied, the suspension of the master's right to avail himself of the defense of assumption of the risk by the servant continues for a reasonable time."

Nor can it be said as a matter of law that, if Monday morning was not the definitely specified time within which the promise to repair was to be complied with, appellee would not have a right for a longer period of time to rely on that promise. Only one full day had intervened between the time the promise was made and the occurrence of the injury, and that day was Sunday and was not a working day at the mill.

[4-6] An instruction on the question of the measure of damages permitted appellee to recover for the loss of time from the date of his injury; the objection now urged to the instruction being that appellee, at the time of his injury, was still a minor, and that appellee's father was entitled to these earnings during the remaining period of appellee's minority. It appears, however, that appellee had been emancipated by his father, and for more than a year had been allowed to collect and to appropriate his earnings to his own use. But, however that may be, the father brought this action as next friend of his son, and the instruction complained of directed the jury to assess compensation for any loss of time or diminished earning capacity from the date of the injury, and the father would be and is thereby estopped from claiming anything on account of appellee's services. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co. v. Block, 218 S. W. 682; Baker v. Flint & Pere Marquette Ry. Co., 91 Mich. 298, 51 N. W. 897, 16 L. R. A. 154, 30 Am. St. Rep. 471. Moreover, the objection to the instruction in the court below was a general one, and, as it is not inherently erroneous, the reversal of the judgment would not be required because it was given.

[7] It is finally insisted that the judgment recovered is excessive, and we agree with counsel in this contention. The judgment was for $12,500. No other error appears in the record, and that error may be cured by the reduction of the judgment. It is always a difficult question for us to determine to what extent a judgment should be reduced which we regard as excessive; but we think the present record presents a case in which that action should be taken. Appellee lost two fingers and a portion of his hand, and for a period of seven weeks was under the constant treatment of a physician, during which time he necessarily suffered much pain and sustained a total loss of earnings. Prior to his injury, which occurred on February 3, 1919, he earned $4.25 per day, and since his injury he had been able to earn only $2 per day. Necessarily there is a tenderness, which may for some time yet to come prevent appellee from doing kinds of labor which he may later on be able to perform, and there will always be a diminished capacity to perform labor, and the disfigurement is also permanent. The trial in the court below occurred on October 20, 1919. But the case is not that of a man who has lost a hand. Appellee still has his thumb and his two principal fingers, and he will be able to do many things with that hand which do not require much gripping power or great strength, which he could not do without the three fingers he still has. Appellee was a right-handed man, and the injury occurred to his left hand.

We think, under all the circumstances, a judgment for $8,000 will fairly compensate the injury sustained, and the judgment will be reduced to that sum, and, as thus modified, will be affirmed.

HUMPHREYS, J. (dissenting). Appellee, C. W. Taylor, began to work for appellant

when a mere schoolboy, working at odd times and on Saturdays. He showed so much aptitude for that character of work, the foreman suggested that he quit school and adopt the mill business as his life's work. He gave up his education and became a regular employé in appellant's company. He became skilled in the use of machines of all kinds in the mill, and was advanced until, at the time of his injury, he was receiving $4.25 a day, and was in line for promotion. His expectancy was 43½ years. His injury wholly incapacitated him for the character of work he had theretofore been doing. He was re-employed, and made an effort to carry on his old work, but was compelled, on account of the character of the injury, to give it up entirely and take up a different character of labor, from which he was able to earn $2 per day as a maximum amount. His actual loss, therefore, was $2.25 per day. Figured upon this basis on an expectancy of 43½ years, the present value of his earning capacity is $12,276. His injury was a severe one, causing him much pain and anguish of mind. The condition in which his hand is left will necessarily embarrass and humiliate him throughout life. The verdict of the jury is not excessive, based upon the actual pecuniary loss to appellee, and, when the other elements of damage above mentioned are taken into consideration, it is quite clear that the verdict of the jury was not excessive.

For these reasons, I am unable to concur with my Associates in the reduction of the judgment. I therefore dissent from the judgment in this regard.

FROLICH et al. v. HICKS et al. (No. 373.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 3, 1920.
On Rehearing, June 14, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐1002—Verdict on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Verdict on conflicting evidence on issues properly submitted is conclusive on appeal.

2. Evidence ⇐483(1), 519—Capacity of engine not matter calling for expert knowledge.

Capacity of an engine for pumping water is not a matter calling for expert knowledge, but only for such knowledge as a man of ordinary intelligence and judgment, with sufficient observation of the operations of such an engine, would possess.

3. Evidence ⇐243(2)—Admissions of agent after transaction inadmissible against principal.

Admissions of an agent after the close of a transaction from which damages, rendering his principal liable, are claimed to have resulted, are not competent to establish liability of the principal.

4. Witnesses 388(10)—Inquiry as to conversation as ground for impeachment held too general.

Question to witness, as to prior statements to certain persons contrary to his testimony as foundation for impeachment, is too general; it not mentioning time, place, or circumstances of the conversations.

On Rehearing.

5. Landlord and tenant 48(1)—In action for lessor's breach of agreement to furnish water, evidence as to capacity of well held sufficient to go to jury.

Evidence in action by lessee for breach of agreement of lessor to furnish sufficient water to flood a rice crop, conditioned on a third person furnishing a well of 2,000 gallons per minute capacity, held sufficient to go to jury on the question of the well being of that capacity.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lonoke County; George W. Clark, Judge.

Action by Grover C. Hicks and others against Max Frolch and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Trimble & Trimble and Chas. A. Walls, all of Lonoke, for appellants.

Jas. B. Reed, of Lonoke, and Jno. P. Streepey, of Little Rock, for appellees.

McCULLOCH, C. J. This is an action instituted by appellees against appellants to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the breach of a contract in regard to the renting of a rice farm for the year 1918 and an undertaking in said contract on the part of appellants to furnish the water to flood the rice crop. Appellant owned a rice farm in Lonoke county and entered into a written contract with appellees, agreeing to rent the farm to appellees for the years 1918 and 1919, for a certain share of the crop, and also agreed to furnish an adequate supply of water with which to flood the rice, conditioned on Lane & Bowler Company furnishing a well on the premises of the capacity of 2,000 gallons per minute, in accordance with the terms of a contract between that company and appellants.

It is alleged in the complaint that Lane & Bowler Company furnished the well, of the capacity mentioned, and installed a pump therein, according to the terms of the contract, but that appellants failed to put in an engine of sufficient capacity to pump enough water to flood the rice crop, and that the crop failed for the lack of water. There was a denial of the allegations of the complaint, and on the trial of the issues before a jury the verdict was in favor of appellees.

[1] It is contended, in the first place, that the testimony is not sufficient to sustain the verdict. The evidence tends to show that the quantity of water pumped from the well was insufficient to flood the rice crop; that the well furnished by Lane & Bowler Company was up to contract, in that it had a capacity of 2,000 gallons of water per minute, but that the engine used by appellants in pumping water was not of sufficient power to operate the pump to the full capacity of the well or to afford sufficient quantity of water to flood the rice crop. The contract between the parties to the litigation, and also the contract between appellants and Lane & Bowler Company, were both in writing, and there can be no dispute as to their contents. Lane & Bowler Company was only to furnish a well of the capacity mentioned and put in the pump. It therefore became the duty of appellants under their contract with appellees to furnish an engine of sufficient power to pump the necessary quantity of water from the well. If the well furnished by Lane & Bowler Company was not of the capacity mentioned, then, under the contract between the present litigants, appellants were to be absolved from all liability on account of the failure to obtain sufficient quantity of water to flood the crop.

There was conflict in the testimony on the issue as to whether or not the well furnished by the company came up to specifications. Some of the witnesses testified that it furnished much less than 2,000 gallons per minute, and others testified that it had a capacity of more than that quantity of water. That issue was properly submitted to the jury on legally sufficient evidence, and the verdict settles the issue against appellants.

The next issue in the case was whether or not an engine of sufficient power was furnished by appellants. There was a conflict also on this point, and the evidence was sufficient to warrant a verdict either way, according to where the jury found the preponderance to be. We can not say the verdict is unsupported on that issue.

There was also an issue as to the effect upon the rice crop and the amount of damages, if any, which resulted, and these issues were also supported by legally sufficient evidence. All of the issues were submitted to the jury on correct instructions.

Learned counsel complain of the court's instructions, particularly No. 3, which they say ignored the issue as to whether or not Lane & Bowler Company complied with their contract with respect to the well, and particularly as to the pump. There was no controversy in the case, as we understand, as to the sufficiency of the pump itself; but there was an issue as to the capacity of the well which Lane & Bowler Company was to furnish and the capacity of the engine which appellants themselves were to furnish. We think, as before stated, these issues were properly submitted to the jury and there was no error in the instructions.

[2] Error is also assigned in the ruling of the court in permitting appellees themselves and other witnesses to testify with respect to the capacity of the engine furnished by appellants. One of the witnesses is an expert engineer familiar with the operations of such engines, and the other witnesses showed that they had more or less experience in observing the operation of such engines. We are of the opinion that in the first place the matter about which the witnesses testified was not one calling for expert knowledge, but only for such knowledge as a man of ordinary intelligence and judgment with sufficient observation of the operations of such an engine would possess. The witnesses described the engine and its kind, and each stated that they had been about the operation of such engines for many years. We think that the testimony of the witnesses was competent. Bowen v. State, 100 Ark. 232, 140 S. W. 28.

[3] Mr. Hollingshead, who was the sales manager for Lane & Bowler Company, was called as a witness by appellees to prove that the well furnished by that company was of the capacity mentioned in the contract, and his testimony tended to establish that fact. Other testimony was adduced by appellees along the same line. After appellees had rested their case and appellants had introduced testimony, they recalled Mr. Hollingshead to the witness stand for further cross-examination, and proposed to ask him the question whether or not he had stated to a Mr. Miller and a Mr. Herron, or either of them, that Lane & Bowler Company had failed to get the well to the capacity they had agreed on. Appellees interposed an objection, which the court sustained, and the ruling of the court in refusing to allow the question to be propounded is assigned as error. It is argued that the testimony was competent as substantive proof to establish the fact that the well was not up to contract, but the answer to that contention is that the admissions of an agent after the close of the transaction from which damages resulted is not competent evidence tending to establish the liability of the principal. Stecher Cooperage Works v. Steadman, 78 Ark. 381, 94 S. W. 41.

[4] Again, it is argued that the testimony was competent in order to lay the foundation for the impeachment of Hollingshead as a witness. We are of the opinion that the question was too general in its nature, in that it did not mention the time, place, or circumstances of the conversation sought to be elicited. Before they can complain of the court's ruling in excluding the testimony, they must have offered the question in such form as to elicit an answer which would afford the proper foundation for impeachment. It was not sufficient to merely ask the witness whether or not he had ever made any such statement to the persons named.

We find that there was no error committed by the court in the progress of the trial, and that the testimony was sufficient to sustain the verdict; and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

On Rehearing.

[5] It is very earnestly insisted by counsel for appellants that we were mistaken in saying that the evidence was legally sufficient to warrant the submission of the issue whether or not the well furnished by Lane & Bowler Company had the capacity to furnish 2,000 gallons of water per minute. It must be conceded that the testimony on this point is not clear and satisfactory, and we have re-examined it with care for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a mistake was made in the original opinion on that question. Mr. Hollingshead, the sales manager for Lane & Bowler Company, was called as a witness by appellees, and he testified that in his opinion the well was capable of producing 2,000 gallons of water per minute. He was not asked as to his qualifications as an expert on the subject; nor was any objection interposed to his giving his opinion as to the capacity of the well. On cross-examination he made a statement that tended, more or less, to qualify his former statement, or rather to weaken the effect of it; but he did not withdraw the statement, and it was a question for the jury to determine what weight should be given to it. One of the appellees testified that he was familiar with wells of that kind, and that this well furnished 1,800 gallons per minute with the 60 horse power motor that was used.

There was other testimony to the effect that a motor of that capacity was insufficient, and that a larger one would have pumped a greater quantity of water. This witness also testified that, while the pump was bringing up water at the rate of 1,800 gallons per minute, there were no bubbles observable in the water. It appears from the testimony that when a well is pumped full capacity bubbles will appear. Now, there was another witness introduced who testified as an expert, and he gave it as his opinion, if the well was furnishing 1,800 gallons of water per minute with a 60 horse power motor, and no bubbles appeared in the water, that if 75 horse power motor was used the well would have produced 2,000 gallons of water. He testified, on cross-examination, that he would not undertake to say what the capacity of this particular well was; but this did not weaken the force of his testimony as an expert concerning the additional amount of water that would have been furnished under those circumstances. Another witness, T. J. Cullar, testified that he worked for Lane & Bowler Company in driving this well, that he had had experience with such wells, and that a well driven to the stratum reached in this well would furnish 2,000 gallons of water per minute. We cannot say that there is no testimony of a substantial nature tending to show that the well furnished by Lane & Bowler Company was of the capacity of 2,000 gallons per minute. This being true, the issue was properly submitted to the jury.

We have considered the other questions raised on rehearing, but have reached the conclusion that our judgment on the former hearing was correct.

The petition for rehearing is therefore denied.

ASHCRAFT v. STATE. (No. 83.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 22, 1919.)

1. District and prosecuting attorneys ~~↔~~8— Not required to follow up appeals.

Prosecuting attorneys are not required to follow up appeals in criminal cases, and any services performed in that regard are voluntary, since the Attorney General alone is required to represent the state in criminal appeals, under Kirby's Dig. §§ 3462, 3463.

2. Costs ~~↔~~317—Prosecuting attorney's fee on affirmance where thirty defendants were tried together.

Where 30 defendants were indicted separately for the same offense, were tried together by consent, and there was one judgment of conviction against all defendants, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court, the prosecuting attorney can tax only one fee, under Kirby's Dig. § 2620, providing that upon affirmance of a judgment on defendant's appeal an attorney's fee of $20 to be paid the prosecuting attorney shall be taxed as part of the costs.

3. Costs ~~↔~~292—Joint and several liability of defendants tried together.

Where numerous defendants were indicted separately but tried together and a single judgment of conviction entered and affirmed by the Supreme Court, attorney's fee, taxed as part of the costs of appeal, under Kirby's Dig. § 2620, may be collected from either of the defendants or apportioned against all of them, since they are jointly and severally liable.

Lee Ashcraft and others were convicted of falling to dip their cattle and the judgment of conviction affirmed. 215 S. W. 688. On motion of the prosecuting attorney to retax the costs. Motion overruled.

J. H. Bowen, of Perryville, and Reid, Burrow & McDonnell, of Little Rock, for appellants.

Geo. W. Emerson, of Little Rock, and G. B. Colvin, of Perry, for the State.

PER CURIAM. There were 30 defendants indicted separately for the same offense, but by consent they were tried together, and there was one judgment of conviction against all of the defendants. An appeal was prosecuted to this court, and the judgment against all of the defendants was affirmed. The statute reads as follows:

"Upon the affirmance of a judgment on the appeal of the defendant, an attorney's fee of twenty dollars, to be paid to the prosecuting attorney, shall be taxed as part of the costs of the appeal, and upon the reversal of a judgment upon an appeal by the plaintiff, a fee of five dollars." Kirby's Digest, § 2620.

The clerk of this court taxed as cost one fee of $20, and the prosecuting attorney moves the court for a retaxation of cost so as to allow a separate fee of $20 on each of the convictions.

The reliance of the prosecuting officer in his contention for a separate fee for each conviction is on the decision of this court in the case of Hempstead County v. McCollum, 58 Ark. 159, 24 S. W. 9, where the court construed the statute (Kirby's Digest, § 3488) allowing prosecuting attorneys a fee "for each conviction on indictment for any felony," and holding that on joint indictments against several defendants tried together, and on an indictment against a single defendant charging more than one offense, the prosecuting attorney is entitled to a separate fee on each conviction.

The two statutes relate to different subjects and are open to different interpretations.

Section 3488 relates to fee of a prosecuting attorney on each conviction in criminal prosecutions.

Section 2620 relates to fees taxed upon affirmance of judgments in misdemeanor cases in the Supreme Court. One is allowed as compensation for service in procuring each conviction in a criminal case, and the other is allowed as a docket fee on each judgment. The gist of the decision in the McCollum Case, supra, was that, while there was but one judgment, there was more than one conviction within the meaning of the statute, and that the prosecuting officer was allowed, under the statute, a fee on each of the convictions, regardless of the fact that there was only one judgment in the case. In the opinion the court quoted Prof. Wharton as follows:

"In an indictment against two or more the charge is several as well as joint, and the conviction is several." Wharton Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 314.

[1] The case, and the applicable statute, is entirely different where there is only one judgment of affirmance though it embraces several convictions. The prosecuting attorney is not required to follow up appeals in criminal cases, and services performed in that regard are voluntary. The Attorney General alone is required to represent the state in causes pending in the Supreme Court. Kirby's Digest, §§ 3462, 3463. But the statute allows the prosecuting attorneys a docket fee on each judgment of affirmance in misde-meaneor cases in the Supreme Court. This is not for services performed, for, as before stated, none are required of that officer.

[2, 3] It is not material that in the present case the indictments against the defendants were separate. The cases were tried together by consent, and only one judgment was rendered, and there was only one judgment of affirmance. The taxation of a single fee for the judgment of affirmance is against all of the defendants jointly and severally. Only one fee can be imposed, but it may be collected from either of the defendants at the election of the state, or it may be apportioned against all of them, as the state may elect. The fact that each conviction is separate does not affect the question of allowance of a single fee for the affirmance.

Motion overruled

BROWN v. STATE. (No. 363.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 26, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §510, 511(1) — Accomplice testimony must be corroborated; what not sufficient corroboration.

Under Kirby's Dig. § 2384, a conviction cannot be had on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice, and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows that the offense was committed and the circumstances thereof.

2. Criminal law §511(1)—Evidence corroborating accomplice testimony held sufficient to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for robbery, where defendant's alleged accomplice confessed and testified for the state, evidence corroborating the accomplice held sufficient to sustain the conviction.

3. Criminal law §942(2)—Denial of new trial because accomplice repudiated testimony not abuse of discretion.

Where, after conviction, defendant's accomplice repudiated his testimony, the denial of a new trial requested on that ground cannot be held an abuse of the trial court's discretion, where such accomplice was corroborated in several important details, and the court heard the witnesses and saw their demeanor.

4. Criminal law §719(1)—Prosecutor cannot state facts not shown by the evidence.

It is error for the prosecutor to state facts not shown by the evidence.

5. Criminal law §719(3) — In a prosecution for robbery, argument by prosecutor held improper.

In a prosecution for robbery, where the proprietress of a hotel at which defendant took his meals gave testimony to establish his alibi, a remark by the prosecutor that he knew all about the woman, but could not tell what he knew, but wished the jury knew, was improper as a statement of fact as to which there was no evidence, for it was an adroit way of asking the jury to draw an unfavorable inference as to the character of the witness, and as such amounted to a statement of fact.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nevada County; George R. Haynie, Judge.

George Brown was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

George Brown was indicted, tried before a jury, and convicted of the crime of robbery. The facts as shown by the state, briefly stated, are as follows:

Ben Baker lived in Nevada county, Ark., about 11½ miles from Hope, Ark. He is a single man, and his aged mother lives with him, and they lived there on November 23, 1919. On Sunday night, November 23, 1919, two men went into Baker's house and threw their guns on Baker and his mother and then tied them. They told them that they knew Baker had a lot of money and forced him to give them $400 of his own money. They searched the house and found $400 additional, part of which belonged to Baker, and the remainder to his mother. One of the men participating in the robbery was a slender man and the other was heavy set. The heavy set man did the talking. Both of the men looked like their faces were blacked, and they had cloths tied over their mouths. One of the men took out his knife and threatened to cut Baker's throat in an effort to make him give up his money. There was smut on Baker's neck where the robber's hands had touched it. Baker's mother was 79 years old, and they tied her with wire. Baker could not recognize the men, because they had smut on their faces and had tied thick cloths on their faces above their mouths. There were tracks on the outside of the house which looked like somebody outside had stood there while the robbers were in the house. A short time after the robbery occurred Baker had a conversation in the town of Hope with the accused George Brown. He and another man were discussing with Brown about having carried some men to Baker's house the night of the robbery. Baker testified that George Brown said that they ought not to blame him for carrying the men down there and him not knowing where they were going. We here quote from the testimony of Baker as to what Brown said to him on that occasion:

"Here a while back, a short time, I carried a bunch out in the country; I didn't know where they was going; first thing I knew they had a suit case or two of whisky in the car and was drinking it, and he didn't know what was up and had to bring them back to town drunk."

The testimony of Baker as to what occurred at the scene of the robbery was in all respects corroborated by that of his mother.

Harry Simmons made a confession and testified on behalf of the state. According to his testimony Arthur Neal, Joe Ed Smith, George Brown, and himself robbed Ben Baker and his mother. Joe Ed Smith and Simmons were working at the Brown Gin Company in Hope, and Arthur Neal lived in the town there, painting. George Brown operated a car for hire in the town of Hope. On the Sunday night that Baker's house was entered and the robbery occurred, Joe Ed Smith, Arthur Neal, George Brown, and Harry Simmons got in George Brown's car and started to Baker's for the purpose of robbing him. They knew that he had a considerable sum of money. Brown and Neal sat on the front seat, Brown driving the car, and the other two sat on the back seat. They were all dressed in blue overalls. All the parties put smut on their faces in order to disguise themselves. It was dark when they got to Baker's house. George Brown and Joe Ed Smith both had pistols and went into the house. After the robbery was over they got into the car and went back to Hope. They ran the car pretty fast, and it took about 40 minutes to get there. All the parties except George Brown got out of the car and went up to the light plant, where they washed their hands and faces and pulled off their overalls. Joe Ed Smith had on a soldier's uniform.

The engineer of the light plant at Hope heard about the robbery on Tuesday after it happened. According to his testimony on the Sunday night preceding the robbery, being the 23d day of November, three men came to the light plant. Two of them had on overalls, and the other one was in a soldier's uniform. One of the men was pretty black and smutty. They asked for water to wash their faces. There was nothing about them to attract the witness' attention, and he was not able to identify them. He knew George Brown and knew he was not one of the men.

A deputy sheriff was also a witness for the state. He went to the scene of the robbery on the next day after it occurred and found the things in the house piled in the middle of the floor as if the drawers and trunks in the room had been emptied. There was a rag with the things which had some smut on it. There were tracks behind the smoke-house where some one had evidently stood. Arthur Neal had on shoes at the time he was arrested, and the tracks looked like tracks which his shoes would make. Brown had a pistol in a dresser drawer in his room at the time he was arrested. He tried to keep the deputy sheriff from taking the pistol with him. The deputy sheriff went and got the overalls which Harry Simmons and Joe Ed Smith said they had on the night of the robbery. They were blue overalls and jumpers.

The testimony of other witnesses tending to corroborate the testimony of Harry Simmons will be stated or referred to in the opinion.

The defense of the accused was an alibi. He denied that he left Hope on the Sunday night that the robbery occurred, in an automobile, and proved by several witnesses that at about the time the automobile is said to have left for Baker's house he was at a hotel in Hope, and that he stayed there and ate supper.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty and fixed the defendant's punishment at three years in the state penitentiary. From the judgment rendered, the defendant has duly prosecuted an appeal to this court.

J. O. A. Bush, of Prescott, and Steve Carri-gan, Jr., of Hope, for appellant.

Jno. D. Arbuckle, Atty. Gen., and J. B. Webster, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] Harry Simmons made a confession and was a witness for the state. According to his testimony, Arthur Neal, Joe Ed Smith, George Brown, and himself robbed Ben Baker and his mother at the house of the former in Nevada county, Ark. He described in detail how the robbery was committed. He was an accomplice of the defendant, and under our statute the latter cannot be convicted unless the testimony of the accomplice is corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows that the offense was committed and the circumstances thereof. Kirby's Digest, 2384.

[2] It is earnestly insisted by counsel for the defendant that the testimony of Harry Simmons is not sufficiently corroborated to warrant the jury in finding the defendant guilty. We cannot agree with counsel in this contention. Simmons testified that they all went to the scene of the robbery in a Ford car which was driven by the defendant. They all had on blue overalls, and two of them went into the house, and the other two remained outside for the purpose of watching so that the ones in the house might be warned of the approach of any one. Their faces were covered with smut.

It was shown by witnesses for the state that George Brown owned a Ford car, and that he and other parties were seen in it in Hope on the Sunday evening that the robbery occurred, and that they left there a short time before dark. Baker says that they had smut on their faces and blue overalls on. Simmons also said that they stopped before they got to Baker's house and cut off some pieces of telephone wire. Baker testified that his mother's hands were fastened together by wire, and the wire was exhibited to the jury. The jury might have inferred from this fact that it was telephone wire. Simmons testified that Arthur Neal stayed on the outside around the smokehouse as a watcher while the robbery was being committed. The deputy sheriff who arrested Neal observed these tracks on the next morning after the robbery and said that they looked like they had been made by a pair of shoes which Neal had on when he was arrested. Simmons said that they all had on blue overalls, and had disguised themselves by blacking their faces with smut. After the robbery was over they drove hurriedly back towards Hope, and separated before they got into town. The defendant went on with the automobile, and the other parties went to the light plant, where they took off their overalls and washed their faces. He also stated that Joe Ed Smith was dressed in a soldier's uniform. The engineer of the light plant remembered that some parties came there on that Sunday night, and that one of them was dressed in a soldier's uniform, while the other two had on blue overalls. He noticed that the face of one of them had a good deal of black on it when he washed. His attention was not particularly called to the parties, and he could not identify any of them. He knew the defendant, and knew that he was not one of them. Then, too, Baker had a conversation with Brown shortly after the robbery with regard to it, and the jury might have inferred from what Brown said that he had carried the parties to the scene of the robbery. These facts and circumstances, if believed by the jury, were a sufficient corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice and warranted the jury in finding the defendant guilty.

The court instructed the jury on the subject of the corroboration required of the testimony of the accomplice in the manner provided by the section of the digest above referred to and the decisions of our court construing it.

[3] After the jury had convicted the defendant and after the defendant had filed his motion for a new trial, the defendant filed a supplemental motion for a new trial. In it he exhibited an affidavit from Harry Simmons in which the latter stated that he was originally induced to enter a plea of guilty and testify against the defendant by the promise of the deputy sheriff that he himself would go free and by the threat that if he did not so testify he would get a long prison sentence.

In his affidavit Simmons denied that either himself or the defendant were present when the robbery was committed, or that they had anything whatever to do with it. In short, he repudiated in toto what he had testified to before the jury in the trial of the defendant and undertook to explain away his testimony.

In asking for a reversal of the judgment on this ground, counsel for the defendant rely mainly on the case of Bussey v. State, 69 Ark. 545, 64 S. W. 268. In that case the defendant was tried and convicted of the crime of rape. The conviction rested almost entirely upon the testimony of the prosecuting witness, and the court held that under the peculiar circumstances of that case that it was better that the case should be retried than to enforce a judgment for the extreme penalty of death.

In the present case Simmons was before the court when he testified at the trial of the defendant, and the court had the opportunity to examine his testimony and demeanor on the witness stand and compare them with the statements made by him in his affidavit after the trial was ended and the defendant had been convicted by the jury. Simmons' testimony was corroborated in several important details, and it cannot be said that the trial court under the circumstances abused its discretion in not granting the defendant a new trial because Simmons made a written retraction of his former testimony and swore to the truth of it.

[4, 5] Again, it is contended that the judgment should be reversed because of certain prejudicial remarks made by the prosecuting attorney in arguing the case before the jury. In his closing argument to the jury the prosecuting attorney said:

"Here comes old Mrs. Smith, and testifies that she knows where George Brown was. I know old Mrs. Smith, and I know all about her. I cannot tell you here what I know, but I wish you knew."

The defendant objected to this argument and moved the court to admonish the jury not to consider it. The court overruled the objections of the defendant, and the defendant excepted to the ruling of the court.

The defense of the defendant was an alibi. Mrs. Smith ran a hotel in Hope, Ark., where the defendant took his meals. She was a witness in his behalf, and testified that he ate his supper at her hotel on the evening that Ben Baker's house was entered and he was robbed. She testified as to the details of a special conversation she had with the defendant on that evening, and gave her reasons for knowing that he was there. This was at an hour of the day when, according to the witnesses for the state, the defendant was on his way to the scene of the robbery. Thus it will be seen that she was a material witness for the defendant, and that her testimony, if believed by the jury, would have established his innocence of the charge against him. No evidence was introduced tending to impeach her character.

The prosecuting attorney went out of the record and stated that he knew all about Mrs. Smith, but could not tell the jury what he knew of her, and wished that the jury could know. The prosecuting attorney is not allowed to state, as a matter of fact, that of which there is no evidence. His statement in the case at bar was not within the latitude of discussion the law accords to counsel. Its evil tendency and prejudice to the rights of the defendant are manifest. There is not a fact in the record from which an inference can be drawn that Mrs. Smith was of bad character. The prosecuting attorney went out of the record to state that he knew her character, and that he wished the jury knew it. This was an adroit way of asking the jury to draw an unfavorable inference about the character of the witness from a statement of fact made by the prosecuting attorney which was not in the record. The fact is the principle, the inference is the incident, without which the fact cannot have existence. Dunmore v. State, 115 Ala. 68, 22 South 541. The remarks of the prosecuting attorney were similar to the remarks of counsel held prejudicial in Fort v. State, 74 Ark. 210, 85 S. W. 236, and German-American Ins. Co. v. Harper, 70 Ark. 305, 67 S. W. 755. The error of the court in this regard compels a reversal of the judgment.

Other statements were made in the closing argument of the prosecuting attorney which might be considered improper, but, as in our judgment they will not occur in another trial, we shall not extend this opinion by commenting on them.

For the prejudicial error in the closing argument of the prosecuting attorney to the jury, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF MONETT v. WILSON et al. (No. 20584.)(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)1. Appeal and error \S 1009(1)—Where both parties claim legal title appellate court bound by verdict of court sitting as jury.

Where on an appeal in a suit to quiet title both parties claim the legal title to the property without the intervention of a court of equity, the Supreme Court cannot review the facts as in equity cases, but is bound by the verdict of the court below sitting as a jury, the same as in any other action purely at law.

2. Appeal and error \S 1009(2)—Findings of fact by court cannot be reviewed, in absence of equitable issues, if sustained by evidence.

On an appeal in a suit to quiet title wherein no equitable issues were presented, findings of fact, made by the trial court at the request of appellant, are binding upon the Supreme Court as by a special verdict of the jury, and such court cannot review the facts upon which they are based, provided there is substantial evidence to sustain them.

3. Evidence \S 67(1)—Conspiracy to defraud creditor presumed to be continuous, and to include purchase from buyer at sheriff's sale.

In a suit to quiet title and for possession of realty, where the court found that defendant entered into a conspiracy with his brother, a codefendant, by which he received the brother's share in the property for the purpose of defrauding the latter's creditors, it will be presumed that such conspiracy continued until its purpose was accomplished, and that a subsequent purchase by defendant from the purchaser of the brother's interest at a sheriff's sale was made in pursuance of such conspiracy.

4. Fraudulent conveyances \S 77, 182(5) — Purchaser under sheriff's sale held trustee for creditor of original owner.

Where a person indebted fraudulently conveyed realty to his brother, who subsequently purchased from the purchaser at a sheriff's sale the interest of the indebted brother, sold under judgment against him, for a small consideration, the title acquired from the purchaser at such sheriff's sale was tainted with the original wrong, in that the original fraudulent title of the buying brother tended to depress the price at the sheriff's sale, and the property still remained that of the original owner and subject to the demands of his creditors; the brother being a trustee for them merely.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; Arch A. Johnson, Judge.

Suit by the First National Bank of Monett against E. S. Wilson and another. Decree for defendants, new trial denied, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

D. S. Mayhew, of Monett, for appellant.
W. Cloud, of Pierce City, and E. L. Burton, of Parsons, Kan., for respondent R. C. Wilson.

SMALL, C. I. This is a suit to quiet title to and for possession of certain lands and lots in Barry county. It was commenced in Barry county and taken by change of venue to Greene county. The petition is in the usual general form, and concludes with the statutory prayer and for possession. Defendant E. S. Wilson made no defense, but defendant R. C. Wilson filed answer containing general denial, except that he was in possession, and claimed to be and was the owner of said real estate. The answer proceeds:

"For further answer and counterclaim, defendant states that in the year 1907 the property in controversy was the property of J. F. Wilson, who died intestate, leaving the defendants Richard C. Wilson and Edward S. Wilson his sole and only heirs; that they continued to own and possess the same until the 22d day of June, 1910, when the defendant Edward S. Wilson and Vinette Wilson, his wife, conveyed by deed, duly signed and acknowledged and recorded, all of their right, title, and interest of the said Edward S. Wilson and wife of this defendant Richard C. Wilson for a valuable consideration, which said deeds were then and there delivered, and the possession of the said real estate passed to the exclusive control of this defendant, and has been held openly, exclusively, and notoriously by him since said date as the owner.

"That afterwards, to wit, March 21, 1911, J. C. Baker and his wife and T. A. Nicholson and his wife conveyed to the defendant all right, title, and interest which they had acquired in the real estate in controversy, for a valuable consideration, which, they, the said Baker and Nicholson, had acquired by reason of a sheriff's sale, upon an execution issued by the circuit clerk of Greene county, Mo., in the case of James H. McQuary, Plaintiff, v. Missouri Land Co., of Scotland, Limited, et al., defendants, wherein the said E. S. Wilson had become security upon bond for costs, and execution was issued and levied on the interest of the said Edward S. Wilson in said real estate.

"Wherefore this defendant avers that he was the owner of an absolute title to said real estate by reason of said conveyance, and that at the time of the commencement of this suit plaintiff had no right, title, or interest in or to the real estate in controversy, and the defendant prays the court to determine, ascertain, and decree his title to the said real estate, and for all other relief."

The reply specifically denied ownership of the property by defendant R. C. Wilson; admitted that on June 22, 1910, E. S. Wilson and wife made a deed to said R. C. Wilson purporting to convey their interest in the property to said R. C. Wilson, but alleged that at the time said deed was made said E. S. Wilson was indebted in the sum of about $7,000, of which $4,500 was due plaintiff, and that said deed was made and accepted for nominal consideration, and for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of said

E. S. Wilson, including the plaintiff; that at the time said property was worth $14,000, and that ever since said conveyance said E. S. Wilson has remained in possession and exercised authority of ownership and enjoyed the rents and profits of the property; that at, or about, the same time said E. S. Wilson conveyed other property belonging to him to other persons to defraud his creditors, of which he continued in possession, etc.

"Further replying to defendant's answer, plaintiff says the purported quitclaim deed from J. C. Baker and Vesta Baker, and T. A. Nicholson and Martha Nicholson, as set forth in defendants' answer, does not state the true consideration for said quitclaim deed, and that said deed was made for a consideration, paid by the said E. S. Wilson, defendant, for the purpose of further hindering and delaying his creditors, and that all the right, title, and interest, which the said Baker and Nicholson had to said property was by virtue of a sale under an execution issued by the court of Greene county, and for which deed the said Baker and Nicholson never paid any consideration, all of which all of the defendants herein well knew. Wherefore, plaintiff prays the court to determine the title to said real estate as prayed for in its petition."

The cause was tried before the court sitting as a jury. No instructions nor declarations of law were asked or given. But, at the request of plaintiff, the court made the following findings of fact:

"First. That in his lifetime James F. Wilson, deceased, was the owner of [the property in controversy]. * * * That the said James F. Wilson died seized of said property in the month of March, 1907, leaving surviving him as his only heirs Edward S. Wilson and Richard C. Wilson, and they continued to be the owners of said property until the 22d day of June, 1910; that prior to July 10, 1910, Edward S. Wilson was the owner in fee of lot 5 in block 6 of the Monett Town Company's town site of Monett, Mo.

"Second. That in June and July of 1910 the said Edward S. Wilson was largely involved, owing debts in the neighborhood of $5,500, and was surety on a bond in the case of McQuary et al. v. Missouri Land Company of Scotland et al., and about June, 1910, judgment was rendered in the Supreme Court of Missouri in said McQuary Case [230 Mo. 342, 130 S. W. 335], which rendered said Edward S. Wilson liable on said bond for costs.

"Third. That shortly after the rendition of said judgment the said Edward S. Wilson conveyed, by quitclaim deed, to the defendant, his brother, Richard C. Wilson, his one-half interest in the real estate inherited from his father, and executed a trust deed to secure the apparent sum of $1,200 to said Richard C. Wilson on the property owned by him.

"Fourth. That said real estate so conveyed and the property so mortgaged was of the value in excess of $10,000, and the amounts for which said pretended conveyances were made were $4,500 for the quitclaim deeds and $1,200 the pretended amount due under the trust deed.

"Fifth. The court finds that the above transactions were fraudulent, and made for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the said Edward S. Wilson, one of whom was the plaintiff.

"Sixth. That thereafter a judgment was rendered in the McQuary Case against said Edward S. Wilson et al., and execution was issued at the instance of the circuit clerks of Barry and Greene counties, to collect his fees, together with the costs in the case, and there is no testimony to show that it was ordered by the opposite party to the judgment. That this execution was levied upon the real estate described in the plaintiff's petition, and a sale thereunder was had, at which the circuit clerk of Barry county and the circuit clerk of Greene county, both of whom had costs as clerks in the McQuary Case, became the purchasers of said estate in the sum of $24. That thereafter a suit was instituted by said clerks, Nicholson and Baker, to set aside the deed from Edward S. Wilson to Richard C. Wilson.

"Seventh. The court further finds that while said suits were pending and before the date of trial, the said Richard C. Wilson purchased from said Baker and Nicholson the real estate referred to, paying therefor the sum of $—, the amount of said payment being not very clear from the testimony. The witness Baker testifying that it was $250. The court finds, however, that the purchase price was not in excess of $600, and that the quitclaim deed was executed by said Baker and Nicholson to said Richard C. Wilson.

"Eighth. The court further finds that on the — day of March, 1911, the plaintiff in this action recovered a judgment against the defendant, Edward S. Wilson, for $4,564, and an execution was issued upon said judgment and levied upon the property described in plaintiff's petition as the property of Edward S. Wilson, and the same was sold and bought in by the plaintiff bank on November 15, 1911, for the price and sum of $100, and this suit was instituted for the purpose of decreeing title for said real estate in plaintiff's bank under its deed above mentioned.

"Ninth. The court further finds that, after the original conveyance made in 1910 by Edward S. Wilson to R. C. Wilson, the defendant Edward S. Wilson was insolvent, and has been in such condition from that time until the present.

"Tenth. There is no evidence that convinces the court that the purchase price paid by R. C. Wilson to Baker and Nicholson was the money of his brother, Edward S. Wilson."

There was evidence tending to support the finding of facts. There was an agreed statement of facts, in addition to the finding of the court, which shows that on September 24, 1910, judgment for costs was entered in said McQuary Case for $600, against said Edward S. Wilson, and that execution was issued thereon on September 26, 1910, which was levied on the real estate in controversy, and on the 22d day of November, 1910, said real estate was sold by the sheriff of Barry county to said J. C. Baker and T. A. Nicholson for $24, and that thereafter, on the 25th day of November, 1910, the sheriff executed a deed to them therefor, which was recorded in said Barry county December 19, 1910; that on February 18, 1911, said Nicholson and Baker commenced a suit in the circuit court of Barry county against defendants herein to quiet title to said land; that the quitclaim deed from Edward S. Wilson to R. C. Wilson, mentioned in paragraph 3 of the court's finding of fact, was made on the 22d day of June, 1910, and the $1,200 deed of trust on July 10, 1910; that the deed from Nicholson and Baker and their wives to R. C. Wilson was dated March 1, 1911, and was filed for record March 25, 1911. Baker testified that the consideration for the deed from Baker and Nicholson to R. C. Wilson was $150 instead of $250, as recited in the finding of the court. The court rendered judgment for the defendants, and, after plaintiff's motion for new trial was overruled, it appealed to this court.

II. Under the pleadings, this case is one purely at law. The petition, being in the usual general form, simply alleges that plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the property, and asks the court to determine the title, and to declare the rights of the parties—all in the language of the statute—and to adjudge the title in plaintiff and award it a writ of possession. The answer of defendant R. C. Wilson denies plaintiff's ownership, and avers that he is the owner, setting forth his claim of title, to wit, that he owns one-half, as an heir of his father, James F. Wilson, and the other half by conveyance from his brother, E. S. Wilson, and wife, and also by deed from Baker and Nicholson, who purchased the interest of E. S. Wilson at sheriff's sale, and the prayer is that the title be declared in said defendant, so that the answer presents no equitable features at all. If said answer should be considered a counterclaim for affirmative legal relief, and said reply as an answer containing an equitable defense thereto, which we need not decide (because a deed made in fraud of creditors is as void at law as in equity), still the cause is not thereby thrown into equity for the reason that no affirmative relief is asked or prayed for in such reply. But the prayer of said reply is simply for "the court to determine the title to said real estate as prayed for in the petition." So that both parties claim the legal title to the property without the intervention of a court of equity.

[1] Under the cause thus presented, therefore, this court cannot review the facts, as in equity cases, but is bound by the verdict of the court below, sitting as a jury, the same as in any other action purely at law. Koehler v. Rowland, 275 Mo. 573, 205 S. W. 217, and cases cited; Laclede Land & Investment Co. v. Goodno, 181 S. W. 410; Toler v. Edwards, 249 Mo. 152, 155 S. W. 26; Minor v. Burton, 228 Mo. loc. cit. 563, 564, 128 S. W.

964; Lee v. Conran, 213 Mo. 404, 111 S. W. 1151; Hayes v. McLaughlin, Div. No. 2, this court, 217 S. W. 262, decided at the present term, but not yet [officially] reported.

[2] Furthermore, the plaintiff having requested the lower court to make a finding of facts, which the court did, we are bound by those findings as by a special verdict of a jury, and cannot review the facts upon which they are based, provided there is substantial evidence to sustain them, as there is in this case. Railroad v. Southern Railway News Co., 151 Mo. 375, loc. cit. 380, 381, 52 S. W. 205, 45 L. R. A. 380, 74 Am. St. Rep. 545; Sutter v. Raeder, 149 Mo. loc. cit. 307, 50 S. W. 813; City of De Soto v. Ins. Co., 102 Mo. App. 1, 74 S. W. 1.

So that we are limited in our power to review this judgment to ascertaining whether the conclusions of law of the lower court on the facts found by it were correct and according to the law applicable thereto.

III. The findings of the lower court is that in June and July, 1910, the property in question was fraudulently transferred by Edward S. Wilson, who was insolvent, to his brother, R. C. Wilson, to defraud his creditors; that it was so transferred for a pretended consideration; that it was then worth in excess of $10,000; that afterwards in September, 1910, judgment for $660 costs was rendered against E. S. Wilson, in the circuit court of Greene county, on which the clerk of that county ordered out execution, and the property was sold thereunder by the sheriff in November, 1910, for $24, and bought in by Baker and Nicholson, the clerks of the circuit courts of Barry and Greene counties, respectively; that they thereupon instituted suit to quiet title against R. C. Wilson, with the result that on March 1, 1911, Baker and Nicholson conveyed the property by quitclaim deed to R. C. Wilson—Baker says for $150, and the court finds the amount is uncertain, but for not exceeding $600. The court finds that there is no evidence that convinces the court that the purchase price paid Baker and Nicholson was the money of Edward S. Wilson. This is not a finding that it was not his money, but simply a statement to the effect that the evidence does not satisfy the court that it was his money. But in the view we take of the case it matters not whether the small sum so paid was the money of Edward S. or R. C. Wilson.

In State v. Bersch, 276 Mo. 397, 207 S. W. 809, the defendants were indicted for setting fire to a certain stock of merchandise for the purpose of securing the insurance thereon. There was evidence of a conspiracy to thus fraudulently obtain the money from the insurance company. But it was urged that the conspiracy ended when the fire took place, as there was no evidence that any attempt was made to collect the insurance money. But the court held that the conspiracy continued, and was not ended until the insurance money was collected, and there was no evidence tending to show that the purpose of the defendants to obtain the money was abandoned. In other words, the conspiracy to defraud having been established, it will be presumed to continue, and not to be abandoned until its purpose is accomplished.

[3] In this case, therefore, it must be held that, inasmuch as the court found that R. C. Wilson entered into a conspiracy with Edward S. Wilson in June and July, 1910, by which he received and held his brother's property for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, including the plaintiff, such conspiracy continued, and the subsequent purchase from Baker and Nicholson, in March, 1911, was made in pursuance of such conspiracy and was part and parcel thereof.

[4] The fact that the defendant R. C. Wilson received the fraudulent deed to the property prior to the rendition of the judgment for costs under which Baker and Nicholson purchased enabled him to claim a title by virtue thereof superior to that of Baker and Nicholson, and thus force them to settle or sell out to him for a consideration wholly disproportionate to the real value of the property, clearly differentiates this case from Funkhouser v. Lay, 78 Mo. 453, relied upon by the respondents, where the fraudulent grantee's title was admittedly subsequent and subject to the deed of trust, and was and could in no way be used to depress the price of the property at the trustee's sale, at which the fraudulent grantee purchased. Here, the original fraudulent title of R. C. Wilson continued its work; it tended to depress the price of the property at the sheriff's sale, so that the property, worth $10,000 or more, sold for $24 only, and enabled him to purchase the property for $150, or at least for not more than $600, from the purchaser at such sheriff's sale. So that, even if R. C. Wilson paid the small consideration which was paid Baker and Nicholson for their deed with his own funds, he would reap a rich harvest from his original, fraudulent transaction. Neither law nor equity will permit a fraudulent grantee to thus take advantage of his own wrong. The title he acquired from Baker and Nicholson was tainted with the vice of the original wrong and conspiracy to defraud the plaintiff and other creditors of Edward S. Wilson, and was void as to them, and the property was in law still the property of Edward S. Wilson, and subject to the demands of his creditors. Or, in other words, R. C. Wilson held the title as trustee for such creditors. Bobb v. Woodward, 50 Mo. 95; Ryland v. Callison, 54 Mo. 513.

We hold, therefore, that on the face of the finding of facts herein the plaintiff is the owner of all the property purporting to be conveyed by quitclaim deed from Edward S. Wilson to Richard C. Wilson, and upon which said Edward S. Wilson purported to make a deed of trust in favor of said Richard C. Wilson, and stated in said findings of fact to have been so conveyed and incumbered to defraud the creditors of said Edward S. Wilson.

We, therefore, reverse the case, with directions to the circuit court to set aside its judgment herein, and to enter up judgment declaring the rights and titles to the said property, of the plaintiff and R. C. Wilson, respectively, as found and declared by our opinion, and that said E. S. Wilson has no right nor title therein whatever, and that the plaintiff be let into possession, as tenant in common with defendant R. C. Wilson, of the land in which plaintiff has an undivided one-half interest, and that plaintiff recover possession of said lot 5 block 6, of Monett Town Company's town site of Monett, in which plaintiff owns the entire interest.

The motion for rehearing in this case is overruled.

1. Courts \S 231(6)—Supreme Court, having jurisdiction on constitutional question, not divested, unless question colorable or moot.

Where an appeal had been properly granted to Supreme Court on a ground that a constitutional question is involved, the Supreme Court cannot be divested of jurisdiction, unless it appears that the constitutional question is merely colorable, or, though at one time substantial, it has been passed upon by the court prior to the appeal in the case, and is therefore no longer a live question.

2. Appeal and error \S 22—Parties to appeal in Supreme Court cannot waive jurisdictional question.

With appellate jurisdiction fixed by the record nisi in the Supreme Court, neither party can change that jurisdiction by mere waiver of the jurisdictional question by acts of omission or commission.

3. Courts \S 24—Jurisdiction of subject-matter cannot be granted by consent.

Jurisdiction of the subject-matter is not a subject-matter of consent.

4. Courts ⇨231(22) — Appeal to Supreme Court transferred to Court of Appeals, where constitutional question not raised in Supreme Court.

Where appeal was taken to Supreme Court in action involving constitutionality of Rev. St. 1909, § 5538, and where appellants nowhere in their brief, points, and authorities, or in any manner, in the Supreme Court assert the unconstitutionality of the act, the appeal will be transferred to the Court of Appeals, not on the ground that by failure to raise the question the appellants waived the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, but on the theory that by such failure the court concludes that the alleged constitutional question is merely colorable and not substantial.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cape Girardeau; Frank Kelly, Judge.

Suit by the Little River Drainage District against Louis Houck and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Case transferred to Court of Appeals.

A. M. Spradling and Giboney Houck, both of Cape Girardeau, for appellants.

Oliver & Oliver, of Cape Girardeau, for respondent.

GRAVES, J. From our learned commissioner we borrow the facts as follows:

"This is a suit by plaintiff, drainage district, to foreclose a lien claimed by it for certain special taxes, levied by said district upon the real estate described in the petition, together with the interest, costs, and attorney's fees. The taxes are claimed to have been levied pursuant to section 5538, R. S. 1909, which authorizes a levy of 25 cents per acre against lands in the district for certain purposes therein set forth. The amount of the taxes sued for was less than $1,000. The answer, among other things, pleaded that the said act was unconstitutional, in that it violated certain specified sections of the Constitution of this state, and of the United States; also contained a counterclaim against the plaintiff, drainage district, asking $5,000 damages. On motion of the plaintiff, the counterclaim was stricken out. There was judgment for the plaintiff as prayed for $926.79 taxes and 10 per cent. attorney's fees and other costs. Defendants asked a demurrer to the evidence, which was refused. The defendants filed a motion for new trial on the ground the court erred in refusing their demurrer, and in which they preserved their constitutional questions, also their exception to the ruling of the court in striking out their counterclaim. Defendants' motion for new trial being overruled, they appealed to this court.

"In this court, the appellants nowhere in their brief, points, and authorities, or in any manner, assert said act is unconstitutional, but simply assert the act does not authorize any lien on their property, and there is no provision for enforcing such lien or collecting such taxes."

[1] I. From the statement of the case it appears that the constitutional question was duly lodged and preserved below, and when the appeal was taken it was properly granted to this court. Before the jurisdiction can be divested it must appear to this court (1) that the constitutional question is merely colorable, or (2) that although, at one time substantial, it has been previously passed upon by this court, and therefore no longer a live question. By previously, we mean prior to the appeal in the case, because we have often ruled that if a constitutional question was a live issue at the time the appeal was taken, our jurisdiction will not be ousted by reason of the fact that this court had decided the question adversely to appellant, after his appeal was taken.

But we have indicated in State ex rel. Crow v. Carothers, 214 S. W. 857, and Scott v. Dickinson, 217 S. W. 270, that the mere abandonment of the constitutional question in this court (although a live one when our jurisdiction obtained) would transfer the case to the Court of Appeals. To the doctrine of these cases we do not consent.

[2, 3] With appellate jurisdiction fixed by the record, nisi, in this court, neither party can change that jurisdiction by mere waiver of the jurisdictional question. We determine our own jurisdiction without the consent, or other action of either or both parties. Jurisdiction is not the subject-matter of consent. We mean jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Neither party, after there has been a fixed record in the trial court, as here, can change the jurisdiction of this court upon that case by either acts of omission or commission. The record nisi fixes the jurisdiction, and not the acts of the parties. In so far as State ex rel. Crow v. Carothers, and Scott v. Dickinson, supra, seemingly hold that by abandonment here the appellant may shift jurisdiction from this court to the Court of Appeals they should be overruled.

[4] The case should be transferred to the Court of Appeals for the following reasons: Appellant does not brief nor urge his constitutional point in the brief here. From that we can, and do, conclude that his alleged constitutional question is merely colorable, and not substantial. By this we pass upon the constitutional question, and find it without substance, and by reason of that fact transfer the cause, but do not agree that either party can, by either acts of commission or omission, waive our jurisdiction. From the act of omission we conclude the jurisdictional question is colorable only, and the case should be transferred, just as we would transfer a case when the alleged constitutional question (by reason of our previous rulings) was no longer a live question. But in both instances this court would be determining its own jurisdiction, and would not be permitting the parties, either by acts of commission or omission, to determine it for us. This is the theory in Botts v. Railroad, 248 Mo. 56, 154 S. W. 53, and Moore v. Railway, 258 Mo. 165, 165 S. W. 304.

The exact contention was ruled by Lamm, P. J., in Hartzler v. Met. Street Ry. Co., 218 Mo. loc. cit. 565, 117 S. W. 1125, whereat, in discussing a constitutional point, not argued in the brief of appellant, our court unanimously said:

"The failure of counsel to reason the point (though well equipped to do so) is tantamount to an abandonment of it. By saying so much as that, we do not mean to rule that if we, prima facie, had jurisdiction, we would lose it by the mere abandonment of the point; for jurisdiction is not given or lost by mere consent. What we mean to say is that we feel invited to broadly infer that, by their refusal to reason the point, counsel concede it no point to reason."

In other words this court passes upon its jurisdiction, and this without reference to the question of waiver. When the appellant fails to brief and urge his alleged constitutional question, we are at liberty to conclude that it is merely colorable, and not substantial, and upon that ground transfer the case. Such is the situation of this case. It is therefore transferred to the St. Louis Court of Appeals for final disposition upon the merits.

STATE v. JARVIS. (No. 21910.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

Burglary \Leftrightarrow 41(9)—Evidence held to sustain conviction for having custody of burglar tools.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for having custody of burglar tools in violation of Rev. St. 1909, § 4529.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Carter County; E. P. Dorris, Judge.

Miles Jarvis, alias James Riley, was convicted of having custody of burglar tools, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and John W. Broadus, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMS, P. J. Upon an information charging him with having in his custody certain burglar tools as defined in section 4529, R. S. 1909, defendant was tried in the circuit court of Carter county, found guilty, and his punishment assessed at two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. Defendant duly ~~protested~~ an appeal.

The information charged the appellant jointly with three other defendants. Defendant was granted a separate trial. The evidence tends to establish the following facts:

On the night of August 10, 1919, defendant and three companions were seen to drive through the city of Van Buren, Carter county, Mo., in a large automobile, which was owned by defendant. The occupants of the car were strangers in the town and attracted attention. They left the town and in a short time returned again and again departed. The defendant and his three companions drove the car about two miles from Van Buren, where they remained during the night, sleeping in the car. The next morning a camp fire was built near the automobile. The defendant and one of his companions remained near the camp, and two of his companions drove the car to Van Buren for the purpose of getting gasoline.

When the car arrived in Van Buren, Mr. John L. Moore, county clerk, and former sheriff of that county, asked the men if they were not in town the night before, and they denied that they had been in Van Buren the night before. Mr. Moore then took a loaded pistol from one of the pockets of the automobile and placed the two men under arrest. He thereupon called upon the deputy sheriff to assist him in searching the men. In the pockets of one man were found some pistol shells. Under the seat of the automobile were found two No. 12 shotgun shells, a wrecking bar or jimmy, a long roll of soft soap wrapped in a towel, and a meal sack. They also found in the car two flashlights, a small package of absorbent cotton, and also some automobile tools.

Upon being questioned, the two men stated that the appellant and the other man were up the road at the place where they had stayed all night. Thereupon the deputy sheriff, together with three other men, proceeded in a car up the road to where the men had camped during the night. There appellant and his companion were arrested. Appellant was unarmed at the time, but his companion had a pistol in the pocket of his coat which he was carrying on his arm. The two prisoners were taken to Van Buren and placed in jail. Thereupon at the deputy sheriff's request two men returned to the camp fire where the men had spent the night, and about five steps from the camp under some hickory bushes they found a box containing a hack saw, four hack saw blades, a pair of pliers, twenty dynamite caps, four of them fused with short fuses, and two searchlight batteries. The pasteboard box containing the absorbent cotton and the box found in the automobile both bore the same trade-mark, as did the pasteboard box which contained the dynamite caps and which was found near the camp fire. Two or three days later five sticks of dynamite were found wrapped in paper under the end of a log about 200 yards from the place where the men had camped.

The state offered further evidence tending to show that the tools and materials thus found were such as were commonly used by burglars. These witnesses also testified that soft soap is used by burglars to place around cracks of a safe, and that nitroglycerin used in blowing safes can be procured by boiling dynamite; that when dynamite is boiled the nitroglycerin becomes separated therefrom and floats on top and is skimmed off and used in blowing safes.

The evidence upon the part of the defendant tended to establish the following facts: That some of these tools could be put to good use by persons other than burglars. Appellant, testifying in his own behalf, stated that his home was in St. Louis; that he left St. Louis August 8, 1919, in the automobile in company with his three companions, intending to go to Hot Springs, Ark., and on their way they delivered ten gallons of whisky to an unknown man whom they met by appointment in an automobile near Centerville; that they arrived in Van Buren on the night in question about 11:30 p. m., and that they were looking for a road to Doniphan, Mo. Finally they drove about 2 miles beyond Van Buren past a camp fire by the roadside. Appellant said he saw two men sitting by the camp fire. They drove the car about 200 yards beyond the camp fire, where they remained all night. The following morning the two men at the camp fire had departed, and thereupon the four men backed the car down to the camp fire. Thereupon two of his companions went to Van Buren to get food, and appellant and his remaining companion walked over to the woods to hide some whisky. Appellant admitted that he owned one of the pistols, but denied that he had in his possession the dynamite caps and fuse. He stated that the soap found in the automobile was used for washing pans and fixing leaks in the gas tank. Appellant testified that he had no intention of committing a burglary.

In rebuttal the state offered evidence tending to show that appellant's reputation for "honesty and integrity" in St. Louis was bad.

Fred Kelley, sheriff of Carter county, testified that on August 10, 1919, he twice passed the place on the road where the four men camped on that night, the first time being about 9 o'clock in the evening, and the last time about midnight, but that at that time there was no fire there.

We have not been favored with a brief by appellant, but in pursuance of our statutory duty we have carefully gone over the entire record. The evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict. The information was in form which has been approved by prior decisions of this court, and we are unable to find error in any of the instructions. In fact, we find no matter of error of sufficient importance to merit discussion. It therefore follows that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

All concur.

HOECKER v. HOECKER. (No. 20854.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.

1. Divorce \S 184(10)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive on appeal.

In divorce suit, where the evidence is in sharp conflict, and the evidence of either party is sufficient, if believed, to warrant a decree for such party, appellate court will defer to finding of trial court.

2. Divorce \S 240(5)—Alimony held not excessive.

Where value of husband's wealth was approximately $80,000, and where wife had assisted husband in accumulating such wealth by cooking in restaurant and saloon conducted by husband and wife for many years, award to wife of $20,000 alimony in gross and $1,000 as attorney's fee held not excessive.

3. Divorce \S 240(2)—Alimony dependent on facts of particular case.

There is no hard and fast rule concerning the amount of alimony; the amount to be awarded depending on many factors, and each case turning more or less upon its own particular facts.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Clarence A. Burney, Judge.

Suit by Catherine Hoecker against Joseph Hoecker. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The circuit court of Jackson county granted plaintiff a divorce from the defendant, and awarded her the sum of $20,000 alimony in gross and also allowed her an additional $1,000 as attorney fee. From this judgment defendant duly perfected an appeal to this court.

At the time of the trial the plaintiff was 62 years of age and the appellant was 69 years of age. These parties were first married in 1872, and for many years conducted a restaurant and saloon. The plaintiff did all the cooking for the restaurant, and otherwise aided in laying the foundation for some of the savings now held by the defendant. They did not own much property when they were first married, but it appears that after conducting the aforesaid business for a number of years they were able to purchase a farm in Miller county, upon which they moved and resided together until about 1901. Six children were born of this marriage. Four children are now living, two sons and two daughters. The youngest is 21 and the oldest 44 years of age.

A disagreement occurred in 1901, and they separated. The two daughters, then aged respectively 5 and 15 years, left the farm in company with their mother. Shortly thereafter the older girl married, and the plaintiff resided with her for some time. After the first separation, plaintiff lived in Kansas for a while, and also in Arkansas, and finally, in 1914, came back to Miller county to live. After the first separation, the appellant procured a divorce from his wife, presumably upon service by publication. She testified that she knew nothing about it at the time. Shortly after the plaintiff returned to Miller county, and on March 27, 1914, she married appellant for the second time. After the second marriage they lived on the farm in Miller county until about July 15, 1915, at which time a quarrel ensued, and they again became separated. On that day the plaintiff, together with her daughter Margeret, then 20 years of age, left the home of appellant, and later moved to Kansas City. The plaintiff testified that appellant had a bad temper; that he often became intoxicated, and when in an intoxicated condition he would curse and abuse her, and at one time struck her.

On the day of the separation plaintiff states that she told her daughter Margeret not to go out in the wet woods after the cows, and not to milk them unless they were up; that at this appellant made the remark, "If you don't want to milk these cows right, don't milk them at all," and began quarreling. The daughter and Sam Poor, son-in-law of the parties, left the house for the purpose of milking the cows. After they had gone, appellant continued to quarrel, and tried to hit plaintiff on the head with a chair. She threw up her arm, and received the blow on the arm. Appellant ordered the plaintiff to go, and she refused, and he told her that, if she didn't, "they will carry you out"; that appellant then went out to the pasture, where the daughter and son-in-law were milking, and turned the cows and calves together.

Thereafter appellant and Sam Poor returned to the house, and were in one of the rooms settling up a financial matter between themselves, when plaintiff came to the door, which was fastened by an old-fashioned button on the inside. The son-in-law arose and opened the door, so she could enter. When plaintiff entered the room, defendant jumped up and put his hand on a chair, as if he were going to attack the plaintiff, and swore at her. The daughter came in between them and said, "Dad, you can't strike mother when I am here." Plaintiff further states that at other times appellant cursed her and called her "A g— d— whore, a g— d— son of a bitch, a thief, and a liar," and said that he had kept his money locked up to keep her from stealing it. During the quarrel on the day of the separation, plaintiff says that appellant said, "To-morrow I will go to town, and when I come back, if you are here, something will happen that people will read about." Appellant told his son to take plaintiff away, and that she went to her son's house and stayed for three weeks, and saw appellant every day, but that he never spoke to her. She further says that appellant failed to provide for her, and that she did not have a pair of shoes when she left his home; that he dared her to make a store bill, and said that "If I did I would have to leave that part of the state."

The daughter Margeret corroborated the testimony of her mother, except that she did not see her father strike her mother, but that she did see a mark or bruised place across her mother's arm after the trouble. Mrs. Elizabeth Poor, another daughter, did not see or hear the difficulty, but afterwards saw the mark on her mother's arm.

A Mr. Bunch, who lived in that neighborhood, states that about the day of the separation he was on the outside of appellant's house, and that he heard loud talking; that he knew appellant's voice, and that he was talking very loud and angry, and quarreling with plaintiff and her daughter. A Miss Barton, who lived in the same neighborhood, testified that she frequently heard appellant and his wife quarreling, and at one time she heard appellant call plaintiff "a d— old whore," and told her that he did not want her to stay there any longer.

The evidence upon the part of the defendant as to what occurred in substantially as follows:

The son Herman, who lived upon one of appellant's farms, described the trouble on the day of the separation as merely a family quarrel. This witness testified:

"They were just quarreling—nothing to it—and we told them to quit; asked them to quit. My father would shut up occasionally for 10 or 15 minutes, and then mother would keep on chewing the rag, until father would get mad again, and he would have to tell what he thought, and that was the way it went on until about 10 or 11 o'clock in the night, and I told them to come and go home, and I took mother and sister to our home."

This witness testified that his father told him to take his mother away, but said nothing about keeping her away. The appellant's son John, describing the quarrel which occurred shortly before the separation, said:

"Well, just as near as you might term it, it was nothing but a family scrap; that is all there was to it—nothing serious—nothing more, perhaps, than occurs in common life."

He was asked if he heard his father call his mother bad names and replied, "Well, as far as I know, it was used on both sides."

Appellant, testifying in his own behalf, denied that he called his wife bad names, as testified to by plaintiff's witnesses, and said they had a quarrel on the day in question, and that his son took plaintiff out of the room, and "she kept quarrelling outside the room"; that later that evening she commenced "the same music," and appellant told his son to take her away to his home, that he didn't like to hear "that growling." When asked if he quarreled with his wife, that evening he said, "Yes; I did once in a while, when my gall would boil over." He denied that he ever struck her with a chair, or that he told her to leave and never come back. He also testified that he never refused to furnish her with things to eat and wear. Appellant did not testify concerning the amount and value of his property.

The evidence upon the part of the plaintiff tended to show that appellant owned 770 acres of land in Miller county, about half of which was bottom land and the rest was upland; that the bottom land was worth about $100 an acre and the upland about $30 an acre, making the total value of the land at approximately $50,000. Plaintiff also testified that appellant had over $30,000 in cash loaned out. Appellant's son, testifying on behalf of appellant, stated that the bottom land was worth about $50 and the upland about $20 an acre, and that there were about 200 acres of the land which was bottom land.

R. P. Stone, of Eldon, and Robert Walker, of Hermann, for appellant.

Joseph S. Rust, of Kansas City, for respondent.

WILLIAMS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] I. It is contended by appellant that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the court in granting plaintiff a divorce. The evidence upon this point will be found fully set forth in the foregoing statement. There was a sharp conflict in the evidence. If plaintiff's evidence is to be believed, she was undoubtedly entitled to a decree. If the appellant's evidence is to be believed, she was not so entitled. Any court, in passing upon this question, would be materially aided, if afforded an opportunity of seeing the witnesses "in action." The learned trial court had this opportunity. Under such circumstances, we feel that it is but proper that we should defer to his finding in the matter (Cherry v. Cherry, 258 Mo. 391, loc. cit. 403, 167 S. W. 539), and that therefore the contention of appellant be disallowed.

[2] II. It is further contended that the alimony awarded was excessive. We are unable to agree with this contention. There was evidence tending to show that appellant's farm was worth about $50,000, and that he had over $30,000 in money loaned out. The appellant, although testifying in his own behalf, did not undertake to inform the court as to the value of his property, nor did he deny the testimony of plaintiff that he had $30,000 loaned out.

[3] There was evidence, then, tending to show that appellant's total wealth was approximately $80,000. There is no hard and fast rule concerning the amount of alimony. Many factors influence the amount to be allowed, and each case seems to turn more or less upon its own peculiar facts. We have carefully weighed and considered the evidence before us, and are unable to say that the amount allowed in this case was excessive. Howard v. Howard, 188 Mo. App. 564, loc. cit. 567, 176 S. W. 483.

It therefore follows that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

STATE ex rel. MEYER BROS. DRUG CO. v. KOELN, Revenue Collector. (No. 21990.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, In Banc. May 21, 1920.)

Constitutional law § 100 — Taxpayer having no vested right to deduct property taxes from income taxes, repeal of statute destroys right.

While Income Tax Law 1917, § 32, authorized a taxpayer to exhibit to the collector the amount of tax paid on real or personal property which should be deducted, a taxpayer had no vested right to the deduction; consequently the repeal of section 32 by Act May 26, 1919 (Laws 1919, p. 721), destroyed the right, and no such deduction could be made out of the income taxes for 1918, for at the time the section was repealed property taxes were not payable, etc.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Charles B. Davis, Judge.

Petition by the State, on the relation of the Meyer Bros. Drug Company for a writ of mandamus against Edmond Koeln, Collector of Revenue for the City of St. Louis, Mo. From a judgment for relator, respondent appeals. Reversed.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., Charles H. Danes, City Counselor, and H. A. Hamilton, Asst. City Counselor, both of St. Louis, and John N. Gose, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellant.

Joseph W. Folk, Nelson Thomas, Abbott Fauntleroy, Cullen & Edwards, and John C. Vaughan, all of St. Louis, for respondent.

F. M. McDavid and S. O. Bates, both of Springfield, amici curiæ.

BLAIR, J. Section 32 of the Income Tax Law as passed in 1917 (Laws 1917, p. 538) reads as follows:

"Any person, corporation, joint-stock company, association or insurance company who shall have paid a tax assessed upon his real or personal property to the state during any year shall be permitted to exhibit the receipt or receipts thereof to the assessor to the full amount in the payment of income taxes assessed against such person, corporation, joint-stock company, association or insurance company during said year."

Prior to March 1, 1919, respondent duly made return of its income for the year 1918, and a tax thereon of $1,138.94 was assessed as income tax for that year. By the act of May 26, 1919 (Laws 1919, pp. 721, 722), effective on that date, the Legislature repealed section 32 of the Income Tax Law of 1917.

It is alleged that thereafter, during 1919, respondent paid to appellant property taxes aggregating $1,024.38 and received receipts therefor. Subsequently, and on December 17, 1919, respondent exhibited these receipts to appellant and therewith tendered $114.91 and demanded that the amount of the property tax receipts be credited on the income tax bill of $1,138.94, and the property tax receipts and money tendered be accepted in full discharge thereof, and a receipt in full for the income tax be issued and delivered to respondent. Appellant refused to comply with this demand, and the present proceeding was begun to coerce compliance. From an adverse judgment the collector appeals.

Appellant contends that respondent had no right to the demanded credit because the section which gave that right had been repealed prior to respondent's payment of its property taxes and demand of credit therefor. The gist of respondent's contention is that a right to the credit had vested prior to the repeal of section 32 of the act of 1917, and that repeal could not destroy or affect such vested right.

In the act of May 6, 1919 (Laws 1919 p. 718, et seq.), which took effect in August, 1919, the Legislature specifically applies the increased tax and reduced exemptions to incomes for the year 1919 and thereafter. No such limitation appears in the act of May 26, 1919, which repealed section 32 of the act of 1917, but an emergency clause was appended which purports to put the repeal into immediate effect for the reason that section 32 "is confusing and misleading, and in practical results destructive of the end sought by said act," which is said to create "an emergency within the meaning of the Constitution." This gives some hint of what the Legislature had in mind, but does not reach the question whether respondent had acquired a vested right to deduct its property taxes, paid in 1919, from its income tax for 1918, payable in the fall of 1919, which was beyond the reach of legislative action.

Appellant agrees with respondent that the Legislature cannot destroy a vested right. He contends that respondent had acquired no vested right to the claimed deduction prior to the repeal of section 32. In State ex rel. v. Koeln, 211 S. W. 31 et seq., it was held that the property taxes deductible under section 32 were those which became due and payable in the same year in which the income tax from which they were deductible became due and payable. Respondent's income tax for 1918 was assessed prior to March 1, 1919. The assessment was then complete, and the mode and amount of that assessment was exactly the same as if respondent had owned no property subject to assessment and taxation on June 1, 1918. At the time respondent's income tax was assessed on income for 1918 (March, 1919) respondent, so far as it alleges, had paid no property taxes which were deductible under section 32, and, of course, had neither received nor presented any receipts therefor. The time therefor had not arrived, under the decision in State ex rel. Koeln, supra. The same thing was true at the time section 32 was repealed, May 26, 1919. What, then, was the right or privilege which had accrued to respondent on May 26, 1919, which is said to be beyond the reach of legislative interference? The income tax had been assessed for 1918, but would not become due until the fall of 1919; and, unless respondent paid property taxes in the fall of 1919 and presented receipts therefor to the collector (State ex rel. v. Koeln, supra), payment for the full amount of the income tax could have been compelled even had section 32 not been repealed. The right to a deduction of property taxes had not accrued either when the income tax was assessed or when section 32 was repealed. It could never have accrued under section 32 until after (1) payment of property taxes, and (2) presentation of receipts therefor. The power of the state to impose the income tax without this privilege of reduction under section 32 is not questioned. No greater income tax was assessed than would have been assessed had the act of 1917 not contained section 32 at all. The assessment was not reduced or affected by that section. Its provisions related to the time of payment and authorized certain deductions at the time of collection upon conditions with which the taxpayer might or might not comply, as he saw fit. The class entitled to these reductions could not come into actual existence until there was a compliance by the taxpayers with the conditions of section 32. Until that time there was merely a privilege available upon conditions stated. This was all respondent had when section 32 was repealed—i. e., an "expectation based upon the continuance of" section 32—and this was not a vested right. State v. Railroad, 242 Mo. loc. cit. 375, 147 S. W. 130.

There is nothing in Ludlow-Saylor Wire Co. v. Wollbrinck, 275 Mo. 839, 205 S. W. 196, which indicates a contrary view. So far as that decision discusses section 32, it was dealing with the question of the constitutionality of the section. It viewed the "class" created by that section as it would exist after income taxpayers had paid property taxes and demanded and received credit therefor on their income taxes. The question discussed was whether this was permissible under the Constitution. The court did not then decide or attempt to decide the question determined in State ex rel. v. Koeln supra, or the question whether the class referred to came into existence at one time or another. The concurring opinion of the learned writer of the Ludlow-Saylor decision, which he filed in the Koeln Case, fully justifies this view, as does the nature of the question discussed in the Ludlow-Saylor Case. Neither are the Wisconsin decisions in point. Under the income tax law of that state the time of payment has nothing to do with the accrual of the right to the deduction of property taxes from income taxes. It appears that in that state the right of deduction accrues before the income taxes are assessed. Van Dyke v. Milwaukee, 159 Wis. 460, 146 N. W. 812, 150 N. W. 509. Had the right so accrued in this case, the Wisconsin decisions would be applicable and respondent's position sound. As already pointed out, such is not our law.

The briefs are in agreement upon practically every question except that which we have discussed. We hold that respondent had no vested right at the time of the repeal of section 32 which prevents giving effect to that repeal in this case.

The judgment is reversed.

McLARTY v. GRIGGS. (No. 21257.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §544(2)—Record proper only can be reviewed in absence of bill of exceptions.

Where the record on appeal does not contain a bill of exceptions, the appellate court can review nothing except the record proper.

2. Appeal and error §882(19) — Appellant, praying that interest in realty be determined, cannot claim relief to defendant error for want of prayer in answer.

In a suit to obtain title to realty, where plaintiff in his petition has prayed that the court adjudge the interest of the parties under Rev. St. 1909, § 2535, he is, on appeal, in no position to object that the trial court erred in decreeing title to be in defendant, when defendant's answer did not contain a prayer so to do.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pemiscot County; Sterling H. McCarty, Judge.

Suit by Dorothy McLarty against Joe Griggs. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action under section 2535, R. S. 1909, to ascertain and determine the title to 80 acres of land in Pemiscot county, Mo. The petition is in conventional form, and, after asserting ownership in plaintiff and alleging that defendant claims some interest therein, the petition asks the court "to try, ascertain and determine the estate, title, and interest of the parties plaintiff and defendant severally in and to said real property, and to define and adjudge by its judgment or decree the estate, title and rights and interests of the parties plaintiff and defendant, respectively, in and to the same." (Italics ours.) The answer admits that defendant claims to own, and alleges that he does own, the land in controversy, and that plaintiff has no right, title or interest therein. The reply was a general denial. Trial was had before the circuit court of Pemiscot county, without a jury, resulting in a judgment decreeing that plaintiff had no title, interest, or estate in said land, but that the title thereto was in the defendant. Thereupon plaintiff duly appealed to this court.

N. C. Hawkins, of Caruthersville, for appellant.

Ward & Reeves, of Caruthersville, for respondent.

WILLIAMS, P. J. [1] I. The record filed in this court by the appellant does not contain a bill of exceptions. In fact no showing is even made that a bill of exceptions was ever filed. Under such conditions we have nothing before us for review except the record proper.

[2] II. The only point raised upon the record proper is that the court erred in decreeing title to be in defendant when defendant's answer did not contain a prayer so to do.

The statute (section 2535, R. S. 1909), contemplates that in such actions the court will "define and adjudge by its judgment or decree the title, estate and interest of the parties severally in and to such real property." In the case at bar the plaintiff in his petition specifically asked that this be done. Having requested the court to ascertain and adjudge the interest of defendant in said land, he is certainly in no position to criticize the court for so doing. This exact point was ruled against the present contention of appellant in the case of Lumber Co. v. Jones, 220 Mo. 190, loc. cit. 197, 119 S. W. 366, and further discussion is unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

WENZEL et al. v. O'NEAL et al. (No. 19549.)

May 21, 1920.)

1. Tenancy in common §19(2) — Cotenant may acquire title free from trust, where obligation enforced is that of common ancestor.

In the absence of fraud or collusion, a cotenant may buy at either a judicial or mortgage sale, and acquire title free from any trust so far as other cotenants are concerned, in cases where the obligation enforced by the judgment sale or mortgage sale is the obligation cast upon the land by the common ancestor.

2. Tenancy in common §19(4)—in absence of fraud, cotenant purchasing at mortgage sale acquires title free from trust.

Where land is sold under a deed of trust placed upon the land by the common ancestor, a cotenant, after the ancestor's death, may purchase the land at the mortgage sale, and title so acquired is in the purchaser personally, and not as trustee for himself and the other cotenants, there being no fraud, and this is true notwithstanding the purchaser partly paid for the property out of the proceeds of a deed of trust, which, after the sale, he had placed thereon.

3. Mortgages §376 — Trustee making sale under trust deed is liable for distribution of proceeds.

A trustee making a sale under a deed of trust, and not the purchaser at such sale, is liable for the proper distribution of the proceeds among those entitled thereto.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; Guy D. Kirby, Judge.

Suit by George E. Wenzel and others against Belle D. O'Neal and others, to set aside a trustee's sale. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Wright Bros. and Frank B. Williams, both of Springfield, for appellants.

G. G. Lydy, of Springfield, for respondents.

GRAVES, J. In this case we borrow the statement of facts from one of our learned commissioners, as follows:

"This is a suit in equity between the children of Hannah Sabrina Wenzel, deceased, in which plaintiffs seek to set aside the purchase at a trustee's sale by the defendant Belle D. O'Neal of lot 67, Ozark Land Company's addition to Springfield, and to have said lot, and another lot, to wit, lot 68, in said addition, partitioned amongst all of them, in equal shares, as provided by their mother's will. Mrs. Wenzel died June 19, 1914, at the age of 88 years. These two pieces of property constituted her entire estate. She had no personal property. She left no debts, to speak of, except a duebill for $582.20 to her daughter, Mrs. O'Neal, for borrowed money, and a note to Mrs. Barton for $750, secured by a deed of trust on said lot 67. Said lot 67 had a one-story cottage upon it, and was worth $2,500 to $3,000. Said lot 68 had a two-story dwelling house upon it, and was worth about $4,500. She left surviving her six children, the defendants, Emma J. Fitzwater (Buchanan), with whom she resided in Springfield, and Belle D. O'Neal, who then lived in Oklahoma, and the plaintiffs, Clara A. White, of Estancia, N. M., Sarah E. Rohlf, of Jacksonville, Ill., George E. Wenzel, of Chicago, and Ambrose W. Wenzel, who lived in St.

Louis. All attended the funeral except Mrs. White and Ambrose W. Wenzel. After the funeral the will was procured, which made Belle D. O'Neal executrix without bond, and divided Mrs. Wenzel's property equally amongst her six children. The condition of her estate was then discussed, and the existence of the $750 deed of trust and the $582.20 claim of Mrs. O'Neal against her mother was disclosed by Mrs. Fitzwater and Mrs. O'Neal to their brother George and sister Sarah, who made no objection thereto. The former testify they also told George and Sarah that the $750 deed of trust would come due in November, 1914, and that Prof. Calland had notified their mother before her death that it would have to be paid at that time; that George and Mrs. Rohlf promised to do their part toward taking care of the incumbrance, and to notify Ambrose and Mrs. White of it, so they might co-operate. This, however, is denied by them, and, on the other hand, they say that Mrs. O'Neal informed them that the note could run a year or two. Prof. Calland, of Drury College, was the trustee in the deed of trust, and had made the loan to Mrs. Wenzel for Mrs. Barton, who resided at Berkeley, Cal. He had been her general agent in handling her funds for many years, and was, it is fair to assume from the testimony, vested with authority to collect and foreclose deed of trust securing her notes, without special instructions from her. He also had been the agent of Mrs. Wenzel in her lifetime, and as such was in charge of her two pieces of property, which he rented, and from which he collected the rents. Mrs. O'Neal named as executrix, living in Oklahoma, was disqualified, and Emma J. Fitzwater was, in June, 1914, duly appointed executrix in her stead. By mutual agreement between the heirs present at the funeral, and consent and advice of the probate judge, Mrs. Fitzwater was to collect the rents without any order of the probate court, but account for them as executrix. Prof. Calland continued to have charge of the property as before, and collected the rents and paid them over to Mrs. Fitzwater as long as she was executrix, and to Mrs. O'Neal, when she was appointed executrix, which was in April, 1915, when the letters of Mrs. Fitzwater were removed by reason of her marriage to Mr. Buchanan. Mrs. O'Neal had moved to Springfield from Oklahoma at the time of her appointment. Nothing having been done towards meeting the $750 deed of trust, for the purpose of raising money to pay it off, as well as to pay the claim of Mrs. O'Neal, Mrs. Fitzwater, who was then still executrix, on October 29, 1914, executed two notes, in blank as to the payee, one for $582.20, and one for $800, and also executed a deed of trust to secure these notes on said lot 68 instead of lot 67, because the former was the more valuable and the money could more easily be obtained on it as security than upon said lot 67. She sent these notes and deed of trust to her brother George in a letter, which was as follows:

"Springfield, Mo. 10/29/14.

"The note for $750.00 secured by deed of trust against home place is now due with interest and the holder wants her money, hence it becomes necessary to make a new loan. Also as you know sister Belle paid for mother the sum of $582.20 for rebuilding the house in April, 1907. Mother lacked this amount to pay for the improvements and she gave her a duebill for that amount, stating for what purpose it was given, a copy of which is herewith inclosed, and as she can either file this as a claim with interest from 1907 against the estate and have the home sold under the hammer or payment to her for the face value of the duebill will be acceptable to her if paid now.

"We have added this amount with a probable $50.00 for expense for securing the loan to the $750.00, making a total of $1,382.30. For whatever amount less than the $50.00 for expenses we can get the loan it will be credited on the $750.00 note.

"As the time under the laws of Missouri for filing Belle's claim is limited to one year from date of administration, this loan must necessarily be accepted or rejected at once.

"[Signed] From your loving sister, E. J. Fitzwater, administratrix, Springfield, Mo.'

"George Wenzel replied to this letter, saying that the writer refuses to sign the notes and deed of trust above referred to, and that, as for the defendant Belle C. O'Neal having a claim against the estate, the writer had a claim also, as he stated, for money he had sent to his father and mother when they first came to Springfield in the early 80's, which, he said, would amount to around $1,000, and that, if the defendant Belle was going to put in her duebill for $582.20 against the estate, he was going to put in his claim against the estate. In his testimony George Wenzel says he visited Mrs. Rohlf, Christmas, 1914, and showed her Mrs. Fitzwater's letter of October 29, 1914. He says: 'I told her I wouldn't sign any blank deed of trust and notes.' He understood from the letter that the deed of trust sent him to sign was to take up the $750 deed of trust. He also sent Mrs. Rohlf a copy of his letter of May, 1915, to Mrs. Fitzwater above set forth. He refused to sign the notes and deed of trust sent him, because they did not say who they were to be paid to. He consulted a lawyer about them as soon as he received them. He wrote also to his sister Mrs. White and his brother Ambrose, and sent them a copy of Mrs. Fitzwater's letter of October 29, 1914, and of his letter of January, 1915, in reply. He also visited Ambrose in St. Louis in February, 1915, to see him about the blank notes and deed of trust and Mrs. Fitzwater's letter of October 29, 1914. He also sent Mrs. White, Mrs. Rohlf, and Ambrose Wenzel copies of the blank notes and deed of trust.

"Ambrose Wenzel testified that he refused to sign the new papers, because they were in blank, and because they were on lot 68, and the mortgage was on lot 67.

"No notice of the trustee's sale, which occurred June 3, 1915, was sent to plaintiffs by any one, and plaintiffs had no knowledge of the sale until after it was made. Previous to this, on April 24, 1915, the probate court of Greene county allowed Mrs. O'Neal's claim against the estate for $863, being principal and interest, presumably, for a number of years.

"In the meantime, neither of the plaintiffs, up to the time of the sale, made any effort to raise money to pay off the deed of trust, or had any further communication with either of their sisters at Springfield, after George Wenzel's letter of January, 1915, in which he refused to execute the documents sent to him and protested against the claim of his sister Belle.

"Prof. Calland had notified Mrs. O'Neal several times that the note would have to be paid when due, and after the statutory period of nine months from the death of Mrs. Wenzel had expired he wrote Mrs. O'Neal two letters, one dated April 16, 1915, stating that he would advertise the foreclosure on May 2d, unless the note was paid before that time, and one dated May 7, 1915, in which he notified her that he had advertised the sale for June 4, 1915. Prior to this, and after plaintiffs' refusal to sign a new note, Mrs. O'Neal had endeavored to get some one to purchase and carry the $750 note, but was unsuccessful, because the note was past due. After receiving Prof. Calland's letter of April 16, 1915, Mrs. O'Neal telephoned him, 'I guess you will have to sell it; I can't do anything more.'

"The plaintiffs all testified they had no way of raising money to pay off their share of the $750 note, except by mortgaging the property their mother left them, except George Wenzel, who said he had a lot in Chicago Cemetery, on which he could have raised the money to pay his share.

"At the trustee's sale, June 3, 1915, Mrs. O'Neal was the highest bidder for $1,550, the only other bid having been $1,500. Before the sale she had arranged to borrow $1,200 on the property in case she bid it in from the defendant Angie L. Scott, which she did by a deed of trust, in which defendant Wright is trustee. Out of this loan, the next day after the sale, she paid the trustee, Calland, in cash $826, the amount of the note, interest, and costs, and gave him a receipt as administratrix for $724, the surplus of her bid over the debt and costs. Said receipt is as follows:

"Springfield, Mo., June 4, 1915.

"Received of W. C. Calland, trustee in deed of trust given by Hannah S. Wenzel in favor of Mary Barton to secure a note of $750.00, on lot 67 in Ozark Land Company's addition, the sum of $724.00 being the entire difference between the amount of said note of $750.00 and cost of sale, and the amount of my bid for said property, $1,550.00, on foreclosure of said deed of trust. Belle D. O'Neal, Administratrix of the estate of Hannah S. Wenzel, Deceased.'

"She testifies that she kept the balance of the $1,200 loan from Angie L. Scott for her personal use, and that without any order of or report to the probate court she applied the $724, which she receipted for as administratrix to the trustee, upon her claim of $863 against the estate which had then been allowed for that sum. After receiving a trustee's deed under said sale, Mrs. O'Neal claimed to own the property, and collected the rents, amounting to $75, and used them for her own purposes. Prof. Calland continued to act as her agent, and collected the rents for her. In July, 1915, at the instance of plaintiffs, her allowance of $863 by the probate court was set aside and a new trial had, which resulted in its being allowed again. There was an appeal to the circuit court, from thence to the Springfield Court of Appeals. The claim was finally allowed for $582.20, the amount of its face value without interest.

"The court below made a finding of facts, embodying most of the matters we have stated, and expressly found that there was no fraud or collusion between the trustee and Mrs. O'Neal in making said sale, and that said sale was made of his own motion, and was in no way directed, requested, solicited, or under the control of Belle D. O'Neal.

"The court further found that said deed of trust fell due November 1, 1914, and that plaintiffs were aware, as a matter of fact, of the existence thereof, and prior to the trustee's sale had opportunity to pay off the incumbrance or their part thereof, and failed to do so.

"But the court also found that in consequence of the relationship between the plaintiffs and Mrs. O'Neal, as cotenants, and that she was executrix of the estate at the time of the trustee's sale, she became trustee for all the heirs and devisees, and holds title to said lot 67 as such trustee.

"There was accordingly a decree entered for plaintiffs as prayed in their petition, and the defendants appealed to this court."

I. In this case Belle D. O'Neal was a cotenant and an administratrix, and a confusion of this situation has led the trial court to go wrong in our judgment. It must not be overlooked that the mortgage debt upon this property was placed there by the ancestor of all these cotenants.

[1] I think this court has squarely ruled that, absent fraud or collusion, a cotenant can buy at either a judicial or mortgage sale, and acquire a title free from any trust, so far as other cotenants are concerned, in cases where the obligation enforced by the judgment sale, or mortgage sale, is the obligation cast upon the land by the common ancestor. We so ruled in Becker v. Becker, 254 Mo. loc. cit. 680, 681, 683, 163 S. W. 865. At page 683 of 254 Mo., at page 869 of 163 S. W., Walker, J., said:

"There was no semblance of fraud or even unfairness in the conduct of the defendant in this transaction. The foreclosure of the deed of trust was made, not on his initiative, but by the holder of the note [the St. Paul Benevolent Society] after a four-year default in the payment of interest. Formal notice was given as required by the deed, and the property was sold at a public sale free and open to all bidders. Under this state of facts, it is straining the rule to hold that the purchase of the property by the defendant was in trust for the plaintiff to the extent of his interest."

It is true that Judge Walker does assign another reason why no trust should be declared in that case, but the opinion (one in banc) was fully concurred in by the full bench, and had any member of the court desired to disown the doctrine stated, his concurrence would have been explicit and special, or would have been a concurrence in the result. Not only so, but in Dudgeon et al. v. Hackley et al., 182 S. W. loc. cit. 1007, this court in banc again approved the Becker Case, supra, with but one dissent, which will be noted later. We also approved what was said by Mr. Justice Lurton in Starkweather v. Jenner, 216 U. S. loc. cit. 523, 30 Sup. Ct. 382, 54 L. Ed. 602, 17 Ann. Cas. 1167. This Starkweather Case was one growing out of a sale under a deed of trust. In this case Mr. Justice Lurton says:

"But it is plain that the principle which turns a cotenant into a trustee who buys for himself a hostile outstanding title can have no proper application to a public sale of the common property, either under legal process or a power in a trust deed. In such a situation, the sale not being in any wise the result of collusion nor subject to the control of such a bidder, he is as free, all deceit and fraud out of the way, as any one of the general public."

Regardless as to what may have heretofore been written, this, we think, is the reasonable rule. It stands conceded that, in cases of this character, had the sale been a judicial sale for the payment of the ancestor's debts, the cotenant could have purchased at such a sale. Had the deed of trust been foreclosed by a judgment of a court in this case, such judicial sale would have given the cotenant the unrestricted right to purchase. Why not the same right under an authorized public sale under a deed of trust, executed by the common ancestor? It may be urged that at the judicial sale the court can control the fairness of such sales, but equity will likewise control the sale under the deed of trust if there is any fraud or collusion. We can see no substantial reason for a different rule in the two classes of cases. Under our more recent rulings, and under the ruling of Mr. Justice Lurton, supra, we think that Mrs. O'Neal had the right to purchase at this sale, and absent fraud or collusion, her purchase gave her a title clear of any trust.

[2] II. We cannot concur in the view urged, to the effect that the other cotenants have an interest in the lot sold under the deed of trust. Mrs. O'Neal had the right to purchase at that sale, and, when she did so purchase, the title was in her, and not in her as a trustee for herself and the other cotenants. Absent positive fraud, this is the rule.

[3] She partly paid for the property, it is true, out of the proceeds of a deed of trust, which, after the sale, she placed thereon. But this does not change the situation. If at the sale the property became hers, then the money paid to her upon the deed of trust became and was hers. The money arising from the sale (all of it) was due the trustee in the deed of trust. This trustee was bound: First, to pay off the note secured by the deed of trust; and, second, to pay the remainder to the parties entitled thereto. The trustee making the sale is and was liable for the proper distribution of the proceeds. If he wrongfully applied the funds, to the damage of the cotenants, he is the party to whom they should look. If by paying it to the administratrix of the estate he paid to the proper party, he is released of liability, otherwise not.

If the sale gave Mrs. O'Neal a good title, as our case law holds, then the proceeds of a deed of trust placed upon the property was her money. She invested none of the heirs' money in the property. If she did not fully pay the trustee, Calland, that is not a matter within the issues here. This was a matter between her and the trustee. And, on the other hand, if Calland paid the money to the wrong party, such is not an issue here. That is to say, if by direct act or by indirection, he paid the money to Mrs. O'Neal as administratrix, and not to her personally, the situation of the heirs is not changed. The heirs have to look to the trustee of the deed of trust. He is the party that received their money. And, further, if Mrs. O'Neal properly got the surplus as money belonging to the estate (if it did so belong), she would be liable for any misapplication of it, and her bond would have to respond, if she did not.

As to the proceeds of a deed of trust, our late Brother Bond spoke in his dissenting opinion in Dudgeon v. Hackley, 182 S. W. loc. cit. 1007. This dissenting opinion was prepared as an original opinion in the division, and revamped and made a dissent in the court in banc. The ruling there is especially in point, because our late learned Brother tried to make a trust estate out of the fact that the purchaser had paid for the property by a deed of trust on the property after the sale. This court did not take that view of it, and rejected Brother Bond's views.

In concluding we rule that Mrs. O'Neal got full title to the property sold by Calland, the trustee, and that as to such property she is the owner now, subject only to her deed of trust, that the other heirs have no interest therein, for these reasons the judgment nisi should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree not in conflict with these views.

STATE v. NASH et al. (No. 21922.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

Indictment and Information ¶110(12)—Information charging disturbance of religious worship held sufficient.

Information for disturbing a congregation of people met for religious worship, charging a misdemeanor in the language of Rev. St. 1909, § 4713, held sufficient.

Case certified from St. Louis Court of Appeals.

Ed. Nash and another were convicted of disturbing a congregation of people met for religious worship. A conviction was affirmed by the Court of Appeals (216 S. W. 1004), and the case certified to the Supreme Court. Affirmed.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and O. P. Le Mire, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMS, P. J. Upon an information charging them with disturbing a congregation of people met for religious worship, defendants were tried in the circuit court of Christian county, found guilty, and each fined the sum of $1.

Thereupon defendants duly appealed to the Springfield Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment. The opinion therein will be found reported in State v. Ladd, 216 S. W. 1004. The case was certified here on the ground that the opinion therein conflicted with certain opinions of the St. Louis Court of Appeals and the Kansas City Court of Appeals.

The only question involved is as to the sufficiency of the information, which, omitting formal parts, is as follows:

"William L. Vandeventer, prosecuting attorney within and for the county of Christian, in the state of Missouri, informs the court upon his official oath, that Dewey Ladd, Clarence Smith, Ed Nash, and Dutch Forgey, on or about the 16th day of March, 1919, in the said county of Christian, in the state of Missouri, did theb and there unlawfully, willfully, maliciously, and contemptuously disturb and disquiet a congregation of people then and there met for religious worship, by then and there making a loud noise, and by rude and indecent behavior within their place of worship and so near the same as to disturb the order and solemnity of the meeting, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the state.

"William L. Vandeventer, Prosecuting Attorney."

It will be noted that the above information charges a misdemeanor and is in the language of the statute. Section 4713, R. S. 1909.

We are of the opinion that the information is sufficient. State v. Stubblefield, 32 Mo. 563.

The matter has been fully and ably discussed by our learned brethren on the Court of Appeals, each judge thereof having written an opinion thereon. Every phase of the subject will be found fully treated therein. We fully concur with the views expressed in the majority opinion by Farrington, J., and in the separate concurring opinion by Sturgis, P. J., and for that reason further discussion here is deemed unnecessary. For the reasons therein stated, we affirm the judgment.

STATE v. EBBELLER. (No. 21887.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Receiving stolen goods ¶3—Guilty knowledge must be tested by actual belief of defendant, and not by what a reasonably prudent person would believe.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, an instruction, permitting a conviction if the facts were such as would have caused a reasonably prudent person exercising ordinary caution to have believed that the property had been stolen at the time received was erroneous, since the test is as to the actual belief of defendant.

2. Receiving stolen goods ¶3—Elements of offense stated.

In a prosecution for receiving a stolen automobile, conviction may be had on a finding that the automobile had been stolen, and that defendant received it knowing it to have been stolen; further intent not being required.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Charles B. Davis, Judge.

Frank Ebbeller was convicted of knowingly receiving a stolen automobile, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Upon an indictment charging him with receiving a stolen automobile knowing the same to have been stolen, defendant was convicted in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, and his punishment fixed at two years' imprisonment.

In appellant's brief no point is raised as to the sufficiency of the evidence. Only two errors are assigned, and they have to do with the giving of instructions. Such facts as are necessary to an understanding of the issues presented will be stated in the course of the opinion.

Thos. B. Harvey, of St. Louis, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and George V. Berry, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMS, P. J. I. The court's instruction No. 2, which is attacked by appellant, is as follows:

"By the term 'knowing' that the property was stolen is not meant absolute personal and certain knowledge on the part of the defendant that the property mentioned in the indictment had been stolen, but such knowledge and information in his possession at the time he received the same, if you believe he did receive it, as would put a reasonably prudent man, exercising ordinary caution, on his guard, and would cause such a man exercising such caution, and under circumstances which you believe defendant received the property, to believe and be satisfied that the property had been stolen.

"The mere naked fact of the possession of said property by the defendant raises no presumption that the defendant knew that said property had been stolen by another."

It is contended that the above instruction is erroneous, in that it permits a conviction, even though the defendant may not have had guilty knowledge that the property had been stolen.

It will be noticed that the instruction does permit a conviction if the facts were such as (in the opinion of the jury) would have caused a reasonably prudent person, exercising ordinary caution, to have believed that the property had been stolen at the time received.

[1] We are inclined to the view that this point is well taken, and that the learned attorney representing the appellant is correct in stating that—

"The question is not what some other person would have believed and known from the circumstances attending the receipt of the property, but what did this defendant believe and know."

In the case of Kasle v. United States, 233 Fed. 878, 147 C. C. A. 552, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, had before it this identical question. The language used in condemning a like instruction is so clear and concise that we feel justified in quoting the following excerpt therefrom:

"Plainly such tests as these of guilty knowledge on the part of the accused subjected him to a standard of conduct and of capacity to detect crime, which the jury might conclude to be the standard of reasonable and honest men of average intelligence, when acting under circumstances like those which might be found to have existed here. The effect of such test was to charge the accused with guilty knowledge or not upon what the jury might find would have induced belief in the mind of a man such as they were told to consider, rather than the belief that was actually created in the mind of the accused; or, at last, the accused might be condemned even if his only fault consisted in being less cautious or suspicious than honest men of average intelligence are of the acts of others. The result of the rule of the charge would be to convict a man, not because guilty, but because stupid. The issue was whether the accused had knowledge—not whether some other person would have obtained knowledge—that the goods had been stolen. The circumstances must have had that effect upon the mind of the accused, to constitute knowledge in him. The issue must be determined upon the individual test of the accused. It may well be that the tests stated in the charge are proper enough to fix civil liability for the acts or omissions of a defendant, but hardly to fasten upon him an intent to commit a felony. There is some conflict in the decisions upon this subject, but we think the tests of the charge are opposed to the clear weight of authority. This may be fairly illustrated by the following: State v. Alpert, 88 Vt. 191, 204, 92 Atl. 32; Peterson v. United States, 213 Fed. 920, 922, 923, 130 C. C. A. 398 [C. C. A. 9]; State v. Rountree, 80 S. C. 387, 391, 61 S. E. 1072, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 833; State v. Daniels, 80 S. C. 368, 371, 61 S. E. 1073; State v. Goldman, 65 N. J. Law, 395, 397, 47 Atl. 641; Cohn v. People, 197 Ill. 482, 485, 64 N. E. 306; Robinson v. State, 84 Ind. 452, 456; State v. Denny, 17 N. D. 519, 525, 526, 117 N. W. 869; Forrester v. State, 69 Tex. Cr. R. 62, 152 S. W. 1041, 1042; Pickering v. United States, 2 Okl. Cr. 197, 101 Pac. 123, 124; Drummond v. State, 103 Miss. 221, 224, 60 South. 138." 233 Fed. 887, 147 C. C. A. loc. cit. 561.

Further discussion or citation of authority is, we think, entirely unnecessary to establish clearly the grave error which this instruction contains, but in passing it is necessary that we refer to some former decisions of this court which might be thought to indicate a contrary view.

In support of his contention that the instruction is proper, the learned Attorney General cites State v. Cohen, 254 Mo. 437, loc. cit. 457, 162 S. W. 216, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 86; State v. Weinberg, 245 Mo. 584, loc. cit. 570, 150 S. W. 1069; State v. Sakowski, 191 Mo. 635, loc. cit. 643, 90 S. W. 435, 4 Ann. Cas. 751; State v. Kosky, 191 Mo. 1, loc. cit. 6, 90 S. W. 454.

A mere reference to State v. Cohen will disclose that the case is nowise in point. Neither is the case of State v. Weinberg, supra. In the latter case the point under discussion was the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. This is also true of the case of State v. Richmond, 186 Mo. 71, 84 S. W. 880, which is cited in the Weinberg Case.

The question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support a verdict is an entirely different proposition from the one now involved in the instruction under review. There might be sufficient evidence to sustain a conviction, and yet the jury might not believe it, or might not draw therefrom the necessary inference of fact which forms the basis of a conviction. The facts which the instruction in the case at bar requires to be found are at best nothing more than facts from which the ultimate and necessary fact of guilty knowledge might be inferred. The instruction relieves the jury of finding or inferring this ultimate fact which is necessary for them to find before convicting the defendant.

In the case of State v. Sakowski, supra, an instruction similar to the one under review is found copied on page 643 of that opinion, together with numerous other instructions. Why the instruction is so copied is not apparent. No point seems to have been made concerning this instruction, and no discussion concerning the same is to be found in the opinion. It appears to have at one time been the practice in this court to copy all of the instructions in a case into the statement of facts, even though no point was raised concerning the instruction. This practice, now long since discontinued, has undoubtedly been the source of much confusion among the members of the bar, who in many instances have drawn the conclusion that since an instruction was copied into the statement and not condemned by the opinion therefore it must have been approved by the court. There is no justification, however, for such a conclusion, and no one is warranted in assuming that the court has passed upon anything other than the matters discussed in the opinion. This case then should not be considered as in point.

In the case of State v. Kosky, supra, an instruction almost identical with the one under review is found copied on page 6 of said opinion in 191 Mo. (90 S. W. 455). On page 17 of the opinion in 191 Mo. (90 S. W. 459) we find this language, to wit:

"The instructions, as applicable to the first count in the information, are free from objection."

It thus appears that the question did not receive specific attention or discussion at that time, and we doubt very much if the question now presented was at that time called to the attention of the court. This is the only opinion of this court which we have been able to find which in any manner undertakes to approve the instruction. In so far as this case undertakes to approve the instruction under review, it is hereby expressly overruled.

[2] II. Appellant further contends that the instructions given failed to require the finding of a criminal intent. We are unable to agree with this contention. Instruction 1 required the jury to find that the automobile had been stolen, and that defendant received the car knowing the same to have been stolen. Under the well-settled rule in this state the above requirements constitute the gravamen of the crime, and further intent is not required. State v. Cohen, 254 Mo. 437, loc. cit. 452, 162 S. W. 216, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 86, and cases therein cited.

Because of the error discussed in paragraph I above, it follows that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded. It is so ordered.

FOREST LUMBER CO. v. OSCEOLA LEAD & ZINC MINING CO. (No. 19893.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1. June 2, 1920.)

1. Judgment \S 501—Not vulnerable to collateral attack because of error in decision.

None of the defenses against the judgment rendered, including an objection to the constitutionality of a statute, which might have been urged, and which the court had jurisdiction to decide, remained open for consideration in a later case where the validity of the judgment was assailed; for erroneous decision does not render a judgment subject to collateral attack.

2. Judgment \S 334—Writ of error coram nobis lies only in court where judgment rendered.

The writ of error coram nobis lies only in the court where an erroneous judgment has been rendered because of a mistake of fact of which the court was not informed, and, since superior courts do not try the facts in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction, the Supreme Court has no power, on such writ, to set aside a judgment of the circuit court on the ground that its judgment was based on a mistaken belief that the judgment of another circuit court on which the parties' rights depended was a final one.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; J. D. Perkins, Judge.

Action by the Forest Lumber Company against the Osceola Lead & Zinc Mining Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

George V. Farris, of Joplin, for appellant.
H. S. Miller, of Webb City, for respondent.

GOODE, J. This action was filed to recover from the defendant damages caused to plaintiff by the act of defendant in removing from leasehold premises in Newton county articles of personal property against which plaintiff held a lien for labor and material. Both of the parties to the action are business corporations. The property involved consisted of two steam boilers, an engine, and other pieces of machinery and appliances used in carrying on lead and zinc mining. The lien of the plaintiff on these articles was filed against the Sleepy Hollow Mining & Development Company, another corporation which was engaged in mining in Newton county. The articles of machinery and equipment the plaintiff held a lien on had been located in Jasper county before the lien claim was filed and before the work and material were done and furnished for which a lien was asserted, and had been taken from Jasper county to Newton county by the Sleepy Hollow Company after it had acquired the title to them by purchase from their original owner, the Leroy Mining Company. To secure payment of the purchase price, or part of it, the Sleepy Hollow Company gave a deed of trust in the nature of a chattel mortgage on the articles to J. T. Todd, as trustee for the Leroy Mining Company. The purchase by the Sleepy Hollow Company occurred October 21, 1913. On February 23, 1914, after the Sleepy Hollow Company had moved the property to Newton county, the deed of trust on it was recorded in that county; and it was in Newton county that the plaintiff, the Forest Lumber Company, did work and furnished material for the housing of the articles in frame buildings, we understand, and perhaps did other work to prepare them for use in the mine of the Sleepy Hollow Company in Newton county. They were located on leased premises, but we need not describe the premises.

The lien claim or statement of the Forest Lumber Company was filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Newton county January 22, 1914, and on the same day said company, the present plaintiff, filed a suit in said court to establish its lien against the property in controversy. On a day not stated, in May, 1914, said property was sold under the aforesaid chattel mortgage or deed of trust and bought by Amos Hatton, not for himself, but for the Osceola Lead & Zinc Mining Company (this defendant), of which he was the president. Said articles of property were detached from their place in the Newton county mining plant and transferred by the defendant back to Jasper county. This was done after the plaintiff's lien statement was on file in the office of the circuit court of Newton county and after an action to enforce it had been begun. Lien statements were filed by other claimants against the property, to wit, by the United Iron Works, a corporation, and the Yoder-Becker Company, a corporation, and an action was brought to enforce the lien of the Yoder-Becker Company. On or about May 23, 1914, said United Iron Works filed a suit in equity, as provided by the statutes of this state, in the circuit court of Newton county, to which all persons and parties claiming a lien or any kind of interest in said property were made defendants, and the action previously brought by the Yoder-Becker Company to establish its lien was consolidated with said equitable proceeding. On June 8, 1915, the United Iron Works, the plaintiff in said equity suit, dismissed its suit to establish its lien against the Sleepy Hollow Company, to which, as stated, all the other persons, including the Osceola Lead & Zinc Mining Company, claiming liens or any kind of interest in the controversy, were parties, and in the order of dismissal it was considered and adjudged "that the defendants go hence without day and have and recover of and from the plaintiff the costs of this action and that execution issue therefor." On June 10, 1915, two days later, plaintiff, the Forest Lumber Company, filed a motion to set aside the order of dismissal, presumably on the ground that the Forest Lumber Company had a right to have its lien enforced in the suit in equity, and that the dismissal of the case by the United Iron Works, as far as it was concerned, did not involve, necessarily, the dismissal of the case as an entirety, but that the other lienors had the right to have their liens established. This motion was sustained, the judgment of dismissal was set aside, and the suit in equity then went on to a judgment in favor of the Forest Lumber Company, the present plaintiff, enforcing its lien against the articles in controversy and giving the lien priority over the deed of trust under which the Osceola Lead & Zinc Mining Company, the defendant, had acquired title by purchase at the trustee's sale.

The present action, as stated before, was instituted by the Forest Lumber Company to recover from the defendant the damages suffered by the plaintiff in consequence of the removal of the property to Jasper county by the defendant while plaintiff held a lien against it, and while the suit was pending in which said lien was finally decreed to be prior in point of time to that of the deed of trust. The case went to trial in the circuit court of Jasper county, at Joplin, at the April term, 1916, and resulted in a judgment rendered May 22, 1916, in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $895.45 damages, against the defendant. Within four days a motion for new trial was filed and, that motion having been overruled, this appeal was prosecuted from the judgment.

From the statement it will be gathered that plaintiff founded its cause of action on the adjudged priority of its lien to the deed of trust under which the defendant purchased and removed the property, pending a suit to enforce the lien. In a decision given November 20, 1916, said judgment of the Newton circuit court was reversed by the Springfield Court of Appeals, whither the case had gone on a writ of error. The cause for the reversal was that the Newton circuit court had discharged the defendants without day when the United Iron Works dismissed its suit, had afterwards reinstated said cause against all the defendants, including the defendant in the present case, and had rendered judgment without further notice to this defendant and when it had no reason to anticipate further proceedings being taken in the case. Forest Lumber Co. v. Hatten, 189 S. W. 625. Afterwards said suit to enforce plaintiff's lien was tried a second time, with the result that the court decreed the deed of trust under which defendant acquired title to the property was a lien prior to the plaintiff's lien, and that defendant's title was good against plaintiff's lien, which judgment was affirmed by the Springfield Court of Appeals. United Iron Works Co. v. Sleepy Hollow Mining & Development Co., 198 Mo. App. 562, 198 S. W. 443.

The facts we have stated regarding the reversal by the Springfield Court of Appeals of the judgment of the Newton circuit court in the equity case, of the subsequent retrial of said case, and of the decision in it that defendant's title was superior to the lien of plaintiff, are not shown in the record of the present appeal, but in the petition or motion of defendant filed herein for the writ of error coram nobis to be presently mentioned.

It looks like the defendant possessed a complete defense to the present case of the plaintiff to recover damages for the removal of the property to Jasper county while plaintiff had a lien which had been given precedence over defendant's title, when, in truth, as it turned out, plaintiff's lien was subordinate to defendant's title. But that defense was not interposed in this action, and until the motion for new trial was filed the lower court's attention was not called to the fact that the judgment of the Newton circuit court was not final, but had been carried up to the Springfield Court of Appeals by writ of error. Nothing was said about it in the answer to plaintiff's petition; but, instead, the defendant averred the judgment given by the Newton circuit court upon plaintiff's lien was void and of no effect, for the reason that it was obtained under the provisions of the Mechanic's Lien Act of 1911, and that this act was unconstitutional, in that it deprived persons of their property without due process of law, and was a local or special law regarding liens which contravened subsection 1 of section 53 of article 4 of our state Constitution. Laws 1911, p. 312. The answer then went on to state the facts regarding the giving of the deed of trust on the property by the Sleepy Hollow Company while the property was still in Jasper county and the purchase by defendant thereunder, the judgment of dismissal of the equity suit, and its reinstatement without notice to defendant—defenses which had been passed on and adjudicated in the equity suit in the Newton circuit court, or could have been if asserted by the defendant.

[1] None of those defenses remained open for consideration in the present case; for the constitutional question, even if defendant's contention regarding it is sound, as to which we say nothing, was one which the Newton circuit court had the right to decide; and an erroneous decision upon it would not render the judgment void and subject to collateral attack. The proper course for the defendant to have pursued to correct the error of the Newton circuit court, if one was committed, was to take the cause to the proper court of review by appeal or writ of error. State v. Rich, 20 Mo. 393, 395; State v. York, 22 Mo. 465. And, as already stated, the cause was taken to the Springfield Court of Appeals by writ of error, but unfortunately that fact was not set up by way of defense to the present action. Manifestly the judgment of a court cannot be treated as a nullity in a collateral proceeding merely because the judgment was given on an unconstitutional statute. In such a case the judgment would be valid until reversed or set aside, whether the decision of the point was right or wrong.

[2] It may be that appellant's counsel has concluded the validity of the first judgment of the Newton circuit court in the equity suit cannot be attacked in this case for reasons going to the constitutionality of the Mechanic's Lien Act of 1911, for no brief or assignment of errors has been filed on the merits of the present appeal. Instead of presenting the merits for decision, the defendant filed a petition in this court for what is denominated therein a writ of error coram nobis to set aside the judgment of the Jasper circuit court in the present case, for the reason the judgment of the Newton circuit court, which is the foundation of plaintiff's cause of action in this case, had been reversed by the Springfield Court of Appeals. Said petition was filed after the appeal had been lodged here and on the day it was set down for a hearing. The petition should have been addressed to the court in which the judgment was rendered, and will not lie here. Although the common writ of error which is sued out to have a judgment reversed for an erroneous decision on a point of law runs from the court of review to the trial court, the writ of error coram nobis lies only in the court where an erroneous judgment has been rendered in consequence of a mistake of fact of which the court was not informed. The purpose of the writ is to make known the error of fact and thereby enable the court to vacate the erroneous judgment. In the exercise of appellate jurisdiction in legal actions superior courts do not try the facts, and relief against an error of fact must be obtained in the court where it occurred. We have no power to grant a writ to set aside the judgment of the Jasper circuit court upon the ground that its judgment was based on a mistaken belief that the judgment of the Newton circuit court was a final one. Roughton v. Brown, 53 N. C. 393.

We think the best way to dispose of the petition of the defendant for the writ it has prayed is to dismiss the same without prejudice and without any intimation as to the merits of the application.

As the defendant has filed no assignments of error or brief in the case, as required by our rules, its appeal should be dismissed. It is so ordered.

BOEHNGEN et al. v. JANTZEN et al.
(No. 21946.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

Appeal and error \Leftarrow 1009(3) — Conclusions reached by trial court in equity action deferred to.

Where testimony in an equity case was exceedingly contradictory and largely given by witnesses who testified in person before the court, the Supreme Court will defer somewhat to the conclusions reached by the trial court.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court;
Thomas C. Hennings, Judge.

Bill by William A. Soehngen against John Joseph Jantzen and others. Plaintiff dying after commencement of action, it was revived in the name of Gerald Soehngen, administrator of plaintiff's estate, and others as heirs. Decree for plaintiffs and defendants appeal. Affirmed, and remanded for enforcement of decree.

See, also (App.) 218 S. W. 423.

On September 29, 1916, William A. Soehngen filed in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, Mo., a bill in equity against above-named defendants, alleging therein that he was the owner and entitled to the possession of the real estate in controversy and described in petition; that he derived his title thereto through a sheriff's deed made pursuant to an execution sale under a decree in favor of plaintiff in the case of William Soehngen v. John Joseph Jantzen, numbered 82106 in the circuit court aforesaid; that after the filing of said suit numbered 82106 on November 16, 1912, to wit, on January 13, 1913, defendants John Joseph Jantzen and Emma Jantzen, his wife, fraudulently placed a deed of trust on said property to secure a $2,500 note, for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff, etc. The purpose of this suit was to declare plaintiff the owner of said property; to cancel said deed of trust; to put him in possession of said property; to have a decree entered reciting that said Emma Jantzen has no inchoate right of dower in said property; to restrain foreclosure proceedings under said deed of trust; to recover damages, etc.; and asking for general relief.

After the commencement of this action, plaintiff died, and it was revived in the name of his legal representative and heirs.

Defendants filed a joint amended answer herein, containing a general denial. It further alleges that the sheriff's deed to plaintiff aforesaid was without consideration, or, if there was any consideration, the same has failed. They accordingly prayed that said sheriff's deed to plaintiff dated September 11, 1916, be canceled, etc.

The answer, after describing said $2,500 note and coupons attached, secured by the deed of trust aforesaid, alleges that, with the knowledge of plaintiff, said notes were negotiated by defendants, in order to raise money to pay bequests under the last will and testament of Margaretha Jantzen amounting to $1,910, as well as securing additional moneys with which to pay a judgment in favor of Anna Weber, sister of plaintiff, for $632, etc.; that plaintiff stood by without objection, knowing that defendants were negotiating said note and deed of trust as aforesaid, and after said loan was perfected accepted his portion of the bequests specified in said will, etc.; that by reason of foregoing plaintiff is estopped from attacking the validity of said deed of trust. It is further alleged in said answer that said deed of trust was foreclosed on October 19, 1916, and at said foreclosure sale John A. Hurster purchased the real estate aforesaid, free from the lien of the judgment rendered in said cause 82106, division No. 7 of the circuit court aforesaid; that said execution sale and sheriff's deed cast a cloud upon the title to said real estate which they ask to have removed, etc.

The case was tried as though a reply, with a general denial, had been filed, and will be disposed of here accordingly.

To prevent repetition, we will consider the evidence and rulings of the trial court, as far as necessary, in the opinion.

The court below found the issues in favor of respondents, and entered its decree accordingly. Appellants filed their joint motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the cause duly appealed by them to this court.

T. O. Stokes and Taylor R. Young, both of St. Louis, and T. T. Hinde, of Madison City, Ill., for appellants.

Jos. C. McAtee, of Clayton, for respondents.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The motion for a new trial filed herein by defendants contains but three assignments of error, as follows:

"First. The judgment and decree of the court is against the law.

"Second. The judgment and decree of the court is against the evidence.

"Third. The judgment and decree of the court is against the law, the evidence, the law under the evidence, and the great weight of the evidence."

It will be observed that no complaint is made in respect to the admission or rejection of testimony by the court. The case will accordingly be disposed of here upon the above assignments of error.

2. It appears from the record that William Soehngen, the original plaintiff herein, now deceased, was the son of Margaretha Jantzen, who died testate in 1910. Defendant Joseph Jantzen was the second husband of said Margaretha, and stepfather of said William Soehngen. On August 30, 1910, said Margaretha Jantzen executed a will in which, after making provisions for certain legatees, she gave all the residue of her property to said defendant Joseph Jantzen, and named him as her executor without bond.

Defendants upon cross-examination of Mr. Joseph C. McAtee proved by him that the case of Wm. Soehngen v. Joseph Jantzen (No. 82106) was filed November 18, 1912.

Upon a trial of above case in the circuit court aforesaid the following judgment was entered:

"It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the defendant holds the above-described premises as a trustee ex maleficio for and in favor of the plaintiff, to the extent and fractional part that the sum of $500 bears to the entire value of the said property, and holds the same upon a constructive trust for the use and benefit of the plaintiff as the owner of an equitable estate in fee therein, and that the title of the defendant in and to the above-described premises should be and is hereby divested out of him and vested in plaintiff to the extent of said fractional part, and that the ratio of said fractional part should be and is hereby ordered determined by the actual sale price of said property when sold, that said above-described premises should be and are hereby ordered sold by the sheriff of the city of St. Louis in the manner provided by law for the holding of judicial sales, and that said sheriff report the result of said sale to this court for its approval.

"It is further ordered that the costs of this proceeding be and are hereby adjudged against the defendant, for which let execution issue."

The above judgment was affirmed by the St. Louis Court of Appeals (186 S. W. 1109, 1110). Thereafter said real estate was sold under the decree of the circuit court aforesaid. The plaintiff therein purchased said real estate at the execution sale under the decree aforesaid for $650, and the sheriff made him a deed to said property. Defendant's attorney announced at said sale that whoever bought would take the property subject to said $2,500 deed of trust and hence no one else bid on the property at said sale. The sheriff's deed recites that said $650 was paid by said plaintiff.

Without pursuing this branch of the case further, we are satisfied from the record before us that said William Soehngen, by virtue of the sheriff's deed aforesaid, acquired a good title to the property in controversy, unless the $2,500 deed of trust was valid, and became a prior lien on said property to the judgment rendered in case 82106, supra.

3. The testimony relating to the validity of the $2,500 note and deed of trust securing same is exceedingly contradictory, and largely given by witnesses who testified in person before the court. We will therefore defer somewhat to the conclusions reached by the trial court in respect to this matter. Coal Co. v. Halderman, 254 Mo. 596, 163 S. W. 828; Robbins v. Robbins, 258 Mo. 175, 167 S. W. 502; Henderson v. Henderson, 265 Mo. loc. cit. 733, 178 S. W. 175; Price v. Rausche, 186 S. W. 968.

We hereby adopt as our own that part of the trial court's decree as follows:

"The court finds that in reality and fact neither the sum of $2,500 or any part thereof was paid for said notes and deed of trust, and that the defendant John Joseph Jantzen did not receive same; that said notes and deed of trust were made, executed, and recorded for the purpose of hindering, defeating, and defrauding plaintiff of the rights asserted by him in the petition filed in case No. 82106 and of the judgment obtained by him thereunder; that for this purpose the defendants John Joseph Jantzen and Emma Jantzen, his wife, conspired and confederated together to execute and record said notes and deed of trust, and that said notes and deed of trust have always been and are now in their possession; that defendants and each of them had full notice at all times and before the execution of said notes and deed of trust of plaintiffs' claim and interest in and to said property, but regardless of the same wrongfully attempted to defraud the said William A. Soehngen of his right in and to the same by incumbering the said premises hereinabove described as aforesaid; that they are now wrongfully withholding possession of said property from plaintiff, to his damage in the sum of $120; and that the reasonable value of the rents and profits of said premises is $20 per month.

"The court further finds that the defendants Pegram and Hill are and were without interest in the said notes and deed of trust; that neither of them parted with any property or money in the premises, but were used by their co-defendants merely as straw men or dummy instrumentalities as the conduit by which the said fraudulent scheme was furthered; that the defendant Hill, as trustee, attempted to advertise and sell the said above-described premises under said deed of trust on October 19, 1916, and that he should be enjoined from attempting to further execute any of the duties of trustee and of attempting to deliver any title under and by virtue of the said deed of trust, and that said attempted sale as conducted by him upon the said 19th day of October was void and of no force and effect; that the recorded deed of trust hereinbefore referred to constitutes and is a cloud upon the title of plaintiffs, and that the said deed of trust should be and hereby is adjudged void and of no force and effect and ordered canceled of record, and that plaintiffs should be adjudged the legal owners of the said above-described property free and clear of any incumbrance done or suffered by defendants; that they should be placed in and restored to the possession of said property; that the said Emma Jantzen should be declared dowerless in the premises, and defendants restrained from proceeding with the sale of said property under the said deed of trust; that plaintiffs should be awarded damages in the sum of $120 and the monthly rents and profits of said property be fixed at $20; and that plaintiffs should recover their costs against defendants.

"It is therefore adjudged and decreed that plaintiffs are the legal owners of the premises hereinabove described, free and clear of any incumbrance done or suffered by defendants, and that the plaintiffs be placed in and restored to the possession of said property by the sheriff of the city of St. Louis; that the deed of trust of record in Book 2592, page 551, of the office of the recorder of deeds of the city of St. Louis be and hereby is canceled and extinguished of record; that the said Emma Jantzen be and is hereby declared dowerless in the premises; that defendants be and hereby are restrained from proceeding with the sale of said property under said deed of trust; that the plaintiffs be and hereby are awarded damages in the sum of $120, and the monthly rents and profits of said premises be and hereby are fixed at $20 per month; and that plaintiffs recover their costs against defendants and execution issue therefor."

After carefully reading the record the second time, we are well satisfied with the foregoing conclusions of the lower court. The defendant Joseph Jantzen received, as executor, $2,150.69, which was more than enough to pay the legacies provided for in his wife's will. He not only appears to have squandered this money, but forced his wife's children to litigate through the various courts to collect the small trusts declared in their favor while he is still in possession of said property.

The judgment below is affirmed, and the cause remanded, in order that the trial court may take such steps to enforce its decree as may be deemed advisable.

WHITE and MOZLEY, CC, concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of RAILEY, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

All concur.

SAME v. CONNOLLY et al.

(Nos. 21130, 21131, 21426.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
April 10, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 2, 1920.)

1. Life estates §20 — Remaindermen held bound by accepting benefits of agreement of life beneficiary as to interest.

Where after the death of the trustee who had dissipated the trust fund his widow and son made good the same, giving notes for the amount to the life beneficiary, remaindermen who asserted rights in the notes are bound by the beneficiary's agreement on receiving partial payment as to the interest which should be paid.

2. Trusts §382 — Heirs and surety of trustee held discharged by beneficiary's acceptance of payment.

Where on death of trustee who had dissipated the trust fund his son and his widow gave notes for the amount of the fund, and there was no contention of mistake as to the amount, remaindermen who accepted a note as well as payment to the life beneficiary, who was deemed by the parties entitled to the entire fund, cannot assert any liability against the trustee's heirs or his surety.

3. Trusts §168 — Where trustee dissipated trust fund, his heirs cannot be deemed the successors as trustees.

Where trustee dissipated trust fund, his heirs were not his successors as trustee, for there was no fund to devolve upon them.

4. Trusts §244 — Where trust consisted of personal property, it passes on death of trustee to his administrator.

Where the trust fund was personal property, it would pass on death of trustee to his administrator as bailee, and not to the trustee's heirs.

5. Trusts §315(1) — Son of trustee not entitled to compensation for preserving or restoring trust fund.

Where the widow and son of a trustee who had dissipated a fund gave their notes for the amount thereof and voluntarily turned them over to the life beneficiary, held that, as they were not successors of the trustee, and having voluntarily surrendered the notes, they are not entitled to compensation for preserving or restoring the trust fund as successors to the trustee.

6. Executors and administrators §519(1) — Foreign executor cannot collect note given by resident and secured by property in state.

A foreign administrator has no title to nor right to collect or receipt for a note of citizens of the state and secured upon property in the state.

7. Trusts §181(1) — Foreign trustee cannot collect notes given by Missouri citizens and secured by property in this state.

Where the will of an Illinois resident giving and bequeathing property to one for life with remainders over did not provide for any trustee, and the Illinois courts thereafter appointed a trustee to hold funds derived from sale of property devised, such trustee has no title to or right to collect or receipt for notes executed by citizens of Missouri and secured upon property in that state which were given to make good such fund previously dissipated by a Missouri trustee, for the powers of the Illinois trustee are derived wholly from the laws of that state, which do not operate beyond the limits of that jurisdiction.

8. Wills \S 707(1)—Necessity of suit to protect parties seeking construction of will not ground for award of attorney's fees.

Where the widow and son of a trustee appointed to hold a fund derived from sale of land devised by a resident of a foreign state to one for life with remainders over made good the fund which the trustee dissipated, giving their own notes which were surrendered to the life tenant, and thereafter one note was paid, the other lost, held that, notwithstanding it was necessary for such parties to bring an action to protect themselves against a trustee appointed by the courts of the foreign state as well as against remaindermen, such parties were not entitled to an award of attorney's fees, though they demanded a construction of the will.

9. Trusts \S 244—Heirs of trustee not bound to account on theory that he had made profit out of trust fund.

Where a trustee dissipated a trust fund, held, that his widow and son who made good the amount of the fund could not be required to account for supposed profits resulting from the trustee's investment of the fund; it appearing that property which he delivered to his son many years before his death was practically exhausted in making good the trust fund, and that the trustee was without estate at time of his death.

10. Wills \S 634(8)—Remainders to heirs of life tenant held "contingent remainders."

Where a testator gave property to his niece for life, remainder in fee to the heirs of her body, or, in default of issue at her death, then remainder in fee to enumerated relatives, the remainder in fee to the heirs of the body of the niece was, under Rev. St. 1855, c. 32, § 6 (Rev. St. 1909, § 2873), a contingent remainder, as it could not be told who such heirs would be until the death of the niece.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Contingent Remainder.]

11. Wills \S 545(4)—"In default of such issue at her death" meant without issue living at time of her death.

Where testator gave property to a niece for life, remainder to the heirs of her body, with other remainders over "in default of such issue at her death," that expression meant without issue living at the time of her death.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, In Default of Issue.]

12. Wills \S 439—Intention of the testator is paramount.

In construing a will the intention of the testator is paramount.

13. Wills \S 634(14)—Remainder to father, mother, brothers, and sister of life tenant or their heirs per stirpes held "contingent remainder" as to latter class.

Where testator gave property to his niece for life, remainder to her lawful issue and in default of issue to her father, mother, brothers, and sister, or their heirs taking per stirpes, the remainder to the latter class, under Rev. St. 1855, c. 32, §§ 6, 7 (Rev. St. 1909, §§ 2873, 2874), was contingent and hence where a sister died leaving one child who died without issue before the life tenant the father of such child inherited nothing.

14. Wills \S 555(4)—Remainder held contingent, and issue of remaindermen to take as purchasers not by descent.

Where a testator gave property to his niece for life, remainder to her lawful issue, and in event of her death without issue then to her mother, father, brothers, and sister, or their heirs per stirpes, the remainder to the latter class being contingent, depending on whether the individuals named should outlive the life tenant, their heirs took not by descent, but as purchasers under the will, and hence, where a sister died leaving one child, who died without issue before the life tenant, the heirs of such child could take nothing.

15. Wills \S 506(3)—Remainders to designated persons and their heirs per stirpes held not to include husband of deceased life tenant, whose only child died before life tenant.

Where a testator gave property to his niece for life, remainder to the heirs of her body, and in default of such issue at her death to her father, mother, brothers, and sister, or their heirs taking per stirpes, under the statute of descent and distribution providing for descent first to the children or their descendants, second, to the father and mother, third, to the brothers and sisters, and then to the husband and wife, the husband of a deceased sister whose only child died before the life tenant is not entitled to take as against surviving brothers, etc.

16. Wills \S 545(4)—Life tenant held not entitled to take as heir of her father and mother, who had contingent remainders.

Where a testator gave land to his niece for life, remainder to the heirs of her body, and in default of issue to her father, mother, brothers, and sister, or their heirs taking per stirpes, the niece could not by inheritance take as heir of her father or mother, etc., who died before her; their interest being contingent.

17. Wills \S 548—Rights of survivors of class taking per stirpes.

Where testator gave property to his niece for life and remainder to the heirs of her body, and in default of issue to her father, mother, brothers, and sister, or their heirs taking per stirpes, and all of the enumerated class save three brothers died before the niece, one brother leaving issue surviving, the three surviving brothers and the issue of the dead brother are entitled to the whole, the three brothers each taking a one-fourth interest, and the issue of the dead brother taking the other fourth.

18. Appeal and error \S 843(2)—Question of validity of decree of court of foreign state immaterial.

Where in a proceeding for the construction of a will brought by a debtor the decision of the Missouri court adjudicating the rights of the parties was upheld on appeal, and the successful parties affirmed the validity of a decree of the Illinois court also in their favor, the question of the validity of such decree which was attacked by unsuccessful parties need not be determined.

19. Trusts — 181(1) — Foreign trustee held not entitled to take fund.

A trustee appointed by the courts of Illinois, at the instance of remaindermen is not by virtue of his appointment entitled to receive from Missouri debtors, etc., funds which on the death of the life tenant belonged to remaindermen.

20. Appeal and error — 877(4) — Erroneous provision for payment of funds of a state to foreign trustee held harmless.

Error in providing for payment of funds to foreign trustee held harmless as to appellants where the successful parties entitled to the funds made no objection.

Woodson, J., dissenting.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; J. Hugo Grimm, Judge.

Suit by George W. Hartnett and another against Mary Grace Langan, administratrix of the estate of Peter Langan, deceased, and William Connolly. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal, and the first-named defendants likewise appeal, as does William Connolly. Modified and affirmed.

W. B. & Ford W. Thompson, of St. Louis, for plaintiffs.

Ford & Jones, of Carlyle, Ill., Bruce A. Campbell, of East St. Louis, Ill., S. P. Bond, of St. Louis, and Hugh V. Murray, of Carlyle, Ill., for defendants Langan, McNally, Bond, and Schlafly.

Tibbetts & Green, of Guthrie, Okl., and Sanders & Forgey, of St. Louis, for defendant Connolly.

SMALL, C. I. Appeal from the circuit court of the city of St. Louis.

The facts we find to be substantially as follows:

In 1856 William Tighe, a resident of Carlyle, Clinton county, Ill., died, leaving a will, the sixth clause of which was as follows:

"6th. I give, bequeath and devise to my niece, Winefred Langan for life the other half of the residue of my estate, remainder in fee to the heirs of her body, or in default of such issue, at her death then remainder in fee to her father, mother, brothers and sisters equally, or their heirs taking per stirpes."

The will was duly probated in Illinois, and a duly certified copy thereof filed in the probate court of St. Louis county on June 26, 1856. At the time of his death, said Tighe owned an undivided one-half interest in a lot at the corner of Fourth and Market streets in St. Louis. This was embraced within the property mentioned in said sixth clause, so that thereby said Winefred Langan, afterwards Winefred McCabe, was entitled to a life estate therein, and the remainder in fee passed to other parties as provided in said sixth clause of said will.

In 1869, all the parties in interest being before the court, the circuit court of the county of St. Louis rendered a decree in partition under which the property was sold, and one-fourth of the proceeds, to wit, $27,859.87, was paid over to Michael J. Hartnett, appointed by the court in said cause as trustee, "to be by said Hartnett loaned out or invested for the benefit of Winefred McCabe, wife of John McCabe, and all others specified in the will of William Tighe." The court further ordered that, upon receipt of said sum, said Hartnett give bond in the sum of $33,000 to be approved by the court, which he afterwards did, with Constantine Maguire and Catharine Phillips as sureties. Said Michael J. Hartnett remained trustee until his death in St. Louis in the year 1902. During all this time Mrs. McCabe continued to reside in Carlyle, Ill., and Hartnett paid her 6 per cent. per annum on said sum as the supposed income thereof, which he had made as trustee under said order of the court. Upon the death of said Hartnett, it proved that he was and for some years had been insolvent and had used the fund for his own purposes. After his death the plaintiff George W. Hartnett, his son, and Catharine Hartnett, his widow, knowing nothing of the character of the trusteeship of the father and husband, but supposing that he owed Mrs. McCabe said sum individually, continued to pay the interest thereon to Mrs. McCabe, and in 1904 they gave their notes and incumbered their property in St. Louis to secure Mrs. McCabe. The widow made a note, dated October 26, 1904, to Thomas F. Cook, for $12,859.87, and a deed of trust to James H. Maguire, trustee, to secure this note, which was due five years after December 3, 1904, bearing 5 per cent. per annum before maturity, and 8 per cent. per annum after maturity, on property at Second and Spruce streets, which was her individual property, and which she had owned prior to her marriage. The plaintiff George W. Hartnett at the same time made a note to said Cook for $15,000, due five years after November 3, 1904, with 5 per cent. interest per annum before maturity, and bearing 8 per cent. after maturity, to secure said note on an undivided one-half interest in property at Sixth and Walnut streets. These notes were made in the name of Cook, but were intended as security for Mrs. McCabe, and afterwards the plaintiff George W. Hartnett went to Carlyle and tendered them to Mrs. McCabe, but she told him that she would prefer that he keep the securities for her, as his father had done before him. But afterwards, on the 10th of October, 1905, Mrs. McCabe, accompanied by the defendant Bond, as her attorney, called upon George W. Hartnett in St. Louis and requested him to turn over the securities to her (Mrs. McCabe), which he did, and took from her a receipt therefor reading as follows:

"(Duplicate.)

"Received of George W. Hartnett promissory note of $12,859.67, dated October 26, 1904, to order of Thomas F. Cook, signed by Catharine Hartnett and secured by deed of trust of same date, in which Catharine Hartnett is party of the first part, James H. Maguire party of the second part, and Thomas F. Cook party of the third part; also received promissory note of $15,000.00, dated October 27, 1904, to order of Thomas F. Cook, signed by George W. Hartnett and secured by deed of trust of same date, in which Geo. W. Hartnett (unmarried) is party of the first part, James H. Maguire party of the second part, and Thos. F. Cook party of the third part. That these notes, secured by deeds of trust, were held by George W. Hartnett as trustee for Winefred McCabe for cash money of Winefred McCabe in the possession of George W. Hartnett.

"[Signed] George W. Hartnett.
"Winefred McCabe."

Afterwards an appraisal of the property was had, and the security was found insufficient, and the plaintiff George W. Hartnett made another deed of trust on other property, dated November 14, 1905, to Sterling P. Bond, as trustee, and Winefred McCabe, as beneficiary. It conveyed certain real estate in the town of Bridgeton, St. Louis county. It was given as additional security for both the $15,000 note he had previously made and the $12,859.67 note his mother had previously made to Cook and delivered to Mrs. McCabe. The widow, Catharine Hartnett, also at the same time made a similar deed of trust, as additional security, by which she transferred her homestead and residence at 2909 Washington avenue in St. Louis. Thereafter the interest was paid to Mrs. McCabe on both notes, always at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum after maturity, as well as before, up to May 16, 1911, when the plaintiff George W. Hartnett sold his one-half interest in the Sixth and Walnut streets property for $18,500, and paid the $15,000 note, delivering the money to Mrs. McCabe, and receiving a deed of release executed by her individually, releasing the deed of trust on the property sold. On May 22, 1911, George W. Hartnett also sold the property in Bridgeton, and out of the proceeds paid Mrs. McCabe $1,019.67, all that was left after paying prior mortgages thereon, and took her receipt therefor reading as follows:

"Received, St. Louis, Mo., May 22, 1911, of Catharine Hartnett, ten hundred and nineteen $\frac{67}{100}$ dollars, being on account of note for \$12,859.67 held by me and secured by deed of trust on property on northwest corner Second and Spruce streets, St. Louis, Mo. The above payment on account reduces the amount of note of \$12,859.67 to \$11,840.00, drawing 5 per cent. interest per annum from June 3, 1911.

"$1,019.67. [Signed] Winefred McCabe."

At the same time this payment was made, it was indorsed upon the note itself by Mrs. McCabe's attorney. Mrs. Hartnett paid $964.47 interest on her note at the same time, and took a receipt which is as follows:

"Received, St. Louis, Mo., May 22, 1911, of Catharine Hartnett, nine hundred and sixty-four $\frac{67}{100}$ dollars, being eighteen months' interest in full due me to June 3, 1911, on \$12,859.67 note at 5 per cent. per annum. The above interest is for the note from Catharine Hartnett of \$12,859.67, being secured by deed of trust on property on northwest corner of Second street and Spruce street, St. Louis, Mo. "\$964.47. [Signed] Winefred McCabe."

Mrs. McCabe also then released the Bridgeton property and Mrs. Hartnett's homestead from her deed of trust securing the note of Mrs. Hartnett for $12,859.67. This release was also made in her individual capacity. During this transaction the note for $12,859.67 seems to have been lost or mislaid, as it was never afterwards found. The properties incumbered by the son were conveyed to him by the father several years before, with the verbal understanding that the conveyance was made "for the purpose of looking out for Mrs. McCabe's trust."

Mrs. Hartnett, as devisee of Mrs. Philips, surety on her husband's bond as trustee, received property sufficient to pay the note she gave Mrs. McCabe, and this property descended to the plaintiffs as Mrs. Hartnett's heirs. But we find from the evidence that Mrs. Hartnett did not, when she gave said note, or at any time, know of the existence of such bond, or that Mrs. Philips or she, as devisee of Mrs. Philips, was in any manner liable thereon.

On June 8, 1914, in a proceeding in the circuit court of Clinton county, Ill., Fred Schlafly was appointed trustee for all the beneficiaries under the sixth clause of the will of said Tighe, and was ordered by the said court to demand and take from Mrs. McCabe all moneys, choses in action, etc., in her hands, amounting to $28,784.33. He was required to give bond in the sum of $50,000 as such trustee. Upon giving bond and being duly qualified, he took over the said sum, being money and securities, from Mrs. McCabe. George W. Hartnett sent his check to Mrs. McCabe for the interest due July 3, 1914, but it was returned to him by said Schlafly, requesting him to make the check payable to him, Schlafly, as trustee. Hartnett then visited Mrs. McCabe at Carlyle, and she informed him that Schlafly had been appointed trustee, and that it was all right to pay the interest to him, which Hartnett accordingly did, and took Schlafly's receipt therefor as trustee. Thereafter the interest was paid by George W. Hartnett to Schlafly as trustee until some time in January, 1917, when said Hartnett desired to pay the balance principal and interest due on the $12,859.67 note and secure the release of the deed of trust still on his mother's property securing said note. It then developed that the note could not be found and was lost and had never been seen since the partial payment of $1,019.48 had been made thereon. Thereupon, on January 10, 1917, the plaintiff George W. Hartnett tendered to said Schlafly $361.81 interest at 5 per cent. per annum and $11,840 principal in payment of said note, which he claimed was the full amount due, and demanded a surrender of said note and release of the deed of trust securing it. The note being lost, Schlafly could not surrender it, and did not agree that the interest tendered for the time after Mrs. McCabe's death was sufficient. A bond for the lost note was also spoken of, but no agreement was reached.

Thereupon, on January 19, 1917, plaintiffs brought this suit, making said Schlafly and all known beneficiaries and claimants under the sixth clause of said will, or their legal representatives, parties by name, and also making all of such beneficiaries and claimants and all persons representing or claiming under them as were unknown parties defendant, as unknown parties under the statute, and caused publication to be made notifying them of the suit, as required by our statutes.

The plaintiffs filed an amended petition, which set up the principal facts substantially as above narrated. Said petition alleged that said Michael J. Hartnett had never been discharged as such trustee, "Nor were the plaintiffs herein, as his heirs at law and successors in said trust, ever discharged from the terms and provisions of said trust created by said decree, that plaintiffs herein, as such trustees, secured the said trust for the use and benefit of said Winefred McCabe during her life, and that under the terms of said trust they are required to pay over to the beneficiaries, defendants herein named, the said principal of said trust and the interest that accrued thereon since the death of said Winefred McCabe."

The petition then alleges, in substance, that the defendants set up conflicting claims to said sums and take different views of the proper construction to be given the sixth clause of said will; also that plaintiffs were not informed that said sums were trust funds under said will, but were deceived in turning over said note and money to Mrs. McCabe, as her individual property; that they are entitled to an accounting from her administrator, defendant Slater, and also defendant Fred Schlafly, who as well as Mrs. McCabe, were trustees of their own wrong.

The prayer of the plaintiffs' petition was that the court construe said sixth clause in the will of said Tighe, and determine the rights of the parties interested therein, and order distribution of the fund in court accordingly; also to decree that said Schlafly account for and pay into court all such funds paid over to him or in his hands, so that the same may be paid over to persons entitled thereto, as decreed by the court; that plaintiffs have a decree discharging the heirs of said Michael J. Hartnett and the sureties on his bond, as trustee; also that said decree cancel said note and deed of trust for $12,859.67; also that plaintiffs recover out of said trust funds reasonable compensation for their services as successors to their father in said trust in paying over said entire fund, and for their attorney's fees and costs, and for other relief.

At the time of the filing of the petition, January 19, 1917, by leave of court, plaintiffs were allowed to and did pay into court, as a tender and in payment of said note, the sum of $12,211.66, which was afterwards by order of court deposited in the National Bank of Commerce in St. Louis as a special deposit, drawing 2 per cent. per annum.

Defendant Mary Grace Langan, administratrix, and certain other named defendants, filed answer by their attorneys Ford & Jones, Bruce A. Campbell, and S. P. Bond. They set up in said answer, as a counterclaim against the plaintiffs, in effect, that the property which the plaintiff George W. Hartnett made deeds of trust upon to secure Mrs. McCabe and other property was purchased by Michael J. Hartnett with the trust funds in his hands, from which large profits were made; that such profits belonged to the trust fund in addition to the principal thereof, for which the plaintiffs were liable, and against whom the defendants ask an accounting and judgment therefor. They also alleged in said answer that the will of said Tighe had been construed by a decree of the circuit court of Clinton county, Ill., in a suit commenced prior to the bringing of the plaintiffs' suit, and that said court had determined that said defendants were the owners of said trust fund, and were entitled to share in said fund under said will in certain proportions, which the answer sets out and which the decree of the lower court determined was correct; that full faith and credit must be given to said Illinois court's decree under the Constitution of the United States, and that the matters in dispute between the parties in interest as to their shares in said fund had already been adjudicated by said decree in Illinois.

Defendant Fred Schlafly, and Fred Schlafly as trustee, stated in his answer that Mrs. McCabe died October 9, 1916, without ever having any heirs of her body, and that previous to her death her father, mother, brother James Langan, and sister Catharine Langan, II, had departed this life. It also stated that the $15,000 note of George W. Hartnett and the $12,859.67 note of Catharine Hartnett were given to restore the trust fund, which had been lost by the original trustee, Michael J. Hartnett, and were given to Mrs McCabe to hold, and she did hold possession thereof, and preserved the said fund for whomsoever should be entitled to it upon her death; that at the November term, 1916, of the circuit court of Clinton county, Ill., in a proceeding in which all the beneficiaries under the sixth clause of said will were defendants, and Mrs. McCabe was plaintiff, said court construed the will and appointed said Schlafly to take and hold said funds in possession of Mrs. McCabe, as required by said will; that said decree was made January 27, 1917; that said defendant Schlafly gave bond as required and took possession of the money and choses in action constituting said funds of Mrs. McCabe, and holds them as such trustee; that said court determined the proportion or interest which all the parties to this suit had in said funds, and said decree is binding upon them; that said cause in Illinois was commenced, and the plaintiffs were informed thereof, prior to the commencement of this suit.

The defendant William Connolly filed separate answer, claiming that, as husband and heir of his deceased wife, Catharine Langan (II) Connolly, and as heir of his daughter, Winefred Connolly, both of whom predeceased Mrs. McCabe, he was entitled to four twenty-firsts of said estate.

The answer of the defendant Frank Slater, public administrator, claimed that, as administrator of the estate of Mrs McCabe in this state, he was entitled to $210.49 on account of interest which had accrued on said funds from June 3, 1916, to October 9, 1916, the date of the death of Mrs. McCabe. His answer also took the view that said sixth clause of the will created a vested remainder in the parties named as taking upon the death of Mrs. McCabe without issue, and, if so, Mrs. McCabe herself was entitled to two thirty-fifths of said fund, as one of the heirs of her father, mother, brother, and sister, who died before she did.

Proper pleadings were filed putting all the various claims of the parties, plaintiffs and defendants, in issue. We have not undertaken to set out even the substance of the language of the different pleadings, but only a bare outline of the material portions thereof. Other facts in evidence or stated in the pleadings may be hereafter referred to in the course of the opinion.

The court below decreed that plaintiffs pay into court $1,075.44 (in addition to the amount paid in at the commencement of the suit), less such amount as the Bank of Commerce should pay as interest on said sum on deposit with said bank, that thereupon the note and deed of trust for $12,859.67 made by Mrs. Catharine Hartnett, the mother of the plaintiff, should be deemed canceled and satisfied, and that the heirs of Michael J. Hartnett, and of Catharine Hartnett deceased, and of Catherine Phillips, deceased, surety on the bond of said Michael J. Hartnett as trustee, also then should be discharged from all liability to any of the defendants in the case and, denied plaintiffs any other relief prayed for. The court decreed against the relief asked against the plaintiffs by the defendants Mary Grace Langan and others in their cross-bill, but found and decreed for said defendants as to the construction of the will, holding that they were entitled to the fund in court under the sixth clause of the will of said Tighe and that the defendants William Connolly and Kate Mulcahy took no interest under said will, and that the defendant Frank Slater, public administrator in charge of the estate of said Winefred McCabe, deceased, had no interest in said fund except $207.20, the amount of interest due Mrs. McCabe on Mrs. Hartnett's note at the time of her death—that is, Mrs. McCabe's death. All the parties appealed, except defendants Slater and Mulcahy.

[1] II. The first question is whether the tender and payment into court by the plaintiffs of $12,211.66 was sufficient to pay the amount due on the note in controversy. If the note bore interest at only 5 per cent. per annum after Mrs. McCabe's death, then the tender was sufficient, but, if after that time it bore interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, the tender was insufficient. The note in controversy was dated October 26, 1904, and was originally for $12,859.67, due on or before five years from December 3, 1904, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum until maturity, and after maturity at 8 per cent. per annum. It was secured by deed of trust of even date with the note upon real estate in the city of St. Louis on Second and Spruce streets, which was the individual property of Mrs. Hartnett, and owned by her before her marriage. It and another note for $15,000 made by her son, the plaintiff George W. Hartnett, which was paid several years before this suit was brought, were given to Mrs. McCabe to make good the sum of $27,859.67 which Mrs. Hartnett and her son believed the husband and father, Michael J. Hartnett, had during his lifetime for many years held in trust for and owed Mrs. McCabe personally and individually. They knew nothing about the terms of the trust or how it arose or was created, or that any other persons were interested therein.

Mrs. McCabe lived at Carlyle, Clinton county, Ill. Mrs. Hartnett and her son always paid interest on these notes to her personally after their maturity, as well as before, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. On May 22, 1911, Mrs. Hartnett paid Mrs. McCabe $1,019.67 (besides interest due to June 3, 1911, at 5 per cent.), reducing the amount due on her note of $12,859.67 to $11,840. She gave Mrs. Hartnett a receipt dated May 22, 1911, for the money so paid, which is set out in our statement of facts, and which concludes as follows:

"The above payment on account reduces the amount of note of $12,859.67 to $11,840.00 drawing 5 per cent. interest per annum from June 3, 1911.

Winefred McCabe."

This is an express statement of Mrs. McCabe's in writing, made on May 22, 1911, that by the payment on that day of $1,019.67 there is a balance of $11,840 left due on her note against Mrs. Hartnett, to draw interest from June 3d following—that is, June 3, 1911—at 5 per cent. per annum, to which date the interest had been paid at the same time. Thereafter, as long as she lived, she and Schlafly also, after he was appointed trustee by the circuit court of Clinton county, Ill., in 1914, and until her death in 1916, always collected and were paid interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. Although the note was given to Mrs. McCabe for her benefit only, the remaindermen now seek to treat it as given for their benefit also. If so, they must take it as she held it and ratify the act of Mrs. McCabe in changing the interest it originally bore after maturity to 5 per cent. per annum after June 3, 1911.

We must find this point, therefore, in favor of the plaintiff, and that their deposit in court when they brought the suit was sufficient to pay all that was owing on the note. The lower court was therefore wrong in holding said payment into court was insufficient.

[2] III. Although the note was given to Mrs. McCabe by Mrs. Hartnett under the impression that it was for her sole benefit, and that she owned the principal of the trust fund, as well as the interest or income thereof which she had always received, still it was afterwards turned over to Schlafly, as trustee for the remaindermen, and they are now in court claiming it as a part of said trust fund. Said note (together with the son's note of $15,000, which was paid before this suit was brought) was taken by Mrs. McCabe and given by Mrs. Hartnett to make up the full amount of the trust fund owing by the father. The remaindermen must take it, as Mrs. McCabe received it, as the full amount of the trust fund. No mistake or error is charged or shown to exist as to the amount. Therefore the decree was right in declaring that the heirs of Michael J. Hartnett and of Mrs. Phillips, as surety on his bond, as such trustee, be discharged from all liability upon payment of the amount due upon the note in question, which we hold the plaintiffs have done.

[3-5] IV. The plaintiffs, as heirs of Michael J. Hartnett, were not his successors as trustee of the trust fund: (1) Because the trust fund had been dissipated, and there was no such trust fund to devolve upon them as heirs; (2) the trust fund, being personal property, had it existed, would have passed into the custody of the administrator of said Michael J. Hartnett (had there been one) as bailee, and not to his heirs (Hook, Adm'r, v. Dyer, 47 Mo. 214; State ex rel. v. Trust Co., 209 Mo. 472, 108 S. W. 97); (3) the plaintiff George W. Hartnett voluntarily surrendered the trust fund which he and his mother created into the hands of Mrs. McCabe several years before her death, and did not claim to hold or administer the same under said will at any time.

Therefore the plaintiffs were not entitled to receive any compensation for preserving or restoring the trust fund as successors to their father, as trustee.

[6-8] V. Nor were the plaintiffs entitled to any allowance for attorney's fees or expenses for bringing and prosecuting this suit. It is true the plaintiffs were obliged to bring the suit in order to secure a valid release of their property from the lien of the deed of trust. A foreign administrator has no title to nor right to collect or receipt for a note from citizens of this state and secured upon property in this state. Crohn v. Bank, 137 Mo. App. 712, 118 S. W. 498; Richardson v. Busch, 198 Mo. 187, 95 S. W. 894, 115 Am. St. Rep. 472; Naylor v. Moffatt, 29 Mo. 126; McCarty v. Hall, 18 Mo. 480; Bartlett v. Hyde, 3 Mo. 490; State ex rel. v. Bunce, 187 Mo. App. 614, 615, 173 S. W. 101.

Schlafly, not deriving his powers as trustee from the will of Tighe, the testator, which made no provision for any such trustee, but simply from the order of the circuit court of Clinton county, Ill., had no more title or power to collect and receipt for the balance due on the note and deed of trust in question than would a foreign administrator. The power of both is derived wholly from the laws of the state where they are appointed, and those laws do not operate beyond the limits of such state. Curtis v. Smith, 6 Blatchf. 537, Fed. Cas. No. 3,505; Scudder v. Ames, 89 Mo. loc. cit. 522, 14 S. W. 525; McPike v. McPike, 111 Mo. loc. cit. 225, 226, 20 S. W. 12; and other authorities supra.

Before Schlafly could legally collect said note, he should have been appointed trustee by a court in this state. Curtis v. Smith, supra. But, while the plaintiffs could not have legally paid the note to Schlafly, they could have paid it directly to the remaindermen entitled to it, or, if there was difficulty or uncertainty in determining who they were, plaintiffs could deposit the money due on the note in court and make all claimants parties to a suit in equity, and ask the court to cancel the note and satisfy the deed of trust, as they did do. As we understand the authorities, including Sandusky, Ex'r, v. Sandusky, 265 Mo. 219, 177 S. W. 390, relied upon by the plaintiffs, it is only the executor or other parties appointed to carry out the provisions of a will who are allowed counsel fees in suits for the construction of the will. In any event, we know of no case in which the debtor of an estate or those claiming under him, or her, as here, have been held entitled to such allowance, although it was necessary for them to pay the amount due into court and to seek the aid of a court of equity in relieving their property from the incumbrance of the debt.

This suit was brought primarily for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and not for that of the defendants. In such cases counsel fees are not allowable to the plaintiffs, and the lower court was right in so ruling.

[9] VI. As to the counterclaim or cross-bill set up in the answer of defendants Mary Grace Langan and others against the plaintiffs. This counterclaim is based upon the allegations in said answer that plaintiffs' ancestor, Michael J. Hartnett, invested the trust funds in certain real estate from which he or they realized large profits, and which the beneficiaries of said fund are entitled to in addition to the principal of such fund. We have examined the evidence carefully. It shows that said Michael J. Hartnett died without any property; that two pieces of property which a number of years before his death he conveyed or caused to be conveyed to his son, George W. Hartnett, were largely, if not wholly, used by the latter in paying the $15,000 which he paid to Mrs. McCabe. The evidence does not sustain the claim that said property or any property was purchased by said Michael J. Hartnett with such trust fund, but that he probably spent such fund from time to time in living expenses, and that was one of the reasons, as shown by the evidence, which induced Mrs. Hartnett to mortgage her property and give the note in suit to make good her husband's debt. The lower court was right in finding against the said defendants on their counterclaim or cross-bill against the plaintiffs.

[10-13] VII. The next question is one arising between the defendants themselves. The defendant William Connolly is the father of Winefred Connolly, and her mother, Catharine Langan Connolly, was a sister of Mrs. McCabe. Both Mrs. Connolly and her daughter, Winefred, died before Mrs. McCabe. William Connolly therefore claims an interest in said fund as the heir of his deceased daughter, her death having occurred after that of her mother; in other words, his contention is that the sixth clause of said will created a vested remainder in the remaindermen therein mentioned and their heirs, subject to be divested upon the birth of issue to Mrs. McCabe; that Mrs. McCabe never had any children; therefore said remainder so vested was never divested and his wife, Catharine Langan Connolly, Mrs. McCabe's sister, took a vested interest in her own right, and also took as an heir of her mother and father, who died before she did; that upon his wife's death her interest descended to his daughter, and, his daughter dying before Mrs. McCabe, he inherited her interest. On the other hand, said defendants Mary Grace Langan and others assert that said will created no vested remainder in any one during the life of Mrs. McCabe, but only a contingent remainder in such of the remaindermen mentioned in the will (in case Mrs. McCabe died without leaving issue) as were alive at the time of her death, or, if dead, in the heirs per stirpes of the deceased remaindermen, living at the time of Mrs. McCabe's death. We agree to this contention and that said William Connolly therefore has no rights under said sixth clause of said will. Said sixth clause is as follows:

"6th. I give, bequeath and devise to my niece, Winefred Langan for life the other half of the residue of my estate, remainder in fee to the heirs of her body, or in default of such issue, at her death then remainder in fee to her father, mother, brothers and sisters equally, or their heirs taking per stirpes."

When this will was made, and ever since, the following statutory provisions were in force (R. S. 1855, vol. 1, p. 356, §§ 6 and 7; R. S. 1909, §§ 2873, 2874):

"Sec. 6. Where a remainder in lands or tenements, goods or chattels, shall be limited, by deed or otherwise, to take effect on the death of any person without heirs, or heirs of his body, or without issue, * * * the words 'heirs' or 'issue' shall be construed to mean heirs or issue living at the death of the person named as ancestor.

"Sec. 7. Where a remainder shall be limited to the heirs, or heirs of the body, of a person to whom a life estate in the same premises shall be given, the persons who, on the termination of the life estate, shall be the heir or heirs of the body of such tenant for life shall be entitled to take as purchasers, * * * by virtue of the remainder so limited in them."

Under said section 7, the remainder to the heirs of the body of Mrs. McCabe was a contingent remainder, because it "could not be told" who such heirs "would be until her death, when the contingent remainder in fee under the" will "would vest." Godman v. Simmons, 113 Mo. loc. cit. 127, 128, 20 S. W. 972; Emmerson v. Hughes, 117 Mo. 627, 19 S. W. 979. And under said section 6 the words "in default of issue at her death" meant without issue living at Mrs. McCabe's death. Faust v. Birner, 30 Mo. 414; Naylor v. Godman, 109 Mo. 543, 19 S. W. 56; Yocum v. Siler, 160 Mo. 281, 61 S. W. 208; Gannon v. Pank, 200 Mo. loc. cit. 82, 98 S. W. 471. Construed in view of said statutory provisions and the intention of the testator, which rides down every other consideration in construing a will, said sixth clause means that the devise is to Winefred Langan for life, remainder in fee to her descendants living at her death, or, if she have no descendants living at her death, then the remainder in fee to her father, mother, brothers, and sisters, if then living, or, if dead, to their heirs, taking per stirpes. Mrs. McCabe never had any children nor their descendants living at the time of her death, but, if she had had children or their descendants then living, they would then have taken the fee and her father, mother, brothers, and sisters, or their heirs per stirpes would have taken no title whatever. Their rights and title were wholly contingent upon Mrs. McCabe's dying without leaving descendants, which could not be ascertained until she died, and consequently the estate of her father, mother, brothers, and sisters, or their heirs per stirpes, was a contingent remainder, and did not vest during the lifetime of Mrs. McCabe in any of them, and only vested in such of them as were living at the time of her death. Godman v. Simmons, 113 Mo. 127, 128, 20 S. W. 972; Dickerson v. Dickerson, 211 Mo. 483, 110 S. W. 700; and other authorities infra and supra. Therefore neither Mrs. Connolly nor her daughter, as her heir, took anything under said sixth clause which would pass to their heirs by inheritance, because they died before Mrs. McCabe. Dickerson v. Dickerson, 211 Mo. 483, 110 S. W. 700; De Lassus v. Gatewood, 71 Mo. 380; Emmerson v. Hughes, 110 Mo. 627, 19 S. W. 979; Buxton v. Kroeger, 219 Mo. loc. cit. 240, 117 S. W. 1147.

[14, 15] Indeed, the remainder to the father, mother, brothers, and sisters, or their heirs per stirpes, was subject to another contingency besides that of Mrs. McCabe dying without leaving issue, for this reason: The father, mother, brothers, and sisters were only to take the remainder in case they were living at the time of Mrs. McCabe's death, because, if they were then deceased, their heirs were to take their portion per stirpes, not as heirs by descent, but as purchasers under the will. Buxton v. Kroeger, 219 Mo. loc. cit. 256, 257, 117 S. W. 1147. At the time the will was made it was impossible to say that any such remaindermen would survive Mrs. McCabe, and no one was to take as such remaindermen who did not survive her. Consequently for this reason, too, such remainder was contingent, and vested in none of such remaindermen except those who survived Mrs. McCabe. Emmerson v. Hughes, 110 Mo. 627, 19 S. W. 979; Emison v. Whitlesey, 55 Mo. loc. cit. 258; also authorities supra.

The remainder being thus doubly contingent and taking effect or vesting only upon the death of Mrs. McCabe in such of the remaindermen or their heirs as were then living, the heirs who were to take the deceased remaindermen's portion under said will were the persons who were, or would have been, the heirs of such deceased remaindermen at the time the remainder vested, or at the date of Mrs. McCabe's death. A deceased heir of such remaindermen, of course, could take nothing, because not in existence when the estate vested. As no one is heir to the living, so it may be said that the dead are heirs to no one. At the date of Mrs. McCabe's death, Mrs. Connolly and her daughter both being dead, the daughter could not, and did not, take as her mother's heir under said will, and she could transmit nothing by inheritance to her father and he was not the heir of his wife. Who, then, were or would have been the heirs of Mrs. Connolly at the time of her (Mrs. McCabe's) death, her descendants all then being dead? Our statutes of descents and distributions, then as now, provided as to the course of descent as follows:

"First, to his children, or their descendants, in equal parts; second, if there be no children, or their descendants, then to his father, mother, brothers and sisters, and their descendants in equal parts; third, if there be no children, or their descendants, father, mother, brother or sister, nor their descendants, then to the husband or wife. * * *" Rev. St. 1900, § 332.

Under the plain language of the statute, therefore, Mrs. Connolly's surviving brothers, and the living descendants of her brother then dead, would be her heirs at the time of Mrs. McCabe's death, because Mrs. Connolly then had no living descendants, and her father and mother and one of her brothers (leaving descendants) were dead. Consequently the share Mrs. Connolly would have taken had she been alive when Mrs. McCabe died passed under said sixth clause to her surviving brothers and the living descendants per stirpes of her brother then deceased, and not to her husband. We must therefore rule, as did the circuit court, that defendant William Connolly was entitled to no part of the fund in controversy.

[16] VIII. Mrs. McCabe had nothing but a life estate under said will and could inherit nothing from her father, mother, brother, or sister, whose deaths preceded her death, for the reason that their interests, being contingent upon surviving her, never took effect because they died before she did. Consequently Kate Mulcahy, as Mrs. McCabe's devisee, received nothing, and the public administrator in charge of the estate of Mrs. McCabe was entitled to nothing except unpaid interest up to the death of Mrs. McCabe, which the court allowed him.

[17] IX. At the time of Mrs. McCabe's death both her father and mother and one brother and one sister and her descendants were dead, leaving surviving her only her brothers John, Peter, and William, and the children of her deceased brother, James. Therefore John, Peter, and William were each entitled to one-fourth interest in the trust fund, and the remaining fourth vested in the children of James, as found and decreed by the court below.

[19] There are many questions raised between the respective parties in this court, as to the validity of the decree of the circuit court of Clinton county, Ill., construing said clause of said will, but it is not necessary for us to discuss or pass on those questions, because we have construed said will and determined the rights of the parties thereunder, the same as did the said Illinois circuit court, and the parties defendant in favor of whom we have so decided affirm the validity of said decree in Illinois in all things.

We therefore reverse the judgment of the circuit court herein, and remand the case, with directions to modify its judgment herein, so as to decree said note and deeds of trust of said Catharine Hartnett, originally for $12,589.67, mentioned in the petition, fully paid, satisfied, and canceled, without any further payment thereon by the plaintiffs than the money already tendered and paid into court by them, and also that said trust is fully paid and satisfied, and the heirs of said Michael J. Hartnett, the trustee, and Catherine Philips and Constantine Maguire, sureties on his bond, and their heirs, be fully discharged from all further liability on account thereof. All court costs should be decreed against the defendants, and be paid out of said fund in court.

[19, 20] Defendant Schlaflly has no right as trustee appointed by the Illinois court to collect or receive said fund, and the judgment below is erroneous in authorizing him to do so. Still the parties defendant in interest make no objection here to said decree for that reason, but consent thereto, and consequently it will be binding upon them, so far as plaintiffs are concerned. Schlaflly may be considered as appointed by the lower court as the successor of Michael J. Hartnett, trustee, and, as such, authorized to receive and pay out said funds as directed. With this understanding, we do not disturb the ruling of the lower court as to said Schlaflly receiving and disbursing said fund as trustee. In all other respects, except as above indicated, the decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of SMALL, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court. All the Judges concur, except WOODSON, J.

STATE v. HARDIN et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

Criminal law §1182 — Where information proper and record reveals no error, conviction must be affirmed.

Where no bill of exceptions has been filed, and the information is in proper form, and the record of trial and subsequent proceedings reveal no ground for criticism, judgment of conviction must be affirmed.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Charles B. Davis, Judge.

Harvey Hardin and another were convicted of robbery in the first degree, and appeal. Affirmed.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and Lewis Hord Cook, Sp. Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMSON, J. The appellants, Harvey Hardin and Dave H. Henderson, having been convicted upon a charge of robbery in the first degree and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary, have prosecuted an appeal to this court. No bill of exceptions has been filed, and we are consequently confined to the record proper in our examination of this case. No brief has been filed in behalf of appellants.

We have examined the information and all of the proceedings had thereunder. The information is in proper form, and the record of the trial and subsequent proceedings reveals no ground for criticism.

No error appearing, the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

All concur.

WILLIAMS v. SCHAFF.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
April 10, 1920. Motion for Rehearing and Modification Overruled June 2, 1920.)

1. Master and servant §38(7)—Railroad employees going to distant town for lodging not in service unless journey is necessary.

In view of the custom for railroad employees sent out for duty on the line to live where they work, a laborer and his foreman, who after finishing their day's work in a town traveled to an adjacent town to secure lodging, will not be deemed in the service of the company on their journey back to work, so as to render the railroad liable for the foreman's negligence in ordering the laborer to board a moving freight train, unless the journey to secure lodging was reasonably necessary.

2. Master and servant §284(2)—Relation of railroad employees lodging away from point of work question for jury.

Whether plaintiff, a railroad laborer, and his foreman, returning to point of work during working hours from a town where they lodged at night, were in the company's service, so as to render it liable for the foreman's negligence in ordering plaintiff to board a freight train, held a question for the jury, under plaintiff's testimony that lodging could not be found at the point of work.

3. Commerce \S 27(8)—Employé, constructing new semaphore for interstate and intra-state commerce, not within the federal act.

Employés engaged in constructing a new semaphore and depot to be used in place of old structures in inter as well as intra state commerce do not come within the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), for the improvements might be destroyed before completion and never be used.

4. Commerce \S 8(6)—Federal Employers' Liability Act exclusive as to a case within it.

In a case within the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665) the federal law is exclusive and supersedes the state laws on the subject.

5. Appeal and error \S 1035—Judgment reversed where case tried on erroneous theory that federal liability act applicable.

Where an action was erroneously tried on the theory that federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665) applied a judgment for plaintiff must be reversed where the state rules of law affecting liability are different or are not less favorable to defendant.

6. Appeal and error \S 882(3)—Defendant's request for instruction held not to preclude claim of inapplicability of federal liability act.

Where the petition of a railroad laborer in one count relied on the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), and in another count on common-law liability, and the railroad company denied liability under each count, the fact that it requested an instruction that it was not liable at common law will not preclude it from attacking a judgment after trial on the theory that the federal act applied, where it also requested an instruction that it was not liable under such act.

7. Master and servant \S 243(2)—Railroad laborer held not trespasser in attempting to board freight train.

Where pass given a railroad's foreman for himself and a laborer was honored on a freight train on which they rode to their lodging place, the laborer who was injured in his attempt to obey the foreman's direction to board a moving freight train on which they intended to return cannot be deemed a trespasser, notwithstanding the company's rules forbidding transportation on such train, it appearing that neither was familiar with the rules.

8. Master and servant \S 272—Pass admissible on question of railroad foreman's authority to direct laborer.

In an action by a railroad laborer hurt in attempting to board moving freight train at direction of his foreman, a free pass which had been given the foreman for himself and one man was admissible on the question as to his authority to direct the laborer.

9. Trial \S 244(4)—Instruction held erroneous in emphasizing fact that employé injured had free pass.

Where a railroad carpenter was given a free pass for himself and a laborer, and the laborer was injured in attempting to board a moving freight train at the direction of the carpenter, an instruction submitting whether the carpenter's direction was negligent and he should have known it was erroneous in unduly emphasizing the free pass, though it might be considered on the question as to the carpenter's authority.

Graves, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pettis County; Hopkins B. Shain, Judge.

Action by James A. Williams against Charles E. Schaff, as receiver of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. W. Jamison, of St. Louis, Montgomery & Montgomery and Carl S. Hoffman, all of Sedalia, for appellant.

Claude Wilkerson and Paul Barnett, both of Sedalia, and F. P. Sizer, of Monett, for respondent.

GOODE, J. This plaintiff, in an attempt to get on a freight train of the defendant company, fell under the wheels and his left arm and left leg were so badly mangled it was necessary to amputate them. The accident occurred February 19, 1917, at the station of McAlester in the state of Oklahoma. Only six days before plaintiff had taken employment from the company as a common laborer in the bridge construction and repair department; but he had been in the service of the company previously for three or four months in the same department. The local headquarters of the department were at Muskogee, Okl., a town and station on defendant's railway 50 miles north of McAlester, and where the foreman of the bridge department hired plaintiff. Eight or ten miles south of McAlester is the station of Savannah, and to this station plaintiff, on February 18, 1917, was ordered by the general foreman of the department to go with a carpenter by the name of Hughes, to help Hughes in the construction of a semaphore, a device used by the railway company to signal trains. The general foreman said to plaintiff in Hughes' presence, "You will go with Mr. Hughes to Savannah to work on the semaphore signal." The company furnished Hughes a pass for the transportation of himself and plaintiff to Savannah. The pass was for "one carpenter and one employé, when presented with form 214—between stations on McAlester Dist." Said form notified "passenger conductors and train auditors that the form identified Hughes and one man" as entitled to use the pass from Muskogee to Savannah. The printed rules of the company regarding the use of passes were put in evidence, and one of them provided that no pass would be honored on a freight train not scheduled to carry passengers unless it bore on its back this endorsement:

"Good on freight trains." Further, that passes, must not be used for travel on personal business. Defendant was building a new depot at Savannah and a new semaphore to take the place of old one still in use.

The old semaphore was used for signaling both intrastate and interstate trains of the defendant company, as the railway lines of the company extend through several states, and it operates trains through them. At the time of the accident the new semaphore had not been put into use for any purpose; but when completed it would be one of a succession of semaphores along the interstate lines of the defendant company, just as the old one was and had been. Plaintiff and the carpenter, Hughes, who is spoken of by plaintiff as a "straw boss," worked on the semaphore during the day of the 18th, and, not having finished it at the hour for quitting work, intended to continue their task the next day. Hughes said to plaintiff there "wasn't any place to stay in Savannah"; so they would run up to McAlester for the night and return to Savannah in the morning. Accordingly they took passage on a freight train and were carried to McAlester, the conductor treating the pass, when presented by Hughes, as authority to carry them. Plaintiff said he personally knew nothing of whether or not there was a hotel or other place to stop in Savannah and didn't look for one. They spent the night at a hotel or boarding house selected by Hughes, ate breakfast at a restaurant he selected and went to the depot to take a train back to Savannah. A freight train had been made up at North McAlester, two miles away, and it came along past the depot at McAlester at 8 o'clock, but did not stop. Hughes spoke to the engineer or some one in the engine as it passed, and then told plaintiff they (Hughes and plaintiff) would get on that train. Hughes caught the train near the front end; then said to plaintiff: "Come on; it is safe." Plaintiff attempted to get on; but when he caught, or caught at, a grab-iron on the side of a car, the rocking of the train, which was running from five to ten miles an hour, according to diverse testimony, threw plaintiff off his balance, caused him to lose his hold of the grabiron, and he fell under the train and received the injuries we have stated. Plaintiff testified the train seemed to be going pretty slow, and he thought he could catch it; that he asked Hughes if it was safe before trying to get on, because he (plaintiff) did not know at what speed the train was running or whether it would be safe to attempt to catch it. He and Hughes had been waiting at the station since 7 o'clock, and the defendant company afterward paid plaintiff for that hour, which was the one when his day's work began. There was testimony that passes and orders like those Hughes was given for himself and plaintiff were honored on freight trains as well as on passenger trains. Hughes so testified—said he had used such free passes for from three to five years on all kinds of trains; had never been given a book containing rules about the use of passes; had used them "on everything that came along" going to and coming from work, and was never instructed not to ride freight trains with such a pass. It should be stated that in an accident which occurred during plaintiff's first employment by defendant his right arm was broken at the elbow and he was left crippled in that arm, so his use of it was not "very good." In his effort to clutch the grabiron he caught hold with his right hand, but failed to catch with his left; failed also to place his foot in the stirrup, and his hold by his right hand was jerked loose.

For convenience we have spoken of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company as the defendant company; but the actual defendant is Charles E. Schaff, who was receiver of the company and operating its lines.

The petition was in two paragraphs, of which the first was drawn on the supposition that the plaintiff was hurt while he was assisting defendant as a carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and hence the case was controlled by the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665). The second paragraph stated a cause of action based on the theory that plaintiff's work when he met with the injury was in connection with defendant's intrastate business. The court instructed there could be no recovery on the second cause of action.

The only finding of negligence upon which the jury were authorized to return a verdict for plaintiff was that Hughes gave him a negligent order to get on the moving freight train. In addition to finding that averment had been proved, the jury were required to find the following facts: Plaintiff at the time of the injury was engaged in defendant's service, under the direction and control of Hughes; that Hughes was foreman over him at the time, and had authority to direct the movements of plaintiff in going about his work, and to and from it; Hughes was furnished with a pass for himself and one employé; plaintiff and defendant were, at the time, engaged in interstate commerce; in obedience to the order of Hughes, and in the scope of plaintiff's employment, he undertook to get on the train and was jerked loose from the grabiron, caused to fall under the train and injured; the order of Hughes, if given, constituted negligence; plaintiff's injuries were the direct result of such negligent order, and that plaintiff did not assume the risk of the hazard to which he was exposed.

Whether he assumed the hazard depended, the court instructed, on whether it was one ordinarily incident to the business and known and appreciated by plaintiff; but if plaintiff was not aware of the danger, and did not appreciate the risk of getting on moving freight trains, he did not assume the risk.

The court also instructed that if the jury found plaintiff was not engaged in defendant's business when hurt, but for his own convenience had made the trip to McAlester, and when hurt was seeking transportation back to his place of employment, plaintiff assumed the risk of boarding the train, and the verdict must be for defendant.

A verdict was given for plaintiff, and his damages assessed at $25,000. After judgment had been entered on the verdict, defendant took this appeal.

[1,2] 1. The assignment of error for first attention is that plaintiff made no case for the jury, because the only act of negligence the jury was required to find, namely, the order of Hughes for plaintiff to get on a moving train, occurred when neither plaintiff nor Hughes was engaged in the business of defendant. If this assignment is good, plaintiff cannot recover on either the federal statute or at common law. According to the testimony of plaintiff himself, he was free to go where he pleased after the day's work was over and to select for himself a place to eat and sleep. Naturally he would defer, somewhat, to Hughes, his foreman, in choosing lodgings; but in doing so would not be acting under Hughes' authority as foreman, but simply under his influence. Defendant had neither agreed to pay plaintiff's personal expenses while in its service, nor had reserved any control over him in respect of his board and lodging. The custom is so general for employees of a railroad company when sent out for duty on the line to live where they work, in some boarding house or hotel, or in "bunk cars" of the company, that we may presume it was incumbent on plaintiff and Hughes to stay overnight in Savannah, if they could find a suitable place; that is, one of the kind commonly used by persons in similar employment. Therefore, unless it was reasonably necessary for them to go to McAlester to spend the night, they were not engaged in the work of the company while they were away; and the company is no more responsible for the accident to plaintiff than it would have been if they had gone to a dance at McAlester and the accident had happened during their return trip. The argument for plaintiff at this point leaves out of view the necessity of the trip, and takes for granted plaintiff and Hughes, whatever was their reason for going to McAlester, were acting in the scope of their employment when they started back after 7 o'clock, the hour when they were supposed to commence work for the day. But this was not so if they left Savannah on an errand of their own. The duty of plaintiff to obey the orders of Hughes as foreman was primarily to do so when at Savannah and at work on the semaphore; and Hughes would have authority over his movements at McAlester after 7 o'clock in the morning only in the event plaintiff had been forced to go there in consequence of inability to procure accommodation for the night at Savannah. The only evidence on this question was the testimony of plaintiff himself that Hughes said there was no place to sleep in Savannah. This testimony having been received without objection conduced to prove the necessity to hunt quarters elsewhere; and, for aught that appears, McAlester was as accessible as any place. Such being the condition of affairs, the pertinent inquiry is not as to whether plaintiff and Hughes were within their employment while traveling to McAlester, and while passing the night there, but whether they were engaged in defendant's service on the way back to their task, and after the hour for them to resume work had arrived.

The question of the necessity of the trip was not as pointedly instructed upon as it could have been; but an instruction given by the court of its own motion, fairly presented it, in the absence of requests by the parties for more definite charges. The requests of plaintiff required the jury to find the command of Hughes was given "in the due performance of his duties"; but did not require them to find the existence of the only condition under which the command would have been given in the performance of Hughes' duty, namely, that the parties had gone to McAlester because they could find no place to stay overnight in Savannah.

A refused request of defendant excluded a verdict for plaintiff if the jury found he "was required to provide and pay for his own board and lodging; had the right to select the place where he would board and lodge," and in the exercise of that right, went with Hughes to McAlester. Said instruction took no account of the possible necessity to go there; and, as far as it had any merit, was covered by the one we have summarized, given by the court of its own motion and denying a recovery if the trip was taken by plaintiff for his own convenience and not as incident to his employment.

In view of the evidence to prove there was no place in Savannah where Hughes and plaintiff could spend the night, we hold it was not shown beyond an inference to the contrary the parties were acting outside the scope of their duty to defendant when the accident happened.

The liability of an employer for injury to a workman in his service, where the workman is absent from the place of his task, depends, in instances like the present, on whether the absence was voluntary on the part of the workman and for some purpose of his own, or, for some reason, was involuntary and compelled; and one of the reasons may be the conditions at the spot where his task lay. Two contrasted cases present this proposition clearly. In one a miner had been killed by an exposed and charged electric wire running along a passage in the mine, while the deceased was returning at noon from a social call on a fellow workman. The defendant was held not to be liable for the accident on the theory that the deceased was a servant engaged in the master's work when killed; the court citing in support of the proposition, 1 Shear. & Red. Negligence, § 190; Wright v. Rawson, 52 Iowa, 329, 3 N. W. 106, 35 Am. Rep. 275; Kennedy v. Chase, 119 Cal. 637, 52 Pac. 33, 63 Am. St. Rep. 153. In the aspect of the case that the defendant had maintained a defective appliance in a place where it was dangerous, because the workmen were accustomed to assemble there, the court held there had been neglect which afforded ground for recovery. Ellsworth v. Metheney, 104 Fed. 119, 44 C. C. A. 484, 51 L. R. A. 389. In the other case an employé was hurt by an explosion while he was eating lunch on a dry knoll some distance from where he had been at work. According to the habit of the workmen, and as the employer knew, he had gone to the knoll to eat because the part of the grounds where he was working was marshy. He was allowed to recover. Thomas v. Railroad, 108 Minn. 485, 122 N. W. 456, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 954. In the emergency, such as, according to the immediate hypothesis, the plaintiff and his boss found themselves, it was as good cause to leave Savannah for the night as was the marshy ground for the injured employé to go to the dry knoll to spend his dinner hour. In another case very similar to this one, an electrical engineer had gone out on a line of the defendant railroad company to work, and in the course of his duty was due the next day at the station where the headquarters of the department were to receive further orders. He desired to get in the previous evening, so he might obtain a night's rest, and to accommodate him the train conductor at the station where he had been working telegraphed the conductor of a freight train which would pass the station to "slow down" there so plaintiff could get aboard and be carried to headquarters. The conductor did not cause the train to "slow down"; and, in endeavoring to catch the side of a car as it passed, the plaintiff fell under it and an arm and leg were cut off. A contested point therein, as here, was whether the plaintiff was engaged in interstate business when hurt; the railroad company arguing that he was not because, at the time, he was not engaged in any work at all for the company. In disposing of the proposition, the court declared it was the plaintiff's duty to get back to headquarters, and until his duties, begun in the morning, were concluded at night, he must be regarded as being engaged in interstate commerce; meaning, of course, that during the workday he was in the company's service, and as its trains were engaged in interstate transportation, the plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce. The point of the plaintiff's freedom of action at the close of the day was pressed; but the court rejected it because, as he was under the duty to return to headquarters, he was still occupied for the company when he attempted to return by the freight train. Dumphy v. Railroad, 82 W. Va. 123, 95 S. E. 863.

That an employé, on his way to and from his work, and using in his movements the premises or an instrumentality of the master, which he is authorized to use, is at the time in the master's service and may recover, if hurt by any negligible defect in the property, on the ground of a breach of the master's duty to furnish a safe place or appliance, is a doctrine accepted by many courts. But if, when hurt, he is going away from his task on his own business, or returning to it after leaving it on his own business, and not from some kind of compulsion, the same courts rule the other way. There is discord, real or apparent, in the decisions, and the cases pro and con are collected in notes to King v. Mendota Coal Co., L. R. A. 1916F, 1220, and to Taylor v. Bush & Sons Co., 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 853. And see Hartman v. Steamship Co. (D. C.) 244 Fed. 567. The court of last resort, in cases of injuries to employes of carriers engaged in interstate commerce, has declared on the subject as follows:

"In leaving the carrier's yard at the close of his day's work, the deceased was but discharging a duty of his employment. See North Carolina R. R. Co. v. Zachary, 232 U. S. 248, 260. Like his trip through the yard to his engine in the morning, it was a necessary incident of his day's work and partook of the character of that work as a whole; for it was no more an incident of one part than of another. His day's work was in both interstate and intrastate commerce, and so when he was leaving the yard at the time of the injury his employment was in both." Erie R. R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U. S. 170, 173, 37 Sup. Ct. 556, 557 (61 L. Ed. 1067, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 662).

The same principle of liability will govern if the employé was forced away from the locality of his task and to get back there was directed by his superior to use an instrumentality of the employer, when the order to do so was negligent by reason of the instrumentality being dangerous to use, either from a defect or its operation. If Hughes and plaintiff were in service, as determined by the test we have pointed out, when the former directed plaintiff to board the moving train, then the case is like one heretofore decided by this court, where an employer was held answerable to an employé injured while he was obeying a negligent order of his foreman to board a train. Foster v. Railroad, 115 Mo. 165, 21 S. W. 916. See, too, York v. Railroad, 117 Mo. 405, 22 S. W. 1081; Herdler v. Range Co., 136 Mo. 3, 37 S. W. 115.

[3] 2. We have to determine next whether plaintiff was engaged, when hurt, in a task so closely connected with interstate commerce as to bring him within the provisions of the federal Employers' Liability Act (Act Cong. approved April 22, 1908, 35 U. S. Stat. at L. 65, c. 149, as amended by act approved April 5, 1910 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665]). The statute makes a common carrier "liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce"; that is, in commerce between any of the several states or territories as provided in the first lines of the act. The meaning of the words "while he is engaged by such carrier in such commerce," controls the decision of the question whether state law or the federal act determines, in a particular case, the liability of the carrier to an injured employé. A mass of adjudications has been made on the subject by state courts of last resort and federal courts of intermediate resort, and some of them favor the view that plaintiff was injured while employed by defendant in interstate commerce. Grow v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 44 Utah, 160, 138 Pac. 398, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 481; Saunders v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 375, 83 S. E. 578. In the cited cases employés were killed while assisting to install on the lines of the defendant companies a system of automatic block signals similar, we understand, to the semaphore plaintiff was working on. The particular block or semaphore the deceased brakemen were helping to construct had not been completed or introduced into the general system of signaling devices. Nevertheless the courts thought the men were engaged in work connected with interstate commerce, because, in the first case, the portion of the system already completed was in use for signaling interstate trains, and the signaling block the deceased was engaged upon would be thus used when finished; and, in the second case, a new system of signals was in process of erection to take the place of an old system; exactly the fact here, except that this plaintiff was helping to build a single semaphore to be substituted for an old one. Without referring to other cases to the same effect, but less like this case in their facts, we state that, notwithstanding the cogency of the reasoning of the opinions, the force of all of them as precedents appears to be broken by the most recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on the subject.

1 Roberts, Fed. Liabl. of Carriers, § 485, p. 840. Where the carrier conducts both an intrastate and an interstate business, and its employés are occupied first with the one and then with the other, the relation of the particular work the employé is performing when hurt to the interstate business of the carrier, is resorted to as one criterion of whether the federal statute controls, and is the decisive criterion, we think, when the facts are like those before us. And in settling the tests of the application of the statute the courts have been forced to make close distinctions. According to the latest judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is not essential that the appliance the injured employé was working on at the time was or had been itself actually in use as a means of interstate commerce, if it was "so closely connected therewith as to be a part of it," to quote the language of the opinion in the Pedersen Case, 229 U. S. 146, 151, 33 Sup. Ct. 648, 649 (57 L. Ed. 1125, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 153). That plaintiff was injured through the negligence of a coemployé under these circumstances: A bridge over which interstate trains passed was in process of repair, and the repairs consisted in taking out an old girder and inserting a new one. A person had to pass over an intervening temporary bridge to reach the old one, and the temporary bridge was in use, too, for interstate trains. While carrying a sack of bolts over the temporary bridge to the one undergoing repair Pedersen was negligently run down by an interstate train. He was held to have been engaged in interstate commerce on this line of reasoning: Bridges are indispensable in such commerce and should be kept in repair, and the work of keeping them in repair "is so closely related to such commerce as to be in practice and legal contemplation a part of it." The court further said:

"The contention to the contrary proceeds upon the assumption that interstate commerce by railroads can be separated into its several elements and the nature of each determined regardless of its relation to others or to the business as a whole. But this is an erroneous assumption. The true test always is: Is the work in question a part of the interstate commerce in which the carrier is engaged? * * * Of course, we are not here concerned with the construction of tracks, bridges, engines or cars which have not as yet become instrumentalities in such commerce, but only with the work of maintaining them in proper condition after they have become such instrumentalities and during their use as such." We emphasize.

The court thought the work of taking bolts to the old bridge to be used in repairing it, though a minor task was essentially a part of the larger one. Those facts were held sufficient to sustain a finding that Pedersen was engaged in interstate commerce when injured. Three judges dissented, declaring the true rule was that only employes engaged in the work of interstate transportation were within the act, and not those who kept up the instrumentalities whereby transportation was conducted. The words we have emphasized suggest that, although an employe helping with repair work upon an appliance used in interstate traffic is within the statute, one engaged in constructing an appliance that will be, but has not yet been, so used, is outside the scope of the act. An employe who was negligently hurt while mining coal in a colliery of a carrier, the coal to be used in interstate commerce, was held not within the act. Del., etc., Ry. v. Yurkouis, 238 U. S. 439, 35 Sup. Ct. 902, 59 L. Ed. 1397. In Ill. Cent. R. Co. v. Behrens, a member of a switch crew was killed while assisting to move cars loaded with intrastate freight in the city of New Orleans; but the crew also handled interstate freight. The court decided the deceased was not within the purview of the federal act when killed, though, upon the completion of his immediate task, he was expected to engage in another which would have been a part of interstate transportation under the statute; "for by its terms," said the court, "the true test is the nature of the work being done at the time of the injury." 233 U. S. 473, 478, 34 Sup. Ct. 646, 648 (58 L. Ed. 1051, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 163). In Shanks v. Railroad Co. the rulings of the United States Supreme Court up to the date of the decision were reviewed, and in the light of them the plaintiff Shanks was held not to have been employed in interstate traffic while putting in a shaft to transmit power to machinery by which locomotives that drew both interstate and intrastate trains were repaired. The court said:

"Coming to apply the test to the case in hand, it is plain that Shanks was not employed in interstate transportation, or in repairing or keeping in usable condition a roadbed, bridge, engine, car or other instrument then in use in such transportation. What he was doing was altering the location of a fixture in a machine shop. The connection between the fixture and interstate transportation was remote at best, for the only function of the fixture was to communicate power to machinery used in repairing parts of engines some of which were used in such transportation." 239 U. S. 556, 559, 36 Sup. Ct. 188, 190 (60 L. Ed. 436, L. R. A. 1916C, 797).

The like ruling was made where an employe lost his life in switching coal from a storage track to a coal shed, thence to be taken to bins and chutes and used, as occasion required, on locomotives engaged in both kinds of commerce. The court said there was no close or direct relation to interstate transportation in taking the coal to the chutes; that the employe was doing no more than putting the supply in a convenient place for use when it was required. Chicago, etc., Ry. v. Harrington, 241 U. S. 177, 36 Sup. Ct. 517, 60 L. Ed. 941. A plaintiff had been injured while working in a tunnel which was in the process of construction by a carrier and to be part of its line for all its trains. At the time of the accident it was incomplete and had never been used in interstate commerce. The opinion said it was certain under the recent decisions of the court, whatever doubt might have existed at the time the judgment below was rendered, that the plaintiff was not engaged in interstate commerce at the time he was hurt; consequently no cause of action was alleged under the federal act. Raymond v. Railroad, 243 U. S. 43, 37 Sup. Ct. 268, 61 L. Ed. 583. An employe hurt while employed on the construction of a bridge which had never been provided with rails nor used as a railroad was not doing interstate work when hurt in the course of his employment, although the employer intended the bridge to be a means of interstate traffic when it was completed. Bravis v. Railroad, 217 Fed. 234, 133 C. C. A. 228. The opinion said the bridge had not been used in interstate transportation and could not be used until finished; the fact that the intention was to use it at some future time did not make it a means of interstate commerce; the intention might be changed and the bridge not be used in that way at all. Answering the argument that the cutoff, of which the bridge would constitute a part, was the correction of a defect in the defendant's road for interstate trains, the court said the argument was too remote and inconsequential; that the building of the cutoff was a new construction work as much as would be the building of a new engine or car to take the place of an engine or car worn out in interstate commerce.

The national courts in construing the act in question, and in order to determine the status of an employe injured when employed upon an instrumentality which, as yet, has not been put into use in interstate business, but is intended to be, have drawn a distinction between construction work and repair work, and hold a workman engaged in repairs on an appliance employed in interstate traffic is within the provisions of the act; whereas one helping to make a new appliance to be thus used in the future is not so engaged. This is the rule formulated in an exhaustive annotation on the question, wherein many cases are cited in its support. Airliné R. R. v. Horton, L. R. A. 1915C, note on foot of page 63. It is true, as said in a well-reasoned case, the distinction between repairs and construction work must not be too finely drawn; the particular matter the court then had under advisement being whether an employe killed in putting in new cross-arms on old poles to carry electric wires used in telegraphing and signaling was engaged in interstate commerce. The court held the work was in the nature of repairs, and therefore the case fell within the federal act. Ross v. Sheldon, 176 Iowa, 618, 154 N. W. 499. Neither the semaphore plaintiff was assisting to build nor the new depot was yet in use in any kind of commerce; for the old semaphore and depot had not been discarded. In fact the new ones were incomplete and the semaphore appears to have been far from completion. As suggested by Judge Sanborn, in the Bravis Case, neither had ever been used, and it is possible neither ever would be used, for some mishap might destroy them.

[4-6] The substantive rules of tort liability, as fixed by the adjudications in this state, differ materially from those which obtain in cases falling under the federal statute, particularly in regard to the doctrines of contributory negligence and assumption of the risk. Under the law of the state, contributory negligence on the part of an injured party is usually a defense; whereas under the federal statute it goes only to reduce damages; and assumption of the risk is given a wider scope by the national courts than is allowed in Missouri. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that in a case within the act of Congress, the federal law "is exclusive and supersedes state laws upon the subject." Chicago, etc., Ry. v. Wright, 239 U. S. 548, 551, 36 Sup. Ct. 185, 186 (60 L. Ed. 431). For these reasons it is plain that if a cause of action was not within the scope of the act, but was tried as though it were, it must be retried unless the rules of law, affecting liability and as established by the courts of the state, are the same as those which obtain under the federal statute, or are less favorable to the party against whom the verdict was given.

Plaintiff's counsel insists defendant should not be heard to say no recovery can be had under the federal act, because the court, at defendant's request, instructed against a verdict on the second count, which declared on a common-law liability. Maybe there would be force to this contention if defendant had insisted below the question of its liability was governed by the federal law; but the position taken by defendant was that there was no case under either law, and so it requested a charge that plaintiff was not entitled to recover on the first count, and another charge that he was not entitled to recover under the second count. The court refused the first request and gave the second—erroneously, we think.

[7-9] 3. Too much attention was given by both sides to the free pass Hughes had for himself and plaintiff. The defendant contends plaintiff was a trespasser in attempting to board a freight train, because the pass gave no right to ride on freight trains, and under the rules of the company it could not be used in that way. Neither plaintiff nor Hughes knew anything about the rules, and plaintiff did not know anything about the terms of the pass, and, if Hughes' testimony is true, he did not; for he said similar passes always had been honored by the conductors of freight trains. In fact this very one was honored on the trip from Savannah to McAlester. There is no merit in the contention that plaintiff was attempting to trespass.

The free pass was admissible as an item of evidence to prove plaintiff was under Hughes' authority, inasmuch as it read in favor of Hughes and "1 man," and had been turned over to him. Being in Hughes' custody all the time, so that if separated from him plaintiff would have been deprived of its benefit, and maybe without means of any kind to take him to Savannah, it bore upon the issue of plaintiff's contributory negligence and assumption of the risk. It was treated in the second instruction given for plaintiff in a manner to magnify, in the eyes of the jury, its importance, and confuse them regarding the issues to which it was relevant. Wherefore the instruction was a comment on one part of the evidence, and adapted to give the impression that the possession of Hughes made his order to plaintiff a negligent one. As we have said, the pass and his custody of it had a bearing on his authority to give the order, and on whether or not plaintiff was justified in obeying it, but did not have a bearing on the issue of the character of the order. That matter depended on the speed of the train, the experience of plaintiff, his physical condition, and the like facts. The jury's attention should not have been fixed on the pass to the degree it was in an instruction submitting the issues of whether the order of Hughes was negligently given and whether he ought to have known it was. Smith v. Woodmen of the World, 179 Mo. 119, 77 S. W. 862. Though this error by itself may not have been prejudicial to the extent of causing a reversal, it should be avoided on another trial.

If we are right in our judgment that the case does not come within the federal act, the issues of contributory negligence and assumption of the risk will be governed by the rules of law touching those subject that prevail in this state.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

BLAIR, P. J., and WOODSON, J., concur.

GRAVES, J. (dissenting). I dissent in this case because the plaintiff's evidence, in my judgment, fails to make a case either at common law or under the federal act. I agree with my learned Brother in his reasoning as to there being no showing of liability under the federal act; but I am of opinion that neither Hughes nor plaintiff was about the master's business at the time of the accident. The evidence as to their reason for the trip to McAlester is entirely too shadowy to form the basis of liability. The necessity of such a trip is not sufficiently shown. It is highly improbable that these two men could not have found food and lodging at or near their place of work. At least it is clear that plaintiff made no effort so to do and was in no position to show necessity for his trip.

Other suggestions might be made, but these will suffice. I therefore dissent.

STATE v. HARRIS. (No. 21998.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.

1. Incest ⚡10—Rape ⚡20—Information held sufficient.

Under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 4381, 4471, 4725, and Laws 1913, p. 218, an information charging statutory rape, and incest held sufficient.

2. Marriage ⚡50(1) — Witnesses ⚡52(7) — Evidence held to show common-law marriage, making woman's testimony inadmissible.

In criminal prosecution, evidence held to make a prima facie case of common-law marriage between accused and woman offered as witness by the state, which, being uncontroverted, rendered the witness incompetent to testify against accused's objection, under Rev. St. 1909, § 5242.

3. Rape ⚡57(1)—Evidence of prosecutrix's age sufficient to go to jury.

In trial for statutory rape, evidence held to make it a jury question whether the complaining witness was under 15 at time of the alleged crime.

4. Criminal law ⚡371(9)—Other acts of intercourse not admissible to show intent in statutory rape case.

In view of Const. art. 2, §§ 12, 22, in trial for statutory rape, the court erred in permitting the state to show, for the purpose of showing intent, other acts of intercourse by accused, aside from that charged in the information; intent and motive being immaterial as to statutory rape.

Williams, P. J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Criminal Court, Greene County; Arch A. Johnson, Judge.

William Harris was convicted of rape, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

On December 11, 1918, the prosecuting attorney of Greene county, Mo., filed in the office of the clerk of the criminal court of said county an information in two counts, charging defendant, William Harris, with the crimes of statutory rape and incest. On December 13, 1918, appellant filed a demurrer to said information, which was overruled. On December 14, 1918, defendant was arraigned, and entered a plea of not guilty as charged in the information. On December 14, 1918, the case was tried before a jury of Greene county aforesaid, and a verdict was returned in words and figures following, to wit:

"We, the jury, find the defendant, William Harris, guilty of rape as charged in the first count of the information, and assess his punishment at imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of ninety-nine (99) years.

"Frank Killingsworth, Foreman."

On December 17, 1918, defendant filed his motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment, which were respectively overruled on December 19, 1918. On said last-named date sentence was duly pronounced in accordance with the terms of the verdict aforesaid. The Evidence.

The state's evidence tends to show that the defendant in this case, William Harris, was 42 years of age, and the father of three daughters, Ruth, Lucy, and Josephine. The mother of these girls was deceased, and defendant had for about 7 or 8 years been living with one Etta Wheaton, who, under the name of Etta Harris, held herself out as his wife. She testified that she was everywhere introduced as such, and was referred to as "mother" by the children. On or about August, 1917, the defendant, Etta Wheaton, Lucy, and Josephine moved to the farm of Luther Byrum, some three or four miles southeast of Springfield, in Greene county. On this farm, besides the dwelling house, was a large two-story barn. In the lower portion was kept, besides the stock, small grain, such as oats and corn. The upper portion, or loft, was used for the storing of hay. It was in this barn that defendant committed the acts, constituting the crime for the commission of which he was charged and convicted. The daughters of defendant were accustomed to help him with his chores and were frequently with him in the barn. It was during one of these occasions that defendant had sexual intercourse with Lucy and Josephine. The latter testified on the witness stand that she was present at that time, and saw her father have intercourse with Lucy. He had her lie down upon the hay, unbuttoned his trousers, raised her clothes, got on top of her, and had connection with her. She testified further that, after the act with Lucy, he then called to her to come and lie down on the hay, and with her he also had intercourse. Defendant gave Lucy 10 cents and Josephine 5 cents, as the latter said, "for that." Josephine stated she saw defendant have intercourse with Lucy once after that, and, while she did not know how many times her father had had improper relations with Lucy, yet she knew he did so in the barn "quite a few times." Sometimes it would be upstairs, and sometimes down. Josephine, according to her testimony was 18 years of age.

Etta Wheaton testified that she had been living with the defendant about 7 years, during all of which time, she held herself out to the public as his wife, and had lived with him until very recently, until the girls came and told her stories against their father; that she last lived with defendant in Plattsburg, Mo., and while they were residing there she saw defendant early one morning get into the bed with Lucy. They were both in their nightclothes. She afterwards accused defendant of having had intercourse with his daughter, and shortly after that time he left Plattsburg. In July she heard that her husband had married another woman, Alice Weaver. She then wrote to Miss Hull, the police matron of Springfield, stating in her letter that defendant had been having sexual intercourse with Lucy. She further testified that, after the marriage of defendant, she sent Lucy, who was then living with her, to Springfield to her father for him to take care of; that she also discovered her husband in the act of intercourse with another daughter, Ruth, in Patton alley in the city of Springfield.

When Lucy was called to the stand, she stated that she was born in Monteer, Shannon county, Mo., and lived there until she was of the age of 9 years. While living in Monteer, her father had intercourse with her. From Monteer they moved to Springfield, and then to the Byrum farm in that vicinity. Here again, she states, he had intercourse with her—how many times she does not know. Her story bears out that of Josephine in nearly every particular as to the acts of intercourse committed in the barn. Lucy testified that she was 14 years of age.

On behalf of the defendant the evidence tended to show that he had been living with Etta Harris (Wheaton) for nearly 7 or 8 years, and that they were living together as husband and wife; that, while they were on the Byrum farm, he never did, at any time, have sexual or criminal relations with either Lucy or Josephine, nor did he in Plattsburg at any time have intercourse with Lucy; that the time referred to by Etta Wheaton he had merely gone to Lucy's bed, and kissed her, before starting to his work. In this he is supported by Lucy, for she testified that it was not true.

Ruth Hunter, another daughter, testified that she never did, at any time, see any improper relationship between her father and Josephine or Lucy; that neither of her sisters had at any time made any complaint to her, or in her presence, relative to any mistreatment of them by her father; that it is not true her father, at any time, ever had sexual intercourse with her.

Defendant maintains that this charge was instituted against him because of jealousy. Both Ruth and Lucy testified that, at the time Etta Wheaton learned of his marriage, she was very angry. Ruth stated that Etta tried to get her to go to Springfield and swear out a warrant against her father; that upon her refusal to do so Etta persuaded Lucy to do so.

Mrs. Weaver, who testified in behalf of defendant, stated that Lucy came to her house shortly before the trial, and stayed overnight; that she stated to her that the charges made against the defendant, her father, by her (Lucy) were false; that Mrs. Wheaton had forced her under heavy threats, and she had been induced to make the charge by Mr. O'Day and Miss Hull. In her cross-examination, Lucy testified that she had told Mrs. Weaver the charges against her father were false. She further testified that she wrote a letter to the prosecuting attorney, and told him she did not want to testify against her father, for the reason that the charges were false.

There is some evidence that Lucy was in the habit of frequenting streets and rooming houses with men; that her reputation in this connection was bad; and William McIlheny, deputy sheriff of Greene county, testified that, when Lucy and Josephine attended school out near his place, their reputation for telling the truth was not good.

Cash Lawhead, clerk of the circuit court of Howell county, testified, that Record Book O of said court contained an entry showing that defendant had been convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary from Howell county for the breaking of jail. The defendant himself stated that he had been so convicted, and served a term of two years in the penitentiary.

Such other facts as may be necessary will be considered in the opinion. The defendant, in due time, appealed the cause to this court.

Val Mason and John H. Fairman, both of Springfield, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and H. P. Ragland and J. W. Broadus, Asst. Attys. Gen., for the State.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The information, omitting caption and verification, reads as follows:

"Paul O'Day, prosecuting attorney within and for the county of Greene, in the state of Missouri, under his oath of office informs the court that William Harris, late of the county and state aforesaid, on the — day of September, A. D. 1900, at the county of Howell and state of Missouri, was then and there convicted in the circuit court of Howell county, Missouri, of the crime of breaking jail and escaping, and was sentenced to serve a term of two years in the penitentiary, and was afterwards discharged upon compliance with his sentence, and thereafter on or about the — day of September, 1917, in the county of Greene, in the state of Missouri, the said William Harris then and there upon one Lucy Harris, a female child under the age of fifteen years, to wit, of the age of fourteen years, unlawfully and feloniously did make an assault, and her, the said Lucy Harris, then and there unlawfully and feloniously did carnally know and abuse, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the state.

"And the said Paul O'Day, prosecuting attorney within and for the county of Greene, in the state of Missouri, under his oath of office further informs the court that William Harris, late of the county and state aforesaid, on the — day of September, A. D. 1909, at the county of Howell and state of Missouri, was then and there convicted in the circuit court of Howell county, Missouri, of the crime of breaking jail and escaping, and was sentenced to serve a term of two years in the penitentiary, and was afterwards discharged upon compliance with his sentence, and thereafter on or about the — day of September, 1917, in the county of Greene, in the state of Missouri, the said William Harris being then and there the father of one Lucy Harris, and the said William Harris and Lucy Harris being then and there persons within the degree of consanguinity within which marriages are by law declared to be incestuous and void, to wit, being then and there father and daughter, did then and there unlawfully, incestuously, knowingly, feloniously, and willfully commit fornication with each other, by then and there having sexual intercourse together, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the state.

"Paul O'Day, Prosecuting Attorney."

The above information is sufficient to meet the requirements of the law. Section 4471, R. S. 1909; section 4725, R. S. 1909; Laws of 1913, p. 218; section 4381, R. S. 1909; State v. Oertel, 217 S. W. loc. cit. 66; Kelley's Crim. Law & Practice, § 935.

[2] 2. It is contended by appellant that:

"The court erred in admitting, over the objection and exception of the defendant, the testimony of Etta Harris, who was the legal wife of defendant."

This assignment presents an important inquiry in the case, and can only be determined by the evidence before us. It appears from the record that Etta Wheaton (Harris) had a case pending against her in above court, wherein she was charged with the crime of living in adultery with defendant. She was offered as a witness by the state, and her counsel objected to her competency as a witness, because any testimony that she might give may tend to incriminate herself, and because she is the wife of defendant. Defendant likewise objected to her testifying as a witness in the case, because she is the common-law wife of defendant. This last objection was overruled, and an exception duly saved by defendant. Upon examination by defendant's counsel, Etta Harris testified as follows:

"Q. You say you commenced to live with the defendant, William Harris, about 7 years ago? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And have lived with him all the time, until recently, as his wife, haven't you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Been introduced as his wife? A. Everywhere.

"Q. Been known as his wife everywhere? A. Yes, sir."

On cross-examination, she testified substantially as above quoted.

Josephine Harris, witness for the state, testified on this subject as follows:

"Q. Who lived there on the Byrum place? A. Who lived there with us?

"Q. Yes, what members of your family? A. My father and sister Lucy and my stepmother.

"Q. What is your stepmother's name? A. Etta Wheaton.

"Q. You say your stepmother; do you mean to say that William Harris, your father, and Etta Wheaton, lived together as man and wife? A. They were man and wife.

"Q. That is your understanding? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You mean to say you understand they were married? A. Yes, sir."

Defendant testified as follows:

"Q. I will ask you to state to the jury how long you lived with Etta Harris. A. Well, now, I couldn't say positively, 7 or 8 years.

"You lived in this town (Springfield) a good part of that time? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. During all that time you and Etta Harris were living together as husband and wife? A. Yes, sir; that was because I intended to marry her."

The testimony of Lucy Harris tends to corroborate that heretofore quoted, in regard to the alleged common-law marriage of defendant and Etta Harris.

There is nothing in the record tending to contradict the testimony heretofore quoted. Regardless of the law relating to marriages in other jurisdictions, we are satisfied, from the foregoing testimony, a prima facie case was made tending to show that at the time of trial defendant and Etta Harris sustained, as to each other, under the laws of this state, the relation of husband and wife. Cargile et al. v. Wood et al., 63 Mo. 501; Dyer v. Brannock, 66 Mo. 391, 400, 27 Am. Rep. 359; State v. Gonce, 79 Mo. 600; State v. Cooper, 103 Mo. 266, 15 S. W. 327; Topper v. Perry, 197 Mo. 531, 95 S. W. 203, 114 Am. St. Rep. 777; Bishop v. Brittain Inv. Co., 229 Mo. loc. cit. 728, 729, 730, 731, 129 S. W. 668, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 868; Pope v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 175 S. W. loc. cit. 957; Rauch v. Metz, 212 S. W. loc. cit. 362; Imboden v. Trust Co., 111 Mo. App. 234, 86 S. W. 263; Plattner v. Plattner, 116 Mo. App. 405, 91 S. W. 457; Davis v. Stouffer, 132 Mo. App. 555, 112 S. W. 282; 18 Ruling Case Law, § 14, p. 393.

Without any evidence in the record tending to controvert the facts relating to the common-law marriage aforesaid, we are of the opinion, that the trial court committed error in permitting Etta Harris to testify as a witness in the case, over the objection of defendant. In a criminal prosecution against the husband, the wife cannot legally testify against him, over his objection. Section 5242, R. S. 1909; State v. Evans, 138 Mo. loc. cit. 125, 39 S. W. 462, 60 Am. St. Rep. 549.

[3] 3. It is strenuously insisted that the trial court committed error in submitting the cause to the jury, without the state proving that Lucy Harris, in September, 1917, was under the age of 15 years. Lucy Harris testified, without objection, that she was 14 years of age. Her mother was dead, and the defendant failed to testify upon this subject. The state offered the best evidence obtainable. It is claimed the testimony of Mrs. Weaver discloses that Lucy Harris was 16 years of age. This testimony was given at the trial in December, 1918. The information charges that the offense was committed in September, 1917. It was therefore a question for the jury as to whether Lucy Harris was under 15 years of age in September, 1917, when the offense is alleged to have been committed.

[4] 4. It is claimed that the trial court erred in permitting the state to show other acts of intercourse on the part of defendant, aside from that charged in the information. This testimony was not properly objected to by defendant, but in the instructions given by the court, and to the giving of which defendant objected at the time, the following appears:

"And in this connection you are further instructed that testimony of other acts of sexual intercourse by the defendant with Lucy Harris or Ruth Harris are competent only for the purpose of showing the intent with which the defendant acted on the occasion on which the defendant is charged and on trial in this case."

That is to say, this instruction means that the other acts of sexual intercourse are competent, for the purpose of fixing the intent with which the defendant had sexual intercourse with Lucy, as charged, in September, 1917. Now, if Lucy, at that time, was under 15 years of age, the intent with which the act was done is wholly immaterial, as the crime was committed, if the defendant had sexual intercourse with Lucy under such circumstances, regardless of his intent. In the recent case of State v. Belknap, 221 S. W. 39 not yet [officially] reported, the following assignment of error was made:

"The court erred in allowing the state to introduce evidence of many attacks, when the defendant could only be tried for one attack and one crime."

The author of this opinion, in passing upon the above assignment, said:

"This contention is without merit. The evidence of the prosecutrix, in respect to this matter, 'was given without objection.' In addition thereto, 'defendant' had her testify as to 'still other assaults' of defendant, 'not referred to in chief.'"

The above-quoted portion of the opinion is correct, and we have no fault to find with same, but as a matter of obiter dicta we further observed:

"These different assaults were admissible for the purpose of showing an intent upon the part of defendant, even if an objection had been made. State v. Miller, 263 Mo. l. c. 334, par. II, 172 S. W. 385, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1099; State v. Campbell, 210 Mo. l. c. 233, 109 S. W. 706, 14 Ann. Cas. 403; State v. Patrick, 107 Mo. l. c. 155, 17 S. W. 666."

Upon a careful reconsideration of the above question, we are now of the opinion that the last quotation above mentioned does not properly declare the law under the statute, where defendant is charged with statutory rape upon a female child under 15 years of age. Under such circumstances, it is immaterial what motive may have induced the defendant to commit the act, nor what his intention was in committing the same. If he had sexual intercourse with Lucy Harris in September, 1917, and she was under 15 years of age at the time, he was guilty of statutory rape, without regard to the intent with which the act was done.

Other crimes of a similar nature are independent, for which defendant may be tried and convicted, if pleaded in separate counts of information. They can have no bearing on the question, as to whether Lucy Harris was under 15 years of age in August, 1917, nor as to whether defendant had sexual intercourse with her during said time. Hence defendant's prior or subsequent acts of sexual intercourse, whether with Lucy Harris or any other female, on principle and common fairness, should not be the subject of inquiry before the jury, unless covered by a separate count in the information, in which the state is proceeding against him in respect to such charge, as an independent crime.

5. Aside from the foregoing observations, and considered from a constitutional viewpoint, the prior and subsequent acts of sexual intercourse, heretofore referred to, ought not to be the subject of investigation, unless charged as separate and independent crimes, in separate counts of the information. Section 12 of article 2 of our Constitution provides that:

"No person shall be prosecuted criminally for felony or misdemeanor otherwise than by indictment or information, which shall be concurrent remedies," etc. (Italics ours.)

It is evident that the framers of our Constitution contemplated that every man was presumed to be innocent of crime until proven guilty. They contemplated that the courts should give the accused the benefit of this presumption in prosecutions for crimes. They did not contemplate that the state might charge defendant with the specific crime of statutory rape in August, 1917, and, proceeding by ambush, attempt to prove another independent crime of the same nature on the 1st day of January, 1918, having no connection with the one under consideration, which had never been pleaded in the information, and without any opportunity having been afforded the accused to meet said charge. To our mind it is plain that the framers of said section 12 intended, in cases like the one before us, that the state should set out in different counts of the information the separate, independent crimes sought to be investigated at the trial.

Section 22 of the same article of our Constitution clearly recognizes the justice of this contention, for it is there said:

"In criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right * * * to demand the nature and cause of the accusation," etc. (Italics ours.)

Does this mean that he may be informed for the first time at the trial as to the nature and accusation against him in respect to these independent crimes not mentioned in the information? Or does it contemplate that no inquiry can be had in respect to these independent crimes, which have no bearing on the case in question, unless the information so charges, by an appropriate court, in order that defendant, in the orderly administration of justice, may be informed as to the charges which he will be called upon to meet?

We therefore conclude that, whether tested upon principle or by the provisions of our Constitution, other similar acts of intercourse, aside from the one charged in the information, which tend to show statutory rape, should not be investigated at the trial, unless covered by the information in a separate count, as constituting a separate crime. No injustice can be done the state in construing the law as above indicated, for, if the prosecuting attorney is in possession of evidence tending to show prior and subsequent acts of a similar character, he can investigate the same at the trial under separate counts of the information, without being required to elect on which count he will proceed. By pursuing the latter course, the state guarantees to the accused a constitutional trial in the open, with knowledge of the nature and accusation presented against him.

6. Pursuing the same subject still further, let us consider the concrete case presented here. The defendant is charged in the information with having committed the crime of statutory rape by having sexual intercourse with Lucy Harris, a female child under the age of 15 years, in Greene county, Mo. It was only necessary for the state to prove at the trial that defendant had sexual intercourse with Lucy Harris in Greene county, Mo., at the time charged in the information, and that at said date she was under 15 years of age. If defendant had sexual intercourse with Lucy Harris under said circumstances, he was guilty of statutory rape at that time, regardless of the motive or intent with which he committed the same, regardless of his past character, life, and conduct, and regardless of his subsequent acts and conduct. Other acts of a similar character, either prior or subsequent to that charged in the information, are not admissible in evidence, according to our conception of the law, unless pleaded in separate counts as independent crimes, and investigated accordingly.

The conclusions heretofore announced are sustained by well-considered authorities, among which may be found the following: State v. Spray, 174 Mo. 569, 74 S. W. 846, and numerous cases cited; State v. Boatright, 182 Mo. loc. cit. 51, 81 S. W. 450; State v. Hyde, 234 Mo. loc. cit. 224, 225, 136 S. W. 316, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 191; State v. Teeter, 289 Mo. 475, 144 S. W. 445; State v. Wellman, 253 Mo. 302, 161 S. W. 795; State v. Bersch, 276 Mo. loc. cit. 414, 415, 416, 207 S. W. 809; 8 Ruling Case Law, § 194, p. 198. Authorities may be found to the contrary, but, keeping in mind the provisions of our Constitution, supra, and that crimes of the character charged here speak for themselves, regardless of the motives or intent with which they are committed, they should not be followed in this kind of a case.

7. We have considered all the questions necessary in the retrial of the cause. On account of the errors heretofore pointed out, the cause is reversed and remanded for a new trial.

MOZLEY, C., concurs.

WHITE, C., concurs, except as to paragraphs 4, 5, and 6.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of RAILEY, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

WALKER and WILLIAMSON, JJ., concur. WILLIAMS, P. J., concurs in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 7, and result, but dissents as to the views expressed in paragraphs 4, 5, and 6, on the ground that evidence of prior acts of sexual intercourse between the same persons is admissible, not for the purpose of proving intent, but for the purpose of proving defendant guilty of the crime with which he stands charged, under the rule announced in State v. Palmberg, 190 Mo. 233, loc. cit. 250, 97 S. W. 586, 116 Am. St. Rep. 476.

STATE v. MORGAN. (No. 21928.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Burglary \S 22—Omission of information to allege ownership of car broken into fatal.

Omission of information for burglary in the second degree and larceny to allege the ownership of the railroad car charged to have been entered is fatal.

2. Criminal law \S 1832(5)—Failure to allege ownership of car broken into may be raised in Supreme Court.

The objection that an information charging burglary in the second degree and larceny fails to allege the ownership of the car charged to have been broken into may be raised for the first time in the Supreme Court.

Error to Circuit Court, Jackson County;
Ralph S. Latashaw, Judge.

Oscar B. Morgan pleaded guilty to burglary, and after sentence he brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Frans E. Lindquist, of Kansas City, for plaintiff in error.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and Lewis Hord Cook, Sp. Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMSON, J. The appellant, Oscar B. Morgan, pleaded guilty to the charge of burglary only, in an information charging him with the crime of burglary in the second degree and larceny, and was sentenced to confinement in the state penitentiary for the term of three years. Upon that judgment he has duly sued out a writ of error.

The offense charged in the information is that appellant—

"did unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously break into and enter a certain building, a railroad car No. 8364-M & St. L., there situate, the same being a building in which divers goods, wares, merchandise, and valuable things were then and there kept for sale and deposited, with felonious intent the said goods, wares, merchandise, and valuable things in the said building then and there being then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously to steal, take, and carry away, and hats, caps, of the value of eighteen dollars, of the value of eighteen dollars, of the goods and property of Missouri Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation, in said building then and there being found, did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously steal, take, and carry away, against the peace and dignity of the state."

[1, 2] It will be observed that the information contains no allegation of the ownership of the railroad car therein mentioned. The state confesses that this omission is fatal. It has been so held times without number. State v. Henschel, 250 Mo. 263, 157 S. W. 311; State v. Kelley, 206 Mo. 685, 105 S. W. 606, 12 Ann. Cas. 681; State v. Evans, 217 S. W. 30. It would serve no useful purpose to reiterate the oft-repeated reasoning upon which such informations are held to be defective. Such an objection may be raised for the first time in this court. State v. Henschel, supra; State v. Patterson, 159 Mo. 98, 59 S. W. 1104.

This case should be reversed and remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. It is so ordered.

All concur.

STATE v. STETSON et al. (No. 21907.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Criminal law \S 1169(7) — Evidence that third person had pleaded guilty to crime charged against defendants held prejudicial error.

In a prosecution for robbery in the first degree brought against two defendants, testimony that a third party had pleaded guilty to the same charge held prejudicial error, in view of other evidence connecting such third party with defendants and creating a suspicion that they were all members of one group.

2. Criminal law \S 374—Evidence of other offenses held improper, in absence of preliminary identification of defendants.

In prosecution of two defendants for robbery, testimony by a state's witness that he had been held up the same night by three men driving a truck, but that he was unable to identify the defendants as the persons involved held error, since facts in connection with other crimes should not be introduced without first identifying the defendants with the crime.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Wilson A. Taylor, Judge.

Joseph Stetson and W. F. Schantz were convicted of robbery in the first degree, and they appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Frank C. O'Malley, of St. Louis, for appellants.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and Clarence P. Le Mire, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WHITE, C. By information filed in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis the appellants and one John Lennon were jointly charged with robbery in the first degree. Lennon pleaded guilty. The other two defendants were put upon trial before a jury which returned a verdict of guilty and assessed their punishments at imprisonment in the penitentiary for five years. From that judgment they appealed.

John J. Kuhn, a grocer, employed at 2701 Russell avenue in the city of St. Louis, lived at 2912 Shenandoah avenue in the south central part of the city. On the evening of the 8th of March, 1919, Kuhn's wife and two children were visiting her cousin at 4644 Newberry terrace. After Kuhn quit work that evening he walked home and started to the place where his wife was visiting, for the purpose of accompanying her and the children home. After alighting from the street car about two blocks from his destination, 4644 Newberry terrace, Kuhn started to walk that distance. This was between 11:15 and 11:45 at night. On his way he was accosted by three men, one of whom drew a gun. They held him up and robbed him of his watch and something over $40 in money. After the highwaymen had robbed him they told him to run up the alley. Instead of that he yelled for help, and the robbers took to their heels. He followed them a short distance, and saw them get into a light automobile truck and drive away. Defendant Stetson was 18 years of age, and Schantz was 20 years of age.

About a week later the officers arrested Walter Stetson, brother of the defendant, one John Mott, and one Tony Ellerman. The last named owned a grocery and saloon and the Ford truck in which it was suspected the robbers escaped after the holdup. The defendant Joseph Stetson went to the police station for the purpose of inquiring why his brother was detained there, when Kuhn, who was present, identified him as one of the robbers. Subsequently, after other arrests were made, six all together, Kuhn "picked out" from the six the three against whom the information was filed. Evidence was offered to show that several other holdups took place by men in a Ford truck that same night. Kuhn did not recognize the truck in which the robbers fled from where he was robbed as a Ford truck at the time, but afterwards claimed to have identified the same truck when he saw it at the police station.

The defense was an alibi. Each of the defendants swore that he went to a picture show that evening, each at a different place, and was at home in bed before the hour at which the holdup took place. Each was corroborated by members of his own family. Several character witnesses were introduced in defense to show that the defendants enjoyed good reputations.

I. Error is assigned to the action of the court in permitting Kuhn, the prosecuting witness, to refer to Lennon, the codefendant, as the "fellow who pleaded guilty," and to the remarks made by the circuit attorney and by the court in that connection. Kuhn in explaining the incident used these words:

"Those two young men (referring to the defendants) and the one that pleaded guilty held me up."

Objection was made to this remark, and the court instructed the jury to disregard the statements made by the witness. The witness, however, several times later mentioned Lennon in the same way—as the one who pleaded guilty.

The court gave no further instruction to the jury in relation to the statement, but admonished the witness not to speak of Lennon in that manner. Finally, after the witness had repeatedly referred to Lennon as the one who had pleaded guilty, the attorney for defendant made a vigorous complaint, and demanded the state should produce Lennon, when this occurred:

"The Court: I don't think so; proceed. (To which ruling of the court the defendants Stetson and Schantz then and there duly excepted.)

"Mr. Lacy: If one of the men implicated in the crime happens to plead guilty, we can't help that; and I think that these defendants are fully protected by your honor's instructions, and I think that the jurors know their duty, and that they won't consider the plea of guilty against these men; and they will not do it, I know.

"The Court: Proceed with the case.

"Mr. O'Malley: I am going to offer some testimony, but I suppose your honor will not permit it.

"The Court: Then why are you going to offer it? I presume that Lennon pleaded guilty because he was guilty. Proceed with the case." (To which ruling and statement of the court the defendants Stetson and Schantz then and there duly excepted.)

In order to appreciate the significance and effect of these statements, it is necessary to understand the relation of the boys to each other. Each of the defendants on trial admitted that he was acquainted with Lennon. It was shown that they and Lennon were associates. When John P. Roach, sergeant detective, was on the stand he testified that he had information that all "three stickups" on the night of March 8th were by men driving a Ford truck. He arrested the owner of the truck, Tony Ellerman, the defendant Stetson's brother, and one Mott, and subsequently Lennon and the other two defendants. He explained his method in this way:

"Q. How did you happen to pick up Lennon? A. Well, if you want me to explain it, I can explain it.

"Q. All right. A. I know these boys for 14 years.

"Q. What boys? A. The whole bunch of them; I walked 10 years over there.

"Q. What boys? A. Lennon and the two Stetson boys and Schantz and John O'Brien and a kid named Carrigan; and after I got this information about the truck, I knew who was driving the truck.

"Q. Who was driving it? A. Walter Stetson; and I knew right away who to figure on in doing this job.

"Q. Do you know anybody else that drives a Ford truck?"

[1] Thus we have the suspicion of an officer directed to a certain group of boys, including the three defendants. When he got information about the truck, he knew who was driving it; that is, he knew some one of the gang he had just mentioned, including Lennon, the two Stetson boys, and Schantz. He "knew right away who to figure on in doing this job." Thus the two defendants were directly connected with Lennon; manifestly the impression was made upon the jury at once that the three went together, operated together. If Lennon was guilty, of course the other defendants were guilty. They were so closely associated in the suspicion and explanation of the detective that the jury naturally would conclude that the guilt of one was evidence of the guilt of all. Under these circumstances it was highly improper to show in any way that Lennon had pleaded guilty. The court, after once instructing the jury to disregard the statement, permitted the witness to repeat the identification of Lennon as "the boy that pleaded guilty" without a sufficiently forcible reprimand to put a stop to it. Then the circuit attorney so far forgot himself as to state, "If one of the men implicated in the crime happens to plead guilty, we can't help that." This is a most damaging statement. It is an assertion by the prosecuting officer that, of the three men "implicated in the crime," two were present in court undergoing a trial. The judge of the court followed this by saying: "I presume that Lennon pleaded guilty because he was guilty." The effect was not removed when the court immediately afterwards admonished the witness Kuhn "not to tell the jury that any more." That remark rather aggravated the situation after the judge and the prosecutor both had told the jury that one of the three associates in the crime had pleaded guilty.

The entire incident was prejudicial; the jury could hardly escape being strongly influenced by it against the defendants. A reversal of the case on that account is necessary. State v. Jackson, 95 Mo. loc. cit. 652, 653, 8 S. W. 749; State v. Lovan, 245 Mo. loc. cit. 538, 151 S. W. 141; State v. Drew, 213 S. W. 106; State v. Stegner, 276 Mo. loc. cit. 440, 207 S. W. 826.

[2] II. When James Thornton, a colored man, was sworn as a witness for the state and testified that he was held up that same night, March 8th, by three men driving a Ford truck, he was unable to identify the defendants as the men who did the job. The reception of this evidence is assigned as error. The evidence was incompetent because of the lack of identification by the witness, but the statement of the witness, describing the way he was robbed, was introduced before any objection was made, and the only facts sought to be elicited by the state after the objection was made was an attempt to have the witness identify the two boys on trial as among those who held him up. The objection was not in time to avail the defendant here as error in the trial court. On another trial the court should not allow the facts in connection with other holdups to be introduced without first identifying the defendants with the crime.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

STATE v. SEAY. (No. 21983.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2
June 4, 1920.)

1. Rape \S 57(1)—Defendant's demurrers to evidence properly overruled.

In prosecution for statutory rape of a female child under 15, defendant's demurrers to evidence at the close of the state's evidence and at close of all evidence held properly overruled.

2. Criminal law \S 678(2)—Election between offenses should be required as soon as facts are developed.

The rule in regard to requiring an election between offenses shown in evidence is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and should be made as soon as the facts are sufficiently developed to warrant it.

3. Criminal law \S 678(2)—Election between offenses in rape case made within time.

In a prosecution for statutory rape of a female child under 15, election between offenses shown in evidence, made by the prosecution when required by the trial court at the close of the state's case on defendant's motion, held made within proper time.

4. Witnesses \S 274(2)—Character witnesses may be cross-examined by state.

When defendant introduces witnesses to prove good character, it is proper for state to cross-examine to test their knowledge of defendant's reputation, sources of information, and credibility; such examination being largely within discretion of court and it being permissible to inquire whether witnesses have heard certain rumors relating to defendant, though such questions are improper unless the rumors are afloat to affect defendant's reputation.

5. Witnesses ¶274(2) — Cross-examination of character witnesses as to other offenses improper.

In prosecution for statutory rape of a female child under 15, action of prosecuting attorney in asking certain character witnesses for defendant on cross-examination whether they had heard that defendant was charged with the crime of rape upon other young children held improper.

Appeal from Criminal Court, Jackson County; Ralph S. Latschaw, Judge.

David M. Seay was convicted of statutory rape, and he appeals. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

The defendant appeals from a conviction in the circuit court of Jackson county on a charge of statutory rape committed upon one Lucy Hare, a female child under the age of 15 years. Seay was 59 years of age, a bachelor, and conducted a card-printing shop at No. 1120 Troost avenue, Kansas City. The shop was on the ground floor and contained two rooms—one in front where he transacted business and one in the rear where he slept and where, the state's evidence went to show, he maintained a cot on which the alleged offense was committed. Lucy Hare was 13 years of age and attended the Humboldt school. She, with other girls who attended that school, were frequenters of the defendant's shop. She was in the shop a number of times during a period extending from June, 1918, until December of that year. It was on one of these visits in June that the first criminal act was committed by the defendant against Lucy Hare. This recurred at intervals when she would visit the shop in company with another girl, named Virginia Turner. The last act of the kind described occurred about a week before Christmas in December, 1918. The incident is described by the prosecuting witness and by Virginia Turner, who was present all the time.

The defendant endeavored to show that the arrangement of the shop was such that he could not have committed the offense in the manner detailed, by describing the interior of the back room of his shop. This evidence, however, was contradicted by the testimony of the state's witnesses, who described the place as containing two bunks, one about seven feet above the floor, where he slept, and the other lower down composed of boxes, over which a quilt or something was spread.

J. M. Johnson and Henri L. Warren, both of Kansas City, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and J. W. Broadbuss, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WHITE, C. (after stating the facts as above). [1] I. The attorney for the defendant demurred to the evidence at the close of the state's evidence and again at the close of all the evidence. It is claimed that the court erred in overruling these demurrers. In regard to the facts relating to the particular offense for which the state seeks a conviction, the evidence of the prosecuting witness and of Virginia Turner was quite clear and entirely sufficient to submit the issue to the jury. The defendant, on cross-examination of the prosecuting witness, had her state that she suffered no pain at the time. This was offset by the testimony of a physician, who examined the girl on the order of the court and testified that she was a well-developed girl for her age of 13 years and that the hymen was broken at a much earlier period, not recently. The court properly overruled the demurrer to the evidence.

[2, 3] II. The prosecuting attorney, in his opening statement, related substantially what the evidence would be in relation to the different criminal acts committed by the defendant upon the prosecuting witness, and the defendant's counsel then asked the court to have the state elect upon which particular offense the state would expect a conviction, since each distinct act was a separate crime. The court overruled the motion, but at the close of the state's case did require the state to elect. The prosecutor thereupon elected to demand a conviction for the offense committed about a week before Christmas in December, 1918. The rule in regard to requiring an election in such case is largely within the discretion of the trial court. It should be made as soon as the facts are sufficiently developed to warrant it. State v. Hughes, 258 Mo. 264, loc. cit. 270, 167 S. W. 529; State v. Hurley, 242 Mo. loc. cit. 459, 146 S. W. 1154; State v. Miller, 263 Mo. loc. cit. 334, 172 S. W. 385, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1099. The election in this case was made within the proper time.

III. The defendant denied specifically and generally all the criminal acts charged against him, and introduced a number of witnesses, who from the evidence appeared to be reputable citizens, to testify that he had a good reputation. It appears from intimations in the record that some time in February, 1919, the defendant was apprehended, and was then suspected of committing sundry crimes of the character charged against him in this case against numerous girls, including the prosecuting witness. When the defendant's character witnesses were on the stand testifying to his good character the prosecuting attorney proceeded to cross-examine them in this manner:

"Q. (by Mr. Curtin). If you had heard that this defendant was charged with the crime of rape upon a nine year old girl by the name of Mildred Roberts, would you then say his reputation was good?"

Objection to this question was overruled and exception saved.

"The Court: Answer the question, Doctor. Read the question. (Last question asked by Mr. Curtin read to witness by the reporter.)

"A. It is very difficult to answer that question. If it charged that, I would say that the charge is very bad for him.

"Q. (by Mr. Curtin). Very bad for him? A. Yes, sir."

The prosecutor then asked this question:

"Q. (by Mr. Curtin). If you had heard that this defendant was charged with committing rape on a girl eight years of age by the name of Alice Parrish, would you say that his reputation was good?"

Objection to this was overruled and the witness answered:

"A. I would say it is a very unfortunate charge."

A number of questions of that character were asked of several witnesses and answered over the objection and exception of the defendant, and of one witness the prosecutor asked this question:

"Q. Now, Mr. Fratcher, had you heard prior to the 27th day of February, 1919, this man was charged by eight or nine little girls of having had sexual intercourse with them, would you still say that his reputation for morality was good?"

Objection to which was overruled and exception saved.

[4] When a defendant on trial charged with a crime introduces a witness to prove good character, it is proper for the state to cross-examine such character witnesses for the purpose of testing their knowledge of the defendant's reputation, the sources of their information and their credibility. Such cross-examination is largely within the discretion of the trial court. State v. Phillips, 233 Mo. loc. cit. 305, 135 S. W. 4; State v. Harris, 209 Mo. loc. cit. 443, 108 S. W. 28. It is permissible to inquire of the character witnesses whether they have heard such and such rumors relating to the defendant, rumors of crimes or other acts which would reflect upon his character, in order to determine upon what the witness bases his judgment as to the reputation of the defendant. State v. Brown, 181 Mo. loc. cit. 213, 214, 79 S. W. 1111. Such questions are improper unless such rumors are afloat to affect defendant's reputation. State v. Parker, 172 Mo. 191, loc. cit. 207, 72 S. W. 650. The opinion in the Parker Case quotes from Greenleaf, as follows:

"In testing a witness who speaks to good character, it would expose the untrustworthiness of his testimony if he admits that rumors of misconduct are known to him; for the knowledge of such rumors may well be inconsistent with his assertion that the person's reputation is good." State v. Smith, 250 Mo. loc. cit. 277, 157 S. W. 307; State v. McLaughlin, 149 Mo. loc. cit. 83, 50 S. W. 315.

A leading and well-considered case upon this subject is State v. Crow, 107 Mo. 341, loc. cit. 346-348, 17 S. W. 745.

Rumors affecting one's reputation is quite a different thing from proof of specific acts or crimes for which the defendant might be convicted. In this case the character witnesses were offered for the purpose of showing the defendant's reputation before he was charged with the crime for which he was on trial. The questions asked by the prosecuting attorney did not go to contradict any statement as to what his reputation was then. He did not ask the witnesses if rumors were current which they had heard concerning defendant's misconduct, because it appears there were no such rumors at the time. The questions were entirely argumentative, and called for opinions and conclusions. The witnesses could not have heard of the offenses named at the time to which the inquiry is directed, and the prosecutor knew it. Under the pretext of testing the credibility and information of the witnesses he sought to bring before the jury the facts that the defendant had committed a number of very serious and abominable crimes, for any one of which he could be convicted; crimes totally disconnected with the crime for which he was on trial. The question not only avoided any reference to the defendant's reputation as it was, but demanded an opinion of the witnesses on their assumed knowledge of facts instead of reported crimes.

[5] This sort of cross-examination has been universally condemned. The prosecutor overstepped his privilege. State v. Teeter, 239 Mo. 475, loc. cit. 485, 144 S. W. 445; State v. Wellman, 253 Mo. loc. cit. 315, 181 S. W. 795; State v. Phillips, 233 Mo. loc. cit. 305, 135 S. W. 4. It is not proper for the prosecuting attorney to state to the jury his belief in the guilt of the defendant, for the reason that the jury may conclude that his belief was acquired through information not in the evidence. State v. Hess, 240 Mo. loc. cit. 159, 144 S. W. 489; State v. Webb, 254 Mo. loc. cit. 435, 162 S. W. 622; State v. Repley, 213 S. W. loc. cit. 480. It is equally improper for him to tell the jury that the defendant has committed other crimes; and that he was allowed to do in asking the questions set out above. A crime of the character of the one with which defendant is charged is so abhorrent that conviction is easy; in fact the charge is almost equivalent to a conviction. So strong is the prejudice against a defendant in such case that the court must take every precaution to see that he obtains an impartial trial.

For the error committed by the trial court in allowing the cross-examination of defendant's character witnesses, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

CITY OF ST. LOUIS v. MURTA (three cases).
(Nos. 20812-20814.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Courts \S 231(5)—Supreme Court will take jurisdiction of misdemeanors on charges brought by a "political subdivision of the state."

The Supreme Court will take jurisdiction of a prosecution instituted by the city of St. Louis charging the operation of lodging houses without permit or payment of a license tax, notwithstanding such charges are misdemeanors; the city of St. Louis being a political subdivision of the state within Const. art. 6, § 12.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Political Subdivision.]

2. Municipal corporations \S 120—City enacting ordinances will not be presumed ignorant of its charter powers or to intend to violate organic law.

In construing a city ordinance, it will not be presumed that the city was ignorant of its charter power or it deliberately intended to violate the organic law of the state or city.

3. Statutes \S 188—Doubtful words enlarged or stricken out to conform to true intent of Legislature.

Doubtful words of a statute will be enlarged, restricted, or even stricken out to make them conform to the true legislative intent when such intent is manifest by aid of sound principles of interpretation.

4. Innkeepers \S 2 — Ordinances regulating lodging houses held not invalid.

A city ordinance forbidding the operation of a lodging house wherein sleeping quarters for three or more persons are provided without payment of license tax or securing permit held not to include private homes or charitable institutions and not to be invalid as unreasonable and discriminatory.

Appeal from St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction; Chauncey J. Krueger, Judge.

Separate prosecutions by the City of St. Louis against Samuel Murta consolidated and tried on agreed statement of facts. Defendant was found guilty in each case, and he appeals. Affirmed.

There are three of these cases, and defendant was fined in each upon charges made by the city by information filed. The gravamen of the charges are that defendant operated three lodging houses in said city without paying a license tax and securing a permit from the proper authorities of said city authorizing him to do so. The cases were consolidated and tried as one upon an agreed statement of facts before Judge Krueger in the court of criminal correction. What is here said therefore applies to each case alike. The ordinances under which the cases proceed are 28790-29555. The agreed statement of facts upon which the cases were tried, so far as necessary to quote, provides as follows:

"Sec. 1. Lodging House—Definition.—The term 'lodging house' where used herein shall (unless expressly otherwise indicated) be taken to mean and to include any building wherein lodging or sleeping quarters for three or more persons in any one room are provided.' (Italics ours.)

"Second. That Ordinances 28790-29555 were duly enacted, and, if valid and constitutional, were in force at the times charged.

"Third. That defendant, Samuel Murta, did on May 18, 1917, and at diverse other days and times prior thereto, keep, conduct, and operate three lodging houses in said city without a license or permit issued to him by the board of public service of said city to keep any one of said three lodging houses.

"Fourth. That the defendant did not at any time apply for a permit or license to keep any of said three lodging houses as required by Ordinance 28790, and that he has not paid or offered to pay the annual fee provided for in section 6 of said ordinance."

Forest P. Tralles and Geo. O. Durham, both of St. Louis, for appellant.

Charles H. Davies and H. A. Hamilton, both of St. Louis, for respondent.

MOZLEY, C. [1] The charges preferred by the informations amount merely to misdemeanors, but we take jurisdiction of the cases because the city of St. Louis is a political subdivision of the state. Const. art. 6, § 12; Straub v. City of St. Louis, 175 Mo. loc. cit. 414, 75 S. W. 100.

The questions presented for determination are:

(a) Whether or not said ordinance applies to all buildings having a room where sleeping quarters are provided for three or more persons irrespective of whether such room or building is operated as a business pursuit or a commercial establishment.

(b) Whether or not said ordinance is void as being unreasonable and discriminatory and not a fair classification of the business of conducting lodging houses and not applicable alike to all engaged in such business, in that it singles out for purposes of taxation only such keepers as shall provide sleeping quarters for three or more guests in one room.

Is the ordinance in question subject to the objections made against it? Is it void because unreasonable?

Section 1 of the ordinance applies expresly and solely to lodging houses wherein lodging or sleeping quarters for three or more persons in any one room are provided. This application is provided for in the ordinance (unless expressly otherwise indicated), and it is nowhere otherwise indicated therein.

But, conceding all of this to be true, does section 1 of said ordinance, when properly construed, affect its validity?

The crux of the cases is as to how said section ought to be construed. Appellant says it must be construed so as to include within its terms private homes, charitable institutions, etc., which under the charter of said city and the laws of the state are not subject to a license tax, hence rendering it void.

Respondent, contra, contends that it was not intended to include private homes, charitable institutions, etc., and, if thus construed, the true intent of the legislative department of the city will be made clear.

[2] It cannot be presumed that the city was ignorant of its charter powers or that it deliberately intended to violate the organic law of the state or city. State ex rel. v. Sheehan, 269 Mo. loc. cit. 427, 190 S. W. 864; Straughan v. Meyers, 268 Mo. loc. cit. 591, 187 S. W. 1159; State ex rel. Aull v. Field, 112 Mo. 554, 20 S. W. 672; Glaser v. Rothchild, 221 Mo. loc. cit. 211, 120 S. W. 1, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1045, 17 Ann. Cas. 576; Perry v. Strawbridge, 209 Mo. loc. cit. 645, 108 S. W. 641, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 244, 128 Am. St. Rep. 510, 14 Ann. Cas. 92; 36 Cyc. 1106; Grimes v. Reynolds, 184 Mo. 679, 68 S. W. 588, 83 S. W. 1132; Laclede Const. Co. v. Moss Tie Co., 185 Mo. loc. cit. 62, 84 S. W. 76; State ex rel. v. Public Service Com., 270 Mo. loc. cit. 442, 192 S. W. 958, 198 S. W. 872.

In the case of State ex rel. v. Sheehan, supra, it is said by our court in banc:

"It is our duty to resolve all doubts in favor of the validity of a legislative act, we always being reluctant to declare statutes unconstitutional. We indulge the presumption that the Legislature did not intend to violate the organic law of the state."

Ex vi termini the same reluctance to declare an ordinance, duly enacted, void, and the same presumption of its validity would obtain in the instant cases.

[3] In the same case and on the same page it is further said:

"We have frequently said doubtful words of a statute will be enlarged, restricted, * * * or even stricken out in order to make them conform to the true intent of the lawmaker, when such intention is manifest by the aid of sound principles of interpretation." (Italics ours.)

In 36 Cyc. 1106, supra, it is said:

"The great fundamental rule in construing statutes is to ascertain and give effect to the intention of the Legislature." (Italics ours.)

The principle announced in the authorities quoted from and those cited supra is the established law of this state in construing legislative acts.

We are of opinion that said ordinance is not susceptible of the interpretation contended for by appellant, since, when interpreted in harmony with the powers possessed by the legislative department of the city, no violence to or infringement upon the true meaning and intent of the lawmakers in adopting it exists. State ex rel. v. Public Service Com., supra.

[4] We hold that said section does not include, and was not intended to include, private homes, charitable institutions, etc., and that it is valid and harmonizes with the title to, and context of, said ordinance.

The contention of appellant is overruled.

In the agreed statement of facts made in the lower court it is conceded that, if said section 1 of said ordinance is valid, appellant is guilty of having violated it, by operating three lodging houses in said city in defiance of the ordinance providing for the licensing and regulating of them.

No other complaint is raised, and the information, trial, judgment, and imposition of the fines appear from the record to be in all things regular. It only remains to affirm said cases, which is done.

Let it be so ordered.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of MOZLEY, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

All concur.

STATE v. ADKINS. (No. 21937.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §1091(11)—Record on appeal should not be burdened with irrelevant and conjectural testimony.

Irrelevant testimony, not even remotely connecting defendant with the crime, should not have been sent up in the bill of exceptions, and neither should testimony whose relevancy depends solely on conjectures of a criminal conspiracy not shown, but it was proper to incorporate evidence tending clearly to show motive.

2. Arson §32—Criminal law §562—Proof of motive and opportunity, together with corpus delicti, do not prove guilt; evidence of threats admissible.

In a prosecution under Rev. St. 1909, § 4509, for the burning of a garage, accused's threats prior to the fire were admissible as tending to show motive, malice, and ill will against one of its owners, even though such threats were covert, indirect, and vague; but, conceding the corpus delicti established, mere showing of motive and opportunity will not overcome the presumption of defendant's innocence and establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

3. Arson \S 37(1)—Evidence held insufficient to support conviction.

In a prosecution under Rev. St. 1909, \S 4509, for the burning of a garage, circumstantial evidence of the tracing of automobile tracks over public highways and through a town, where they were frequently lost, and evidence as to the engine of defendant's car being heated a few hours later, and other circumstances held insufficient to fasten the crime upon defendant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nodaway County; L. B. Woods, Special Judge.

Mark M. Adkins was convicted of arson in the third degree, and he appeals. Reversed.

W. C. Ellison and Wright & Ford, all of Maryville, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and Henry B. Hunt, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. In an indictment preferred by the grand jury of Nodaway county the appellant was charged with arson in the third degree under section 4509, R. S. 1909, in that on the 19th day of April, 1918, he set fire to and burned a garage in the town of Clearmont in said county. A change of venue on the application of appellant was taken from the regular judge and Hon. L. B. Woods, judge of the Third judicial circuit, was called in to try the case. A trial was had on the 15th day of February, 1919, and the jury found appellant guilty and assessed his punishment at four years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, from which judgment he appeals.

About 12 o'clock on the night of the fire J. E. Hornbuckle put an automobile in the garage and locked the doors of same. He then went to his home and retired. The night was heavy, damp, and chilly, and a mist was falling. Upon arising an hour later he attempted to turn on the electric light, and found that there was no current. He again retired, and a little after 8 o'clock a. m. was notified by telephone that the garage was on fire. He hurried to the scene and found a number of people there. The front windows were broken out, and the inside of the garage was enveloped in flames. There were at the time 18 automobiles, 30 barrels of oil, tools, waste, and other accessories in the garage. At the left side of the approach to the garage, at the outer edge of the sidewalk, there was a gasoline filling station. This apparatus was about 3 feet in height, stood on a base, and was fitted with a pump, crank, hose, and nozzle for pumping gasoline into automobile tanks. All of these appliances were inclosed by two heavy metal doors, which were locked on the night of and prior to the fire. After the fire was discovered, it was found that this filling apparatus had been broken into, the left-hand door was broken, the right-hand door pried open, the crank was raised up part way, and the latch pried off. The hose was on the ground east of this station, with nozzle open, and the earth near the hose gave evidence of gasoline having been spilled upon it. After the fire was discovered, a bucket which had been used at the garage for filling automobile radiators with water was found just inside of the doors to the main entrance of the building, so situated that it would have been pushed aside, had the doors been opened. This bucket was not there when Hornbuckle drove his car into the garage the night of the fire, nor was it there when he left and closed the garage that night.

Hornbuckle notified the sheriff of the fire by telephone, and two deputies responded to the call, arriving on the scene about 7 o'clock a. m. When they arrived, the garage and its former contents were a pile of smoking ruins. Procuring a closed car, for the weather was cold and a heavy mist was falling, accompanied by three others, they proceeded in a westerly direction from Clearmont towards Elmo. Two of the party sat on the front seat, and three on the rear seat. They were in quest of automobile tracks, and their manner of observation was to look forward while the car was in motion, the nearest observable portion of the road while they were so situated being about 20 feet distant, and upon discovering tracks to get out and examine them. The first tracks discovered which they determined to follow were located north and west, and about a quarter of a mile, from where the garage had been located. The testimony of one of the deputy sheriffs (Romasser) who made this search is, in his own language, as follows:

"We got to Clearmont between 6 and 7 o'clock. It was cold and misty. When I got to the garage, I made no effort to discover any tracks; nor did I make any effort to track any one or anything up to the garage, nor to track anybody or anything in Clearmont. No trails were pointed out to me in the town. We got a Ford closed car, and five of us started out of Clearmont in a westerly direction. We crossed the railroad tracks, turned north a short distance, and then went west. We stopped the automobile at the west turn of the road, and I got out and carefully examined the tracks. I found a fresh tire cut in a circle, evidently made by an automobile turning around in the road on the previous day. The tire tracks were plainly marked in the damp dust. The south track plainly showed a diamond tread impression. The north track, while not so plain, also showed a diamond tread. We followed these tracks to Mark Adkins' (the appellant's) farm and into his garage. It never went any further than his driveway. The car I was in was glass-inclosed, and the glasses were up, but the wind shield was partly open. I was seated in the rear seat between two other men, and the only possible way for me to see any tracks while I was thus seated was by looking between the shoulders of those two men in the front seat. I had to look at an angle that would enable me to see in a straight line the road ahead of me. I did not see any continuous trail. I didn't say that I saw the prints all the time. I could not see the track every yard of the way. I could see it every 50 yards, if the dirt was soft. I can't say that I saw it every 50 yards. I did say on a former occasion that I got out five or six times at about equal distances between Elmo and Clearmont. I can't say that it was every mile. I can't say now that we got out every mile, or every half mile, or every 100 yards. When we got as far as the eastern limits of Elmo on our trailing trip, we continued on through the town of Elmo without seeing any tire prints at all. I didn't see the track through Elmo. No one of the party got out to look for the track, or saw any track. That is absolutely correct, during the entire trip through Elmo. I expected the track to end in Elmo in a garage. With reference to the point from which we started at Clearmont on this trail, I did not look for any tracks between there and the garage back in town. I did not look to see if anybody had gotten out of the car, where I started on the trail and walked back towards the garage. I didn't look around the garage for any figure, or tool, or scrap of paper, or anything, to couple it with this track. From the track we were tracing, I couldn't tell which way the car was going, whether the track was made by a car coming from Elmo to Clearmont, or going from Clarinda down through Elmo to some other place. If the track was made by a car going towards Clarinda, it would be on the right side of the car, instead of the left. I couldn't tell whether the diamond tread we were tracing was on the right-hand tire or the left-hand tire. When we followed the tracks up into Mark Adkins' yard, they turned a little bit north, circled, and went into the garage. I went to the door and called him. He came out, and I asked him if any one had his car out last night. He said very positively, 'No, sir;' and when I asked if any one had a key to his garage, he again said positively, 'No, sir.' I said, 'I want to see your car.' He said, 'What for?' and I said, 'I am a deputy sheriff, and I thought I had a right to look at his car.' He was slow going to the garage, but opened it, and there was the machine. It was equipped on the left-hand side with a new casing diamond tread and on the right side with the same kind of a tire; the diamond tread showing very little. These were the hind wheels. I said to Mr. Adkins, 'That is the car we have been tracing from Clearmont, and I would like to see your engine.' He said, 'What for?' I opened it, and it was warm; and I said, 'Mr. Adkins, you don't mean to tell me that this car was not driven last night?' He said, 'My wife and I drove to Elmo to the picture show.'

The witness declared affirmatively upon cross-examination, in regard to the statement of the appellant as to his whereabouts the night of the fire, that there was no show at Elmo that night, and that appellant's statement in that regard was nonsense. We have set out this witness' (Romasser's) testimony with some degree of particularity, because upon its probative force the state must rely to sustain this conviction.

Two of the others who participated in this track trailing testified. Their statements were not so comprehensive, direct, or definite as that of the deputy, Romasser. To illustrate: Neither of them examined the Adkins car, or could tell on which side it had a new tire, or heard the conversation between appellant and Romasser. One of these witnesses (Burch) stated that they could not tell whether the car which made the tracks they were following was going east or west; that the track on their left was a diamond tread, while that on the right was smooth. Several persons living on or near the highway leading westward towards appellant's home heard an automobile sometime between 2 and 3 o'clock the night of the fire, going rapidly westward on the road which led towards Elmo. This road, it also appears, was the principal highway between the towns of southern Iowa and the cities of St. Joseph, Maryville, and other Missouri centers of trade. As affording opportunities for the commission of the crime charged without detection, it was shown with much prolixity that the electric wires used to transmit an all-night light current from Maryville to Clearmont had been grounded, or the circuit shortened, at 12:45 o'clock on the night of the fire, at a point on the line $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles southeast of Clearmont, so as to deprive the latter place of light. Appellant lived $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles from where the current was grounded. As evidence of a motive for the commission of the crime, it was shown by the state that appellant was at that time engaged in litigation with one of the owners of the garage in regard to the ownership of an automobile, which the latter had replevined and had taken into his possession, and had same in the garage at the time of the fire, and that appellant felt very bitterly against this party on account of this transaction. The latter's testimony in this regard is as follows:

"I replevied the car, and it was taken by the sheriff under the writ and turned over to me. This was about two months before the fire. But the suit was still pending at the time of the fire. It had not been tried. The car was in the garage at the time of the fire. I had taken the rear axle out, so that it could not be run. After the car was replevied, and when the sheriff was bringing it over, Mr. Adkins rode over from Elmo with me, and he said that it beat hell he was always getting into something, and he said that he was going to fight this. He says, 'Jim, you can't beat me in this trial, and if you do I will find some way out of it.' He said that he thought it was a damned skin game, or something like that, at that time. Some time after this he came over to the garage. He said that he came over to see if he couldn't settle with me, and he said, 'All the good the court will do is just to bring a man up to find out all about him.' I told him I wouldn't settle with him, and he said, 'Well, I may not win this trial, if it comes to trial; but, by God, it will never do you no good.'

In the view we take of the testimony for the state, it is not necessary, except to contrast it with that of the appellant, to set forth the latter at more length than is necessary to show the most striking contrarieties between the two lines of testimony. The testimony of two of the deputy sheriffs, for the state, was that there was no show or exhibition at Elmo on the night of the fire. On cross-examination it was developed that these statements were based wholly on hearsay. Further than this, 11 witnesses for the defense testified that there was a show at Elmo that night, and that the appellant was at Elmo with his family, and did not leave there for his home until almost 12 o'clock.

Three of the state's witnesses examined the tire tracks on the highway and testified as to the particular wheels on which the tires were which made the tracks they claimed to have traced to appellant's garage. Only one of these witnesses (Romasser) examined the automobile in appellant's garage, and testified that it was equipped so as to make the tracks they claimed to have traced. The other witnesses, although present, made no such examination, and so testified. One of these witnesses stated, a fact apparent without such testimony, that it was impossible, from an examination of a tire track on the highway, to determine the direction in which the machine with which it was equipped was going. Five witnesses for the defense, which included two employees of garages who assisted in putting the tires on the appellant's automobile a short time before the fire, testified that the new tire was on the opposite wheel from that testified to by the state's witnesses.

An epitome of the testimony for the state shows that the garage was burned. That the origin of the fire was incendiary was indicated by the surrounding circumstances. No evidence was adduced to show that an effort was made to trace the incendiary immediately from the garage. A quarter of a mile distant therefrom, on the public highway, tire tracks of an automobile were discovered, which were followed, with frequent obliterations and difficulties in tracing same, to appellant's home. These tracks were not found along the usually traveled and nearest road from Clearmont to the appellant's, but were on the road running from Clearmont to Elmo, and thence in a southerly direction to appellant's home. No tracks were found in the town of Elmo. Beyond this point they were again found on the road from Elmo to appellant's home. No testimony, or any circumstance, indicated the direction in which the automobile was going, the tracks of which were being followed. There was testimony that there were many automobiles in that section at that time equipped with diamond tread tires, which was the character of one of the tires the track of which was being followed. Romasser stated that the engine of the automobile in appellant's garage was warm when he examined it a short time after 8 o'clock the morning after the fire. The fire occurred at about 3 o'clock a. m. The grounding of the electric light wire, which cut off the light to Clearmont occurred at 12:45 the night of the fire. This interference was discovered the next day to be located 5 or 6 miles south of Clearmont, and 8½ miles from appellant's residence. About 12 o'clock that night, or a little later, he and his family had just reached their home from Elmo.

Appellant manifested anger when called up and his premises were examined by the deputy sheriffs the morning after the fire. They did not inform him as to the purpose of their quest, but, on the contrary, told him they were looking for a stolen automobile. There is no evidence that appellant knew that the fire had occurred until later, when he went to Elmo. Upon being apprised of it he said:

"That accounts for that devilish sheriff getting me out of bed this morning. I suppose he is trying to put that off on me, and if that is his intention I would not give a ——— if he had been in there and burned up."

[1] The condition of this record authorizes a comment upon the course of this trial before proceeding to discuss the vital question which must determine it here. The testimony was permitted to take a wide range. Elementary rules of evidence were ignored, despite the repeated objections of counsel for the defense. Such a course does not make for an effective prosecution, and is a fruitful source of reversals, especially in criminal cases. More than half of the testimony preserved in the bill of exceptions relates to the grounding of the electric wire, a trip of appellant to a town named Skidmore, his visit to a sister in company with one of his nephews the day after the fire, and the whereabouts of the latter before and after the fire. Much other irrelevant testimony is preserved in regard to the replevin suit for an automobile between the appellant and one of the owners of the garage, which was pending at the time of this trial. Whatever may have been the purpose of all of this testimony, appellant's participation in these ulterior acts and transactions did not tend even remotely to connect him with the crime charged, and the record should not have been burdened with it, except as to such testimony as clearly tended to show motive. It may be conjectured, for the evidence does not so indicate, that some sort of a conspiracy to commit the crime was sought to be shown between the appellant and the nephew referred to. We cannot, however, determine the relevancy of testimony upon conjectures. Certainly there is nothing to show any criminal conspiracy between the two parties.

[2] If it be conceded, of which there is ground for doubt, that there was proof of the corpus delicti, by which we mean, in a case of this character, not merely the burning of the garage, but that it was burned by the willful act of some person criminally responsible therefor, and not by natural or accidental causes (State v. Cox, 264 Mo. loc. cit. 412, 175 S. W. 50; State v. Jones, 106 Mo. loc. cit. 312, 17 S. W. 366), there remains, to sustain a conviction, the necessity of proof of such incriminatory facts and circumstances as will establish a prima facie case of appellant's guilt. As preliminary to the establishment of this proof, threats made prior to the fire by the accused are permissible, as tending to show motive, malice, and ill will of the person making them against the owner of the property, even though such threats were covert, indirect, or vague. State v. Jones, supra; State v. Crawford, 99 Mo. 74, 12 S. W. 354; State v. Melick, 65 Iowa, 614, 22 S. W. 895. While proof of this character is admissible for the purpose stated, it furnishes, as was stated by Williams, P. J., when sitting as a commissioner—

"one link in the chain of circumstances tending to establish guilt; but mere showing of motive, uncorroborated by other facts and circumstances inconsistent with innocence, is not a sufficient prima facie showing to authorize the submission of defendant's guilt to the jury. It would be a rather unjust and dangerous rule that held that the mere showing of motive and opportunity would overcome the presumption of defendant's innocence and establish, beyond a reasonable doubt, his participation in the criminal act." State v. Ruckman, 253 Mo. 499, 161 S. W. 705.

[3] Are the incriminatory facts in this record of such a nature as to authorize the affirmation of this judgment and the placing of the final judicial brand of felony upon this appellant? If so, in what do they consist? First, some automobile tracks on a much traveled highway, shown to have been used by machines equipped with like tires to those used by the appellant; and, second, a warm engine, as testified to by the deputy sheriff. In all seriousness, and, we hope, with a proper regard for the enforcement of the law and the punishment of criminals, we do not find anything of such a substantial probative character in the testimony concerning these tire tracks as to sustain this conviction. Appellant's connection with them was not even remotely shown; they began at a point distant from the scene of the fire, and were traced, if the same tracks, over a longer and more frequented route than the appellant, if fleeing from the fire, would have been required to travel in order to reach his home. There is no reasonable probability, from the evidence, that the tracks thus traced from Clearmont to Elmo were made at any time prior thereto by the appellant's machine—this on account of the frequency with which this road was used by automobiles. It is not improbable that the tracks leading from Elmo to the appellant's home were those made by his machine in taking his family and nephew home from the show the night of the fire. Further than this, there is nothing to show whether the tracks thus traced and testified to were made by a machine going to or coming from Clearmont. This whole matter, therefore, is left in the greatest uncertainty.

As to the heated engine testified to by the deputy sheriff, if the automobile had been used as the state contends by the appellant in fleeing after the fire, it is reasonably certain that he did not delay at least longer than it would require him to make the trip from Clearmont, via Elmo, to his home. This would have required no more time than an hour, or possibly less, the distance being $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles. It was 8 o'clock, or after, when Romasser stated that he found the engine warm. This was at least four hours after the machine, upon the state's theory, had been used. There is testimony to the effect that an engine will cool in an hour, or an hour and a half, sufficient for repairs to be made upon it. The evidence as to this phase of the case, therefore, is not worthy of credence.

We cannot, and we should not, with a just regard for human liberty, sustain this conviction upon the evidence presented by this record. It proves nothing. The judgment of the trial court is therefore reversed; and it is so ordered.

All concur.

STATE v. LIPPMAN. (No. 21904.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Receiving stolen goods \S 9(1)—Defendant's demurrer to evidence held properly overruled.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen property, defendant's demurrer to the evidence at the conclusion of the state's testimony in chief held properly overruled, where there was substantial evidence offered by the state sufficient to warrant the jury in finding defendant guilty as charged.

2. Criminal law \S 901—Introduction of testimony waives defendant's right to be heard on demurrer to evidence at conclusion of state's case.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen property, defendant's demurrer to the evidence at the conclusion of the state's testimony in chief held properly overruled, where defendant elected to put before the jury his own testimony and that of his witnesses; he thereby waiving his right to be heard on the demurrer, as the jury were then bound to consider the case with reference to all the testimony offered on both sides.

3. Criminal law \S 565—Receiving stolen goods \S 8(3)—Evidence sustaining conviction and showing that property received was stolen within three years prior to information.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen property, held that there was substantial evidence to show that the property in controversy was stolen within three years prior to the filing of the information and to sustain a conviction.

4. Criminal law \S 823(15)—Receiving stolen goods \S 2—Instructions on reasonable doubt held sufficient; jury need not find that goods were feloniously stolen.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen property under Rev. St. 1909, \S 4554, it is not necessary to require the jury to find that the property was feloniously stolen, and instruction thereon was not erroneous for failure to require a finding of the larceny beyond reasonable doubt, when considered in connection with another instruction, correctly stating the law of reasonable doubt.

5. Criminal law \S 822(4)—Instruction not erroneous as assuming facts when construed as a whole.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, an instruction held not erroneous when considered as a whole, as assuming that the property had been stolen.

6. Receiving stolen goods \S 8(4)—Mere fact of possession raises no presumption of knowledge that goods had been stolen.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, it was not error to charge that the mere naked fact of the possession of property raises no presumption that defendant knew that the property had been stolen by another.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court;
Charles B. Davis, Judge.

Benjamin Lippman was convicted of receiving stolen property, and he appeals. Affirmed.

On October 26, 1918, respondent filed in the St. Louis circuit court an information in two counts, charging defendant with grand larceny, and receiving stolen property, with knowledge that it had theretofore been feloniously stolen. At the close of respondent's evidence in chief, the state elected to stand on the second count of said information, which charged defendant with receiving stolen property, for that, on September 11, 1918, at the city of St. Louis, in the state of Missouri, he did buy, receive, and have one horse, one wagon, one set of single harness, and 1,200 burlap bags, all of the value of $750, of the goods, chattels, and personal property of Max Zimmerman and Nathan Jaffie, with knowledge that the goods aforesaid had lately been feloniously stolen from said Zimmerman and Jaffie. On December 11, 1918, defendant waived formal arraignment, and entered a plea of not guilty. On the last-named date, defendant was put upon his trial, before a jury duly impaneled and sworn to try the cause. On the same day, the jury returned into court the following verdict:

"We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant guilty of receiving stolen property, as charged in the second count of the information, and assess the punishment at imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years."

State's Evidence.

The evidence on behalf of the state tended to prove the following facts:

Max Zimmerman lived at 2520 Cora avenue, in St. Louis, Mo., and, with Nathan Jaffie, was engaged in the secondhand bag and burlap business at 2013 Morgan street, in said city, under the name of the "International Bag Company." On September 10, said Zimmerman closed his business about 6 o'clock p. m. At that time, there was a supply of bags and burlap on the second and third floors of said store building, and his horse, harness, and wagon were in the stable. The latter and said store building were connected by a yard. Before leaving said building, Zimmerman locked the doors and windows of same. On September 11, he came to his place of business about 7 o'clock a. m., and found that the entrance door was locked, the lock on the other door broken, and said door open; there being a front door on Morgan street, and four doors on the front part of the building. Upon going into his place of business, he found that a piece of glass had been cut out of the door, enabling the latter to be opened; that about 1,500 bags were gone, of about the value of $500, and that his horse, harness, and wagon, of about the value of $150 or $175, were missing. About 7:30 o'clock on the morning of September 11, he reported his loss to the Fourth District Police Station. Thereafter he saw his missing property in the stable, at the Central Police Station. He identified the property, and it was turned over to him. He saw Dunn and another man at the said police station and noticed that their clothes were dusty from the dust off the stolen bags.

Cross-examination: On cross-examination, Zimmerman testified that he remembered defendant; that he never saw appellant around or near his place of business; that defendant never worked for him, nor was he connected with their business; that he did not know O'Donnell or Dunn; that when he saw defendant at the police station the latter was dressed in ordinary trousers, a shirt, without collar or vest, and had on button shoes, which were unbuttoned.

Nathan Jaffie testified that he was a partner of Zimmerman, the International Bag Company being a partnership; that they owned the stolen property together; that they handled burlap, jute, and cotton bags; that the burlap bags presented in court were those that had been used for alfalfa meal; that he was out of town at the time of the burglary, and did not know how many bags were taken; that when he returned two days afterwards, the bags had been brought back.

Edward Feeney testified that he was a metropolitan policeman, and connected with police headquarters; that about 6:30 o'clock on the morning of September 11, he, with Officer Thomas Murphy, saw defendant, O'Donnell, and Dunn on Eighteenth street, in the city of St. Louis. At this time said officers were on the east side of the mouth of the alley near O'Fallon street. When first seen, O'Donnell and Dunn drove in from Biddle street with a horse and wagon, the latter being loaded with sacks. Dunn was driving, and they were both sitting on the front seat. They drove north on Eighteenth street from Biddle, and pulled in near Division street, on Eighteenth street, where Dunn got off the wagon, and hitched the horse to a pole on the east side of the street. O'Donnell stayed on the wagon, rolled and lighted a cigarette. Dunn walked north on Eighteenth street to O'Fallon street, and at 1819 O'Fallon he knocked at the door. A man came to the door, and, holding it halfway open, he and Dunn whispered together four or five minutes. Dunn then came down off the steps, and started back the way he had come, a distance of about 300 yards. Dunn had gone about 100 feet from the door, when defendant came out of his residence, wearing a white shirt, trousers, and with his shoes unlaced. He went towards the wagon, and caught up with Dunn. At this time, O'Donnell was still seated on the wagon, smoking a cigarette. Defendant got on the wagon and turned over the sacks, looking at them several times. Then they had some kind of talk on the wagon. Witness and Murphy were then about 50 feet away. They all three got off the wagon. Defendant gave O'Donnell some United States currency. O'Donnell and Dunn then went to a saloon on the west side of the street, near Division street, and had been in there about three minutes, when witness and Murphy went into the saloon. As they went in, O'Donnell dropped some bills on the floor, and put his foot on them. Officer Murphy pushed him aside, and picked up two $1 bills. The officers then placed O'Donnell and Dunn under arrest, and took them out the same side door by which they had entered the saloon. Defendant was still seated on the wagon. When he saw the officers coming, he jumped off the wagon and ran toward Eighteenth and Biddle streets, where Officers Stangler and Mitchell caught him. When Feeney and Murphy brought Dunn and O'Donnell to where appellant was, the latter refused to make a statement. Zimmerman was notified that his property was found, came to the police station, and identified the same. The officers examined the sacks on the wagon, and noticed a greenish dust on them. The same kind of dust was on appellant's shoes and trousers. No other bag concern in the city dealt in bags that had a similar dust on them. When Feeney brought the three men in for identification, Dunn said: "Well, you boys sure does give a man a rap."

Cross-examination: Feeney testified, that "rap" meant doing their duty, bringing the men up to see if there was any dust on them the same as on the bags; that appellant never said a word at any time; that the officers above mentioned started out together that morning, and he could see Stangler and Mitchell, about 100 yards away, while he was near the mouth of the alley aforesaid; that he had locked up Dunn and O'Donnell time and again; that on the night in question the officers aforesaid were out on night burglary and larceny duty, their hours being from 11 p. m. to 7 a. m.; that the bills introduced in evidence were the bills exchanged as above set forth, and that appellant took them off a roll of bills. Feeney further testified that he searched O'Donnell at the police station, and found no money on him; that he was never at appellant's home; that he did not say to appellant's wife that he had a previous appointment with him; that he did not take defendant's coat or ask for it on such visit.

Thomas P. Murphy testified that he was a police officer; that he received directions to watch defendant's house, and watched it for two consecutive nights, being so engaged on the morning of the 11th of September, 1918. Murphy's testimony corroborated that of

HARVARD LAW LIBRARY

Feeney, with the exception as to the time when defendant was taken into custody by Stangler and Mitchell, stating that appellant started across the street and was arrested after he had handed over the money, and before Dunn and O'Donnell went into O'Leary's saloon; that when they came out of the saloon, appellant was in charge of Stangler and Mitchell. Murphy testified that he marked the money given in evidence.

Cross-examination: Murphy testified that after the money was passed, defendant did not get back on the wagon, and did not run across the street; that he could not positively say he saw any money pass, but that it looked like green bills, looked like money; that he searched O'Donnell and Dunn at the police station, and found no money on them; that he did not go to defendant's house after the arrest and talk with his wife.

Albert Stangler testified that he was a police sergeant, and was connected with police headquarters. His testimony corroborates that of Murphy and Feeney. He also testified that when the officers came back from the saloon with Dunn and O'Donnell in their custody defendant, who was still sitting on the wagon, got off the wagon and walked rapidly south on Eighteenth street towards Biddle street where he was arrested at the corner; that Officer Mitchell was now in Omaha, Neb., where he had gone to attend the funeral of his brother.

Cross-examination: Witness said he saw appellant searched at the police station, but saw no roll of money taken from him, and could not say that he had such money.

Defendant's evidence: Jake Cramin testified that he was engaged in the burlap sack business at 1801 Biddle street, at Eighteenth and Biddle, on the morning appellant was arrested; that he came to his store that morning to open up, and saw appellant standing on the corner, waiting for a street car, the same as he had seen him every morning for two or three weeks; that appellant was not running at the time, but standing on the corner; that he saw two officers grab him.

Cross-examination: Witness said defendant had been waiting for a street car five or six minutes before the two officers came over and arrested him; that he did not see two men or the wagon, or see the wagon drive off, nor did he see the other men under arrest; that about 6 o'clock that morning, or a quarter after 6, Officer Murphy came to his door, and asked him if that was his horse and wagon in front of his place; that he answered the wagon and horse were not his, and that he did not know to whom it belonged; that defendant had on a plain coat and wore a black soft hat.

Sophie Lippman testified that she was the wife of the appellant; that they lived at 1819 O'Fallon street; that appellant got up between 5 and 5:30 o'clock on the morning in question, and left the house at 6 o'clock or a quarter to 6; that Officer Feeney came to the house about 10 minutes after the appellant had left and said to her:

"Where is your husband?" I said, 'He is gone to work.' So he picked up a coat from a chair and he said, 'I found this outside.' I said, 'No; you didn't; you picked it up from the chair.' So he said, 'Whose is that?' I said, 'That is my husband's.' He said, 'Let's see the initials.' I said, 'All right.' He said, 'Whose initials are they?' I said, 'My husband.' He said, 'All right;' and he went away.

"Q. Did he want to take the coat? A. Yes, sir; he wanted to take it along with him, and I said, 'No, that is my husband's coat.'

"Q. And you wouldn't permit him to take the coat? A. No, sir.

"Q. That is all you know about it? A. That is all."

On cross-examination Sophie Lippman stated that her husband was a huckster, and went after his wagon every morning; that she did not remember of a man rapping on their door that morning; that appellant left the house only once that morning; that her husband had a horse and wagon, but she did not know where he kept it; that she thought appellant had on a brown suit that morning; that the coat did not match the trousers; that she did not think he wore a brown suit; that he sometimes wore it to work, but it was not the only suit he had; that he had a coat on, and wore a black hat.

Appellant testified that he was a huckster; that he lived at 1819 O'Fallon street on the morning in question, four doors from the corner of Eighteenth street on the north side; that he did not buy from Dunn or O'Donnell any sacks, horse, or wagon; that he did not give them any money for the property aforesaid; that he was going to take the street car at the corner of Eighteenth street and Biddle street, when he was arrested; that he had 10 cents in money in his possession when arrested.

On cross-examination, appellant stated that that he did not know Dunn until they brought him up after his arrest; that he never saw Dunn at his door, nor joined and walked with Dunn to the wagon; that he never looked over the sacks on the wagon, and did not talk to Dunn or O'Donnell before they were arrested; that he had been waiting six or seven minutes for a car on the Natural Bridge line, when the officers came up; that he was going a couple of miles from home to Magazine street, five blocks north of Cass avenue; that his place of business was one block south of Cass avenue; that he had to take a car to 3100 Magazine street, where he had a horse and wagon; that he had kept this horse and wagon there for about a month, but had once kept them at Twenty-Third and Biddle streets; that he was supposed to meet his partner, Dutch Gobliger, on that occasion, who lived on the north side of Magazine street, two or three doors from the corner; that he wore no coat that morning.

Joe Gobliger testified that he lived at 3005A Magazine street; that he was the partner of appellant in the huckster business on September 11, 1918; that they were engaged in peddling watermelons with a horse and wagon.

On cross-examination, Gobliger stated that the wagon belonged to both of them; that he kept it at the stable about a block past his home on Magazine street; that they sometimes bought their produce at the Union Market and sometimes from the cars; that appellant usually came out after him in the morning, so that they could go down Cass avenue; that when they went out about 8 o'clock in the morning, he went to appellant's place of business to pick him up; that on the night before the arrest of appellant, appellant called him up, and said he would be at the Gobliger home at 6 o'clock the next morning; that he waited at the stable the next morning, but appellant did not arrive; that he went to appellant's home at about 6:30 or 7 o'clock; that appellant's wife told him her husband had been arrested; that he had been in partnership for over a month with appellant.

The instructions, and such other matters as may be deemed necessary, will be considered later.

On December 31, 1918, sentence was passed upon appellant, and judgment was duly rendered by the court, in conformity with the terms of the verdict.

Defendant, in due time, filed his motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the cause duly appealed by him to this court.

T. J. Rowe, Jr., and Henry Rowe, both of St. Louis, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and Henry B. Hunt, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). 1. Appellant in his brief assigns 11 errors, alleged to have been committed by the trial court, and upon which he asks a reversal of the case. We will consider the assignments of error, in the order presented by appellant in his brief. His contentions are as follows:

"(1) The instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence offered by defendant at the close of the state's case should have been given.

"(a) The evidence is insufficient to show the sale of the property charged in the information to have been stolen to defendant, or that the latter received same or was ever in possession of same.

"(b) The evidence is insufficient to show guilty knowledge on the part of the defendant.

"(c) The evidence fails to show the property was stolen on the day alleged in the information, or at any time within three years prior to the filing thereof, or at any ascertainable time."

[1, 2] We have set out heretofore, very fully, all the substantial evidence offered at the trial in behalf of both the state and appellant. Defendant's demurrer to the evidence at the conclusion of the state's testimony in chief was properly overruled for two reasons: First, because there was substantial evidence offered by the state sufficient to warrant the jury in finding defendant guilty as charged in the second count of information; second, because the appellant, after his demurrer to the evidence was overruled, elected to put before the jury his own testimony, and that of his witnesses. In pursuing this course, he waived his right to be heard on above demurrer, as the jury were then bound to consider the case with reference to all the testimony offered on both sides. State v. Mann, 217 S. W. loc. cit. 69; Lareau v. Lareau, 208 S. W. loc. cit. 243; State v. Selleck, 199 S. W. loc. cit. 130; Riley v. O'Kelly, 250 Mo. loc. cit. 660, 157 S. W. 566; State v. Cummings, 248 Mo. loc. cit. 518, 154 S. W. 725; State v. Gow, 235 Mo. loc. cit. 329, 138 S. W. 648; State v. Lackey, 230 Mo. loc. cit. 713, 132 S. W. 602; State v. Martin, 230 Mo. loc. cit. 700, 132 S. W. 595. No demurrer to the evidence was filed by appellant at the conclusion of all the testimony in the case; but, even if it had been, we are of the opinion that on the facts heretofore set out the trial court was justified in submitting the case to the jury.

[3] (a) It is insisted by appellant that the evidence fails to show that the property in controversy was stolen within three years prior to the filing of the information herein. Even if it were necessary to show this fact—which we need not now determine—yet there is substantial evidence tending to show that said property was stolen on September 11, 1918. Nathan Jaffie, one of the owners of said property, testified that he was out of the city the week the goods were stolen, and that he got back two days after the bags were returned. Thomas P. Murphy, the police officer, fixes the date as September 11, 1918, when defendant, O'Donnell, and Dunn were in possession of said property near the saloon, and when defendant was arrested by the other two police officers. The facts, in respect to what occurred at the time and place aforesaid are heretofore set out in detail, and need not be repeated again. Feeney testified that he was with Murphy on the morning of September 11, 1918; that he brought defendant, Dunn, and O'Donnell before Zimmerman, who identified the property. Zimmerman testified that on the night of September 10 he locked his place of business, and the next morning found one panel of glass cut, the premises robbed of bags, and the horse gone. The horse, wagon, and about 1,500 bags were there on the night of the 10th of September, and were gone the next morning. He reported the robbery to the police about 7:30 on the morning of September 11. All this property was identified by Zimmerman, and was returned to him before his partner Jaffie returned. We are of the opinion, that there was substantial evidence before the jury, heretofore set out, tending to show that said property was stolen during the night of September 10, 1918, or during the early morning of September 11, 1918. We further hold that there was substantial evidence before the jury as to all the material facts which were necessary to sustain a conviction of defendant under the second count of information.

2. Defendant's second assignment of error reads as follows:

"Instruction No. 1 is erroneous because it does not require the jury to find and believe that the property mentioned in the information was feloniously stolen, etc., with felonious intent," etc.

As this instruction is criticized in other assignments, we herewith print the same in full:

"First. If, upon consideration of all the testimony in the case, in the light of the court's instructions, you find and believe from the evidence that, at the city of St. Louis and state of Missouri, on or about the 11th day of September, 1918, the property mentioned in the information, to wit, one horse, one wagon, one set of single harness, and 1,200 burlap bags, were stolen, taken, and carried away from Max Zimmerman and Nathan Jaffie by some person or persons other than the defendant, with the intent on the part of the thief or thieves to convert the same to his or their own use, and to permanently deprive the owners of the same without their consent, and that the property so stolen, taken, and carried away was of the value of $30 or more, and was the property of the said Max Zimmerman and the said Nathan Jaffie, and that after said property had been by some person or persons other than the defendant so stolen, taken, and carried away, the defendant, at the city of St. Louis and state of Missouri, on the 11th day of September, 1918, or at any time within three years next before the filing of the information herein, unlawfully and fraudulently did buy and receive the said property or any part thereof, of the value of $30 or more, into his possession, and that at the time he did so, he knew it to be stolen property, you will find the defendant guilty of receiving stolen property as charged in the second count of the information, and assess his punishment at imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not less than two nor more than five years. And unless you so find the facts to be, you will acquit the defendant."

[4] The second count of the information, under which this case was tried, is based upon section 4554, R. S. 1909. The requirements of section 4535, R. S. 1909, upon which the first count was based, are not the same as those contained in section 4554, supra. Instruction 1, aforesaid, follows substantially the language of said section 4554, is based upon the evidence in the cause, and is sustained by the previous rulings of this court. State v. Kosky, 191 Mo. loc. cit. 5, 17, 90 S. W. 454; State v. Richmond, 186 Mo. loc. cit. 87, 88, 84 S. W. 880; State v. Honig, 78 Mo. 251. The cases cited and relied upon by appellant are based upon what is known as section 4535, R. S. 1909, relating to grand larceny. In State v. Richmond, 186 Mo. loc. cit. 87, 88, 84 S. W. 885, where the defendant was charged with receiving stolen goods, etc., under section 1916, R. S. 1899, which is the same as section 4554, supra, we said:

"The decisions of this court on the requisites of larceny are not applicable."

The foregoing contention of appellant is accordingly overruled.

3. It is claimed under appellant's third assignment that:

"Instruction No. 1 is erroneous because it failed to require the jury to find and believe the larceny of the property, as alleged in the information beyond a reasonable doubt, notwithstanding the separate instruction on reasonable doubt."

Instruction 3 properly declares the law in respect to reasonable doubt, and, when considered in connection with instruction 1, supra, sufficiently covered this subject. State v. Arnett, 210 S. W. loc. cit. 84, and cases cited (Mo.); State v. Robinson, 236 Mo. loc. cit. 722, 139 S. W. 140; State v. Wertz, 191 Mo. 569, loc. cit. 581, 90 S. W. 838.

4. Defendant's fourth assignment of error is as follows:

"Instruction No. 1 is erroneous, in that the following clause therein: 'And after said property had been by some person or persons other than the defendant so stolen, taken, and carried away'—assumes the truth of a controverted fact, to wit, that the property had been stolen."

[5] The instruction complained of is heretofore set out in full. It does not assume that the property was stolen, but required the jury to find said fact before they could convict defendant. If detached portions of an instruction could be complained of, and a reversal asked on account of the giving of same, it would result in reversing nearly all the cases which come to this court. An instruction should be considered as a whole, and, when so considered, if it properly declares the law, should be sustained.

5. Appellant's assignment numbered 5, has been fully considered heretofore, and is likewise without merit. Section 4554, R. S. 1909; State v. Smith, 250 Mo. loc. cit. 364, 157 S. W. 319; State v. Fink, 186 Mo. loc. cit. 56-58, 84 S. W. 921; Kelley's Crim. Law, § 683.

"It was error for the trial court to instruct the jury, as in instruction 2, that 'the mere naked fact of the possession of said property, if you find that the defendant had such possession, raises no presumption that the defendant knew that said property had been stolen by another; there being no evidence in the case authorizing same.'"

We are at a loss to understand how the giving of this instruction was detrimental to defendant. He asserts that there was no evidence in the case authorizing same. Feeney testified that defendant "got up over the wagon, and he turned the sacks over and looked them over several times. * * * This man (defendant) was seated on the wagon. When he saw us coming, he jumped off the wagon, run towards Eighteenth and Biddle." Dunn and O'Donnell were in the saloon, while defendant was in possession of the team. Feeney is corroborated as to defendant being in possession of the property while Dunn and O'Donnell had gone to the saloon. The trial court very properly instructed the jury, in respect to this matter, as follows:

"The mere naked fact of the possession of said property, if you find that the defendant had such possession, raises no presumption that the defendant knew that said property had been stolen by another."

We apprehend that if said instruction or a similar one had not been given, the defendant would be vigorously clamoring for a reversal of the case on the ground that the jury had not been instructed as to all the issues in the case. Suffice it to say, the foregoing assignment is absolutely without merit.

7. Appellant has made five assignments of error, aside from those heretofore considered, all of which have been fully examined. After carefully reading the evidence and briefs of counsel, we are satisfied that the defendant has had a fair and impartial trial; that correct instructions were given by the court; that no error affecting the rights of defendant were committed by the trial court; that defendant was convicted upon substantial evidence; and that the judgment below should be, and is, affirmed.

STATE v. WOLFE. (No. 21885.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

Physicians and surgeons — (1) — Dental board not authorized to revoke original certificate of registration of dentist and license issued thereon.

Under Laws 1917, p. 258, re-enacting section 5493 of Rev. St. 1909, the Missouri dental board had no power or authority to revoke both the original certificate of registration of a dentist and his license which had been issued thereon, and its attempt to so do was void and of no effect.

Appeal from Criminal Court, Jackson County; Ralph S. Latshaw, Judge.

Morris Russell Wolfe was convicted of practicing dentistry without being legally registered and without having license, and he appeals. Reversed, and defendant discharged.

Defendant, Morris Russell Wolfe, was informed against at the September term, 1918, of the criminal court of Jackson county on a charge of having practiced dentistry without being legally registered and without having a license authorizing him to do so. Upon his plea of not guilty, he was tried on the 7th day of the January term, 1919, and the case was taken under advisement until the 13th day of said January term, when defendant was adjudged guilty as charged and a fine was assessed against him of $100. It was contended (and still contended) by defendant that the statute under which he was convicted violates section 30, article 2, of the state Constitution, and section 1, article 14, of the Constitution of the United States, both of which said sections provide that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law." By reason of said constitutional question the case was appealed to this court.

Frank M. Lowe, of Kansas City, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and George V. Berry, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MOZLEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). The predicate upon which the prosecution is based was arrived at as a result of a hearing upon charges made against defendant before the Missouri dental board, at which hearing said board rendered the following judgment:

"The Missouri dental board, therefore, on the facts above found and stated, and on motion duly made and seconded and carried, hereby revokes the original certificate of registration issued to the said Morris Russell Wolfe and the license issued to him by the Missouri dental board under which he is now practicing dentistry, and from henceforth said original certificate of registration and said license to practice dentistry issued to him by this board are hereby revoked and for naught held." (Italics ours.)

The case in hand has been determined by our court in banc, speaking through Williamson, J., in the case of the State ex rel. Defendant Herein, Appellant, v. Missouri Dental Board, Respondent, 221 S. W. 70 (not yet [officially] reported). In this case the same constitutional question was raised as in the instant case, viz. that the law under which said board held the investigation of charges against defendant and the law under which he was prosecuted were in violation of the due process provision, article 2, section 30, of the state Constitution, and violative of section 1, article 14, of the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the same subject. The court in banc deemed it unnecessary to pass on said constitutional question, but it did hold that under section 5493 of Rev. St. 1909, as re-enacted by Acts 1917, p. 258, the Missouri dental board had no power or authority to revoke defendant's original certificate of registration and his license which had been issued thereon, and that the attempt of said board to do so was void and of no effect. Since this opinion was handed down it is due to the Attorney General's office to say it agrees that the case will have to be reversed.

We think that it should be thus disposed of, and accordingly reverse the judgment of the lower court and discharge the defendant.

RAILEY and WHITE, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of MOZLEY, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

All concur.

STATE v. HARTMAN. (No. 21863.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Courts \S 231(23)—Constitutional question must be preserved by bill of exceptions.

Where a special appeal has been allowed by a judge of the Supreme Court from the juvenile division of the county court on the ground that a constitutional question was presented in the trial court's failure to give full credit to the public acts of a sister state, the action of the trial court in that respect, as well as a motion to dismiss, being matters of exception, can only be preserved for review in a bill of exceptions.

2. Courts \S 485—Statute providing for transfer of appeals improperly taken does not include special appeals.

Rev. St. 1909, \S 3938, providing that, after a case is sent from a lower court on appeal or writ of error to wrong Court of Appeals or the Supreme Court, such court must forward the transcript to the clerk of the proper Court of Appeals, is limited to appeals granted by the trial court, and does not include special appeals granted by appellate judges under section 2043.

3. Appeal and error \S 359—Statute authorizing appellate judge to grant special appeal does not authorize grant of appeal to another appellate court.

Rev. St. 1909, \S 2043, providing that any judge of the Supreme Court or of either of the Courts of Appeal, respectively, in cases appealable to such courts, upon inspection of a copy of the record may grant an appeal by special order for that purpose, contemplates that the special appeal therein mentioned can be granted only by some judge of the court to which the case is appealable, and the judge of one appellate court has no power to grant a special appeal to some appellate court of which he is not a member.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Allen C. Southern, Judge.

Proceedings by the State under the juvenile court acting to adjudge Aerial Hartman a neglected child. From a judgment declaring such child to be neglected, and disposing of its custody, Luella Hartman appeals. Appeal dismissed.

This is an appeal from the judgment of the juvenile division of the circuit court of Jackson county. A special appeal in this case was granted by one of the judges of this court on May 29, 1919, acting under the authority conferred by section 2043, R. S. 1909. Said statute, among other things, provides as follows:

"Any judge of the Supreme Court or either of the Courts of Appeals, respectively, in cases appealable to said courts, upon inspection of a copy of the record, may grant an appeal by special order for that purpose at any time within one year next after the rendition of the final judgment or decision in the cause," etc.

From appellant's abstract of the record it appears that this is a suit under the Juvenile Court Act (Laws 1911, p. 177 et seq.), and was originally instituted in the juvenile division of the circuit court of Jackson county by the filing therein of a petition which in substance alleged that Aerial Hartman was a neglected child under the age of 17 years, etc., and that she was suffering from the cruelty and depravity of her father. A hearing was had upon this petition, at which hearing the father and also the grandmother (the present appellant) appeared in the cause in person and by attorney.

After a hearing duly had the court entered a judgment. This judgment in substance recites that the court finds that said Aerial Hartman is a neglected child within the meaning of the statutes of the state, and that the said father and grandmother are not proper persons to have the custody of said child. The child is made a ward of the juvenile court of Jackson county. The court further finds that one Gothard E. Henry and his wife are fit and proper persons to have custody of said child for the present, and remands said child to their custody until the further order of the court.

Frans E. Lindquist, of Kansas City, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and Henry B. Hunt, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). I. It was undoubtedly the theory of the learned (now departed) Brother who granted this appeal that a constitutional question was involved which would confer jurisdiction of this appeal upon this court. But an examination of the record now presented for our review fails to present such a question, or in fact any question which would confer jurisdiction upon this court.

Appellant in her brief alleges that the court violated section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, in that the court failed to give full faith and credit to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of the state of Kansas.

[1] It does not appear that a bill of exceptions were ever made out or filed in the case. There is no bill of exceptions contained in the record before us. The action of the trial court in determining the faith and credit due the alleged proceedings of a court of another state, as well as the motion to dismiss filed in the trial court, were matters of exception, and could only be preserved for our review by being properly preserved in a bill of exceptions. So far as the present record discloses this was not done. It therefore follows that the constitutional question now urged in the brief has not been preserved in such a manner as will confer jurisdiction of this appeal upon this court. "Constitutional questions must not only be timely and properly raised, but, to confer jurisdiction on this court, they must be preserved for review." Louisiana v. Lang, 251 Mo. 664, loc. cit. 666, 158 S. W. 1, 2.

II. It is suggested by the learned Attorney General that this cause should be transferred to the Kansas City Court of Appeals under the provisions of section 3938, R. S. 1909, which provides that—

"In the event of any case being sent from a lower court on appeal or writ of error to the wrong Court of Appeals or the Supreme Court, it shall be the duty of the court to which the case has thus been sent, immediately on such fact coming to its attention, to direct its clerk to forward the transcript therein, with the order of transfer, to the clerk of the proper Court of Appeals," etc.

[2] After carefully considering the language of the above statute, we are of the opinion that the word "appeal" as therein used should be limited in its meaning to an appeal granted by the trial court, and that it does not include special appeals granted by appellate judges under section 2043, R. S. 1909.

[3] We think section 2043, supra, when properly construed, means that the special appeal therein mentioned can be granted only by some judge of the court to which the case is appealable; and that under that statute a judge of one appellate court would have no power or authority to grant a special appeal to some appellate court of which he was not a member. If that be the correct construction (and we think it is), then the Kansas City Court of Appeals has acquired no right to review this case upon the special appeal granted by one of the judges of this court. That being true, the transfer statute (section 3938, supra) can have no application.

It would therefore appear that upon the present record no appellate court has jurisdiction to review this case upon the special appeal heretofore granted. Such being the case, it follows that the special appeal heretofore granted herein should be dismissed.

It is so ordered.

All concur.

DECK et al. v. WOFFORD et al.
(No. 20878.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1
June 2, 1920.)

1. Judgment \S 713(1)—Opinion in former action not binding as to point not passed upon.

Former opinion in a case between the same parties involving the title to the same land is not binding upon a point not passed upon therein.

2. Executors and administrators \S 175—Right to quarantine relates to mansion on land at husband's death.

The husband must have a mansion at his death, upon his land, in order that widow's quarantine may apply thereto and it is not sufficient that the husband owned the land and the widow had dower therein and subsequently erected a mansion house, and where the mansion was destroyed, remodeling a remaining smokehouse into a dwelling will not suffice.

3. Adverse possession \S 52—Acceptance of deed for dower interest from widow held not to suspend limitations as against prior owner's heirs.

Where defendant's father and predecessor in title went into possession of land, which his grantor possessed under warranty deed, the subsequent taking by defendant's father of a deed from the widow of a prior owner for her dower interest only did not have the effect to suspend the statute of limitations from running against plaintiffs, heirs of such prior owner.

4. Adverse possession §114(1) — Evidence held to show title by adverse possession.

In an ejectment action, facts found and which the evidence tended to prove held to show that title in the land in question was vested in the defendant, when suit was brought, by adverse possession under the statute of limitations, as pleaded in the answer.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Dent County;
L. B. Woodside, Judge.

Suit in ejectment by Sarah Clementine Deck and others against Ella Wofford and others. Judgment for defendants, new trial denied, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. P. Elmer, of Salem, for appellants.

G. O. Dalton and S. R. Miner, both of Salem, for respondents.

SMALL, C. I. This is a suit in ejectment by the plaintiffs, who are the heirs of John B. Smith, deceased, against the defendants, Ella Wofford and husband, John Wofford, to recover possession, rents, and profits and damages for withholding possession of a farm in said Dent county. The answer, in addition to a general denial, claims title by adverse possession under the 30-year and 10-year statutes of limitations.

The reply denied the new matter in the answer, and pleaded res adjudicata, in that the matters and things in issue had been determined in favor of the plaintiffs in this case in a cause between the parties theretofore brought by defendants against the plaintiffs in said court, and appealed and decided by the Supreme Court.

At the trial, the plaintiffs introduced in evidence the petition, answer, and reply in the former case, also the decree of the circuit court therein, and the mandate of this court. Said former suit was brought to the April term of said circuit court by Ella Wofford, as plaintiff, against Mary A. Smith, the widow (since deceased) and Sarah Clementine Deck, and the other heirs of John B. Smith, deceased, as defendants. It was a suit to quiet title to the property in question, in which the plaintiff (Ella Wofford) claimed title by adverse possession under the 30-year statute of limitations. The defendants (plaintiffs in this case) appeared in that case, and filed answer denying plaintiffs' title and claiming title as heirs and widow of said John B. Smith. The testimony was heard and the cause was tried on its merits. The circuit court found a verdict, and entered judgment for the plaintiff Ella Wofford.

The defendants appealed to this court. We reversed the judgment of the circuit court on the ground that the statute of limitations, the only question involved in the case, had not run against the defendants, heirs of said Smith, remanded the case to proceed according to the views expressed in our opinion, and our mandate was to that effect. When the cause was returned to the circuit court, it was dismissed by the plaintiff Ella Wofford. Thereupon on June 20, 1917, this suit was brought.

Our opinion in the former case is reported in the 183 S. W. 603. The opinion was by Bond, J., and, including the statement of facts, was as follows:

"This is an action filed by Ella Wofford, the plaintiff, to quiet title to 160 acres of land situated in Dent county, Mo.

"In the year 1866, John B. Smith acquired from the government title to 160 acres of land in Dent county, Mo., upon which he lived with his family until the outbreak of the Civil War. During the war the buildings on the land, except a smokehouse, were destroyed by soldiers, and Smith and his family went over to his uncle's home some distance off. In the following spring they moved again, this time over to one William Sevier's place, about one-half mile away, at which place his widow resided when he was killed in 1864, during the last year of the war.

"About a year after the husband's death his widow, Mary A. Smith, with her family moved back upon the land in question, and stayed there about one year, occupying a smokehouse, the only building remaining on the land, as her residence, at the end of which time she went to Tennessee to live.

"On July 4, 1866, letters testamentary were granted on the estate of the husband, and on October 23, 1872, an order of sale was made, which stated that Thomas W. Howe, the administrator, was to sell the property at a private sale on or before the second Monday in January, 1872, otherwise at a public sale as directed. The land was sold April 3d at a private sale to William Master, which was contrary to the directions of the order of sale. The order of sale misdescribed the lands in suit by reciting that the land was situated in township 34, instead of 33.

"On November 28, 1873, William Master by a warranty deed conveyed the land in controversy to John B. Miller, the father of the present plaintiff. In 1876 Mary A. Smith, the widow of John B. Smith, came back from Tennessee, and wanted to sell to Miller her interest as dower in the place, which interest Miller at first refused to buy, but after her application to the court, to set off her dower, he paid her $100, in consideration of which she gave him a quitclaim deed, conveying her dower in terms. Though some steps were taken preparatory to the setting off of the widow's interest, no part of the land, so far as the evidence shows, was actually surveyed and set aside as her part; and, after the purchase by Miller, all proceedings in the matter came to an end.

"From that time on Mr. Miller continues with his daughter, the present plaintiff, in the quiet and undisturbed possession of the land up until his death, which occurred about 8 years prior to the filing of this suit. Thereafter the land was held by the plaintiff and her husband under a deed from the father, John B. Miller.

"The defendants in this case are the heirs of John B. Smith, and claim a fee-simple title to the estate, subject to the dower interest of Mary A. Smith.

"The case was tried at the April term of the circuit court of Dent county. A jury was waived by the parties, and the case was submitted to the court for determination, who decreed that plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of the land in controversy.

"II. There is only one question, and that of law, in this case. It is conceded that the plaintiff has not title to the land, unless one created by the statute of limitations while it was held by her father and herself. This for the reason that her father, who deeded the land to the plaintiff, himself held under mesne conveyances from the purchaser at a void sale of the land by the administrator of J. B. Smith, whose title emanated directly from the government, and the defendants are the wife and children of the patentee. Unless, therefore, the defendants, who are the heirs of the patentee of the land, have parted with their title by grant or legal divestiture (neither of which happened) or have lost it by lapse of time and per force the statute of limitations, the decree below for the plaintiff was erroneous.

"On the 27th of November, 1878, the father of the plaintiff for $100 secured a quitclaim deed, describing the land and reciting, viz.: 'The interest herein conveyed being the dower interest of said Mary Smith in and to said lands as the widow of J. B. Smith, deceased,' which was duly executed by the dowress, Mrs. Smith. Before this happened Mrs. Smith had taken steps for the laying off of her dower, all of which were abandoned upon the sale; hence the effect of her deed was simply to convey her unassigned dower in the lands. Neither she nor her grantees could make their possession adverse to the heirs while the dower estate in the lands were unadmeasured or unassigned. Melton v. Fitch, 125 Mo. loc. cit. 290, 28 S. W. 612, and cases cited. * * * For until her death the heirs were not entitled to possession, and could not have ejectment for the land, since no dower was ever set apart therein for the widow, who was alive, and testified at the trial.

"The learned trial court seemed to think that this case was ruled by some of the views expressed in McClurg v. Turner, 74 Mo. 45, but that case was wholly different from the present. There the only issue involved related to the quarantine right of a widow to occupy the mansion house and lands belonging thereto, until the assignment of dower under the statute (R. S. 1909, § 366), a statutory privilege distinct from and prior to the right of dower. It was ruled under the particular facts of that case, showing that there was no mansion house on the land at the time of the death of the husband, that his widow could not defend by invoking the quarantine statute against an ejectment by the purchaser of the land under a valid judgment against her husband, for her statutory right was predicated upon the existence of a mansion house. Moreover, it appeared that the widow had bought the land from a third party, who claimed adversely to the husband. These two aspects of the case only were adverted to in the opinion, and it conceded that the distinct dower rights of the widow would not be affected. The case therefore is wholly without bearing on the defenses in this case that the lands in dispute were acquired by plaintiff's father by a conveyance to him of the dower estate of defendant's mother. That such estates, as well as rights of quarantine, are jealously guarded is ably stated by Sherwood, J., in Gentry v. Gentry, 122 Mo. 202, 26 S. W. 1090.

"It is apparent from this glance at the point in judgment in McClurg v. Turner, supra, that it does not touch the issue here as to the right of a purchaser (or his grantee, the plaintiff) from the dowress to hold the lands subject thereto adversely to the heirs during the life of the widow.

"That this cannot be done is the settled law of this state. Yet it is the only point presented for review, for plaintiff's father has not been dead 10 years before this suit; hence, if she were claiming in her own rights and not as his grantee, no estate could as yet be created by the statute of limitations. * * *

The facts in evidence in this case were the same as those indicated in our opinion in the former case, with the additional testimony in this case that in 1867 William Masters was in possession, claiming to have purchased the land at tax sale, and so remained until November 28, 1873, when he conveyed the land to John B. Miller, by a warranty deed, as stated by Judge Bond in our former opinion, and that said Miller remained in possession from the time he obtained his warranty deed from Masters until 1904, after which the defendant in this case, Ella Wofford, his daughter, under a deed from him was in possession and claimed to own the property, and that her possession continued from that time until the filing of this suit.

In this case, the court below made the following finding of fact:

"While there is some discrepancy between the testimony of Mrs. Mary A. Smith and Reburn Burris as to where the family was living at the time of the death of John B. Smith, yet it appears to me from her testimony that, while she was 85 years old, yet her mind seems reasonably clear as to the material facts in the case, and where they were living at the time of her husband's death and also in corroboration of her testimony as to the fact as to where she lived at the time of her son's death, and I find that her testimony in regard to these matters is correct and true, and that John B. Smith and family lived on this place as their home at the beginning of the war; that he left and went into the Confederate Army, and was killed during the last year of the war, which would be in the year 1864; that some time during the war the soldiers burned the house, and she left and went to Sinkin, and lived there one winter, which was probably the winter of 1863 and 1864, and from there she moved about half a mile to William Sevier's, and was living at Sevier's when her husband was killed, and stayed there that summer, and then moved back to the neighborhood of Wick Smith's place, and lived there one winter, and the next summer moved back to the old place, fixed up the smokehouse and lived in it that summer, and the winter following her son James died, and the next spring they moved from there up to widow Chandler's, about a half mile away, and lived there that summer, and in the fall moved on Current river to Thomas Smith's, and remained there until about Christmas, when her brother came for her and her children and took them back to Tennessee.

"That at the time of the death of John R. Smith, neither he nor his family were living on the place in controversy, and there was no dwelling house on the place, and nothing but an old smokehouse, which a year or two afterwards she fixed up and moved into with her children, stayed awhile, and then moved away from the farm."

In the former case there was no finding of fact by the trial court. In this case the court gave the following instruction, to which the plaintiffs excepted:

"The court declares the law to be that the mere right of dower, existing in a widow, does not stop or prevent the running of the statutes of limitations in favor of a stranger who is claiming the title to the same, and it is only when the right of quarantine exists, together with the right of dower, that limitation will not run against the heirs. The right of quarantine exists only when the widow is living in the mansion house at the time of the death of her husband.

"This construction was put upon the statute in the case of McClurg v. Turner, 74 Mo. on page 46, in the opinion of which Judge Henry uses the following language: 'R. S. § 2205. The language of the section implies the occupancy of the premises by the husband at his death. Until dower be assigned, the widow may remain in. This language would be wholly inapplicable to a possession and occupancy of the premises by the widow which commenced after the husband's death. It is not a dower right, but a right given by the statute, to one who has a dower right. The possession she is entitled to * * * is of the mansion house of her husband and plantation, until her dower be assigned.'

"I am unable to find where the ruling in this case has ever been modified or criticized, and under the rule laid down by Judge Henry, unless they were living on the place at the time of Smith's death, limitations would begin to run when Masters took possession of the premises."

The court sitting as a jury, found a verdict, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. After unsuccessfully moving for a new trial, the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

II. Our conclusion, when the cause was here before, that the statute of limitations had not run against the plaintiffs in this case, who were the defendants in that, was seemingly based solely upon the assumption of fact that John B. Miller went into possession, and held and claimed the land simply as the grantee of the dower interest of Mary A. Smith, which she attempted to convey to him by her deed of the 27th of November, 1878, and as said dower had never been admeasured, and the widow was still living, there was no adverse possession against the heirs of John B. Smith, and therefore whether or not there was a mansion house on the property at the time of his death was not necessary to determine and was not determined.

[1] III. The substance of the instruction given in this case, and now complained of by appellants, is that, unless Smith's family was "living on the place" at the time of Smith's death, limitations would begin to run against his heirs, when Masters took possession of the premises. The court found as a fact that at the time Smith died his family were not living on the premises, because the mansion house had been burned down and they had moved away. There is no statement in the finding of fact when Masters took possession, but there was evidence that it was before his conveyance by warranty deed to John B. Miller, which was on November 28, 1873.

The lower court, therefore, on the trial of this case, after it was remanded by us, decided in favor of the defendant Ella Wofford, because it found as a fact that there was no mansion house on the property when Smith was killed, and therefore the widow had no right of quarantine, and the statute of limitations consequently commenced to run against Smith's heirs in favor of Ella Wofford's predecessors in title and possession long prior to the date Mary A. Smith transferred her dower to John B. Miller, and thereafter continued to run in favor of said Miller and his grantee, Ella Wofford. We did not pass upon that question when the case was here before. Consequently our former opinion is not binding upon that point. Keith v. Keith, 97 Mo. loc. cit. 231, 10 S. W. 597; Mangold v. Bacon, 237 Mo. loc. cit. 514, 141 S. W. 650.

[2] IV. The quotation from McClurg v. Turner, 74 Mo. 45, in the instruction given by the court in this case, shows that under the statute in relation to the widow's quarantine there must be a mansion house of the husband at the time of his death, upon or belonging to the land in which such quarantine is claimed. If there is no such mansion house at that time, there is no quarantine. It is not sufficient that the land belonged to the husband at the time of his death, and the widow had dower therein and a mansion house was subsequently erected thereon by the widow. In this construction of the statute we concur.

In the case at bar, the mansion house in which Mary A. Smith's husband had resided burned down some time before his death, and his wife and family had left the place. Neither he nor his family lived there at the time of his death. Mere temporary absence of the husband from home or the mansion house at the time of his death would not be held to deprive the widow of her right of quarantine, but, if before the death of the husband the mansion house is destroyed by fire or sword or flood or cyclone or otherwise, and is not rebuilt or in existence at the time of his death, it cannot be said to be his mansion house at the time of his death, and hence the widow would have no quarantine therein or in the plantation or messuages belonging thereto, for the obvious reason that there would be none such in existence.

V. In this case, however, it is contended by appellants' learned counsel that the smokehouse was not destroyed, and that after Mr. Smith's death, his family returned and lived in the smokehouse, which they refitted sufficiently to be habitable, and that subsequently it was "built onto" by Ella Wofford, or her predecessors in title, and used as a dwelling or mansion house. But we hold that a smokehouse or granary or a stable or other out house on the property at and before the husband's death, but never used as a dwelling by the husband or his family or any other persons in his lifetime, is not a mansion house of the husband at the time of his death within the meaning of the statute, although it may afterwards be repaired or made habitable and used as a residence by his widow and family. The building of a mansion house or transformation of smokehouse into a mansion house on the property by the widow after her husband's death would not be a mansion house of the husband at the time of his death. McClurg v. Turner, supra; Givens v. Ott, 222 Mo. 395, 121 S. W. 23.

We hold, therefore, that under the finding of facts and the evidence in this case there was no mansion house upon or connected with the property in question, when Mr. Smith died, and therefore his widow had no right of quarantine, but simply her right of dower therein.

[3] VI. There being evidence that Ella Wofford's father, John B. Miller, her predecessor in title in 1873, went into possession and claimed to own the property under warranty deed from Masters, who was then in possession claiming title, the subsequent taking of a deed from Mary A. Smith by said John B. Miller in 1878 of her dower interest only, did not have the effect to suspend the statute of limitations from running against the plaintiffs in this case, the heirs of John B. Smith. Mather v. Walsh, 107 Mo. 121, 17 S. W. 755.

The land in question not being at the time of her husband's death in any way connected with his mansion house, Mary A. Smith had no right of possession as against the heirs if her husband, but they were entitled to the possession thereof, and her conveyance in 1878 of her dower right did not confer upon her grantee, John B. Miller, the right to the possession of said land. If said Miller, at the time he took such conveyance, was in adverse possession, under color of title, and thereafter continued in such possession, claiming the ownership of the property, and not simply Mrs. Smith's right of dower, his possession was adverse to the heirs of John B. Smith, and the statute of limitations ran against them. Indeed, in 1878, a transfer by a widow of her unassigned dower rights in property not connected with her husband's mansion house at the time of his death was a nullity, and conveyed nothing to the grantee, unless he was the terre-tenant, in which event such transfer operated simply as a release of dower. This subject was fully considered in Sell v. McAnaw, 138 Mo. loc. cit. 273, 274, 39 S. W. 779, 780, where this court, per Macfarlane, J., said:

"There is no evidence whatever that the disputed land was a part of the plantation on which was situated the mansion house of the deceased husband. The home of Crohan at his death was in another county, and this land was not used in any manner in connection with it. The widow of Crohan was not therefore entitled to the possession and use of it until her dower was assigned.

"Section 2206 (R. S. 1879) only gave her the right to remain in and enjoy the mansion house of her husband, and the 'messuages and plantation thereto belonging' until the assignment of her dower. It gives her no right to the possession of all the land of her deceased husband in which she had a dower right. Her conveyance of the land did not therefore confer upon her grantee the right to possession. She could convey no greater right than she herself possessed.

"(3) Whatever interest Crohan had in the land descended to his heirs subject to the widow's right of dower. If he was entitled to the possession, and as between the parties to this suit who claim under him we must assume that he was, the right on his death vested in his heirs.

"Until the revision of 1889 (section 4514), a widow could not, at law, before assignment, alienate her dower right by conveyance or assignment to one holding no interest in the land. She could release her claim of dower to the terre-tenant so as to bar herself, but she could invest no other person with the legal title thereto, until it had been assigned. 2 Scr. on Dower, § 42; 5 Cyclo. of Law, 906, and cases cited in each; Brawford v. Wolfe, 103 Mo. 400.

"It follows that the deed from the widow to Smith passed no legal right of title in the land to the grantee. Defendants in the use they made of the land can only be treated as trespassers, unless they have thereby acquired the title thereto by adverse possession.

"(4) It cannot be said that the acts of ownership exercised over the land by defendants were permissive, and not adverse to the claim of the heirs. The widow had no right she could confer upon her grantee. The deed conferred no right to possession, or to go upon the land and cut and remove timber therefrom. Defendants' acts of ownership were consequently hostile to the rights of plaintiffs."

In Givens v. Ott, 222 Mo. 395, 121 S. W. 23, while this court was evenly divided on the question whether there was a mansion house in that case within the meaning of the statute, there was no division on the proposition laid down in the opinion of Woodson, J., that, if there was no mansion house connected with the property, there was no quarantine and no right to possession on the part of the widow simply by reason of her unassigned dower, and that in such case, if the widow takes possession, under a deed from a third party giving her color of title to land in which she has such unassigned dower but no right of quarantine, the statute of limitations runs in her favor against the heirs from the date of such deed.

[4] We hold, therefore, that under the facts found and which the evidence tended to prove, in the case at bar the title to the land in question was vested in the defendant Ella Wofford at the time this suit was brought by adverse possession under the statutes of limitations pleaded in her answer.

There was no error in the rulings of the court below, and its judgment is affirmed.

BROWN and RAGLAND, CO., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of SMALL, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

All concur except WOODSON, J., absent.

GOODE, J., concurs in separate opinion, in which BLAIR, P. J., concurs.

GOODE, J. I concur in the result of this case for the reason that there was evidence to support the finding of the court below; that neither John B. Smith nor his family was living on the premises in controversy when he died.

BLAIR, P. J., concurs herein.

STATE v. CANTON. (No. 21918.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2
June 4, 1920.)

1. Homicide §114—Instruction denying availability of self-defense, if defendant voluntarily engaged in difficulty, held erroneous.

An instruction that, if defendant "voluntarily and of his own free will engaged in" the difficulty, self-defense was not available, is erroneous, since, if defendant voluntarily engaged in the fight in self-defense, or if, without inducing the quarrel, he was assaulted, and voluntarily defended himself, and necessarily killed his assailant to save himself from death or great bodily harm, his self-defense was complete.

2. Criminal law §829(1) — Refusal of instructions upon matters covered by others not error.

In a criminal case, it is not error to refuse instructions on matters sufficiently covered by other instructions given.

3. Homicide §389(4)—Evidence held to require instruction on manslaughter in fourth degree.

In a murder prosecution, evidence concerning an assault made upon defendant by deceased held to require an instruction on manslaughter in the fourth degree, which the court erroneously failed to give.

4. Homicide §78—Facts showing manslaughter in the second degree.

If defendant was assaulted by deceased, and struck the fatal blow with a club deceased had dropped, without design to inflict death and in a heat of passion, he would be guilty of manslaughter in the second degree, under Rev. St. 1909, § 4460.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boone County; David H. Harris, Judge.

Reed Canton was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and Lewis Hord Cook, Sp. Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WHITE, C. Information was filed in the Boone county circuit court, charging defendant with murder in the first degree, in that he killed one O. B. Diggs. The defendant, Reed Canton, was a colored boy 19 years of age, and was a first cousin to O. B. Diggs, the boy who was killed. The homicide took place Saturday night, April 12, 1919.

At that time an entertainment and supper for returned soldiers was held by the colored people at Sugar Grove church. Some exercises were performed in the church, and supper was served in a lodge hall a short distance away. About midnight, while a number of persons were in the hall, busy over the supper, the Diggs boy came rushing into the hall with a rock in his hand, laboring under some excitement, and exclaiming that he was not going to let anybody run over him. One witness testified that he was outside when the "rucus" began, and that Canton chased Diggs into the hall. Almost immediately Reed "came busting in the door," swearing and exclaiming that he was going to kill Diggs. Rev. O. F. Nelson, who seemed to have charge of the ceremonies, took hold of Canton and pushed him out of the door. Canton immediately knocked on the door with a stick of wood and asked to come in. Nelson told him he could not come in unless he would behave himself, which he promised to do. He then came in with a knife in his hand, which Nelson induced him to close and put back in his pocket. Presently Diggs disappeared from the room, and Canton soon followed him. The evidence up to that point is pretty consistent, and clearly shows about what happened inside the hall.

In a short time the two were engaged in a fight outside the hall. One witness saw them fighting, and "kind of jumping around one another," and Diggs had a stick of some kind in his hand. When on the outside, whether Canton attacked Diggs or Diggs attacked Canton is not clear from the evidence. There was evidence tending to show that as soon as Canton appeared outside Diggs struck him with a stone and staggered him up against the wall and then rushed upon Canton. At some time during the difficulty, the evidence tends to show, Diggs cut Canton's arm with a knife and assaulted him with a stick. Whether he threw the stick at him, or struck at him in such way as to let the stick slip from his hand, is not clear; at any rate Canton seized this same stick, which was a 2 x 4 scantling about three feet long, and dealt a blow which crushed Diggs' skull. Diggs was taken to the home of his grandfather, two miles away, where he died about 8 o'clock the next morning.

The boys had been friends; they were raised together. It was shown that each of them had made violent threats to kill the other. Canton explained that Diggs threatened him, and he threatened back, without meaning it at all. It also seems, from the way the threats are stated by some of the witnesses, that, although they entertained ill will toward each other, neither of them intended literally to carry out his destructive threat. About a week before the homicide the boys had a quarrel at a dance, at which time they exchanged the amenities of mutual threats. At that time Diggs said he was going to break off his knife in Canton before he left the party. On the night of the homicide, after Canton had struck Diggs down, some one said, "Now, you see what you have done," and he replied, "I have done what I wanted to do," and immediately left without waiting to see the effect of his blow.

Several witnesses were introduced by the defendant to prove that the defendant possessed a good character as a quiet and peaceable citizen, and that Diggs had a bad reputation as being quarrelsome. On the other hand, the state introduced several witnesses to prove the reverse of these conclusions. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree, and assessed defendant's punishment at imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of 10 years.

[1] I. Error is assigned, in the motion for new trial, to instruction No. 5, given by the court on its own motion, embodying the court's theory of self-defense. This instruction, after stating in a general way the theory on which they might acquit the defendant on the ground of self-defense, uses this expression:

"The right of self-defense does not imply the right of attack, and it will not avail in any case where the difficulty is sought for and induced by the party by any willful act of his, or where he voluntarily and of his own free will enters into it."

The instruction then proceeds to apply the principle to this case, as follows:

"So, if you believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant, Canton, voluntarily sought or invited the difficulty in which Diggs lost his life, or that he (defendant) provoked or commenced or brought it on by any willful act of his own, or that he voluntarily and of his own free will engaged in it, then, in that case, you are not authorized to acquit him on the ground of self-defense; and this is true, no matter how violent defendant's passion became, or how hard soever he was pressed, or how imminent his peril became, during the progress of the affray. In determining who provoked or commenced the difficulty, or made the first assault, you may and should take into consideration all the facts and circumstances in evidence before you."

This instruction denies to the defendant the right of self-defense, and makes self-defense unavailable to him if he "voluntarily and of his own free will engaged in" the difficulty, without regard to what motive induced him to engage in it, or at what stage of the proceeding his action became voluntary. If he engaged in a difficulty with a felonious purpose, of course, he could not be acquitted on the ground of self-defense; but if he engaged in it voluntarily, for some unlawful purpose short of an intention to commit a felony, it might, under the circumstances, reduce his offense to manslaughter. If he voluntarily engaged in it in pure self-defense—that is, if without inducing the quarrel he was assaulted, and he "voluntarily" defended himself, and in such defense necessarily killed his assailant in order to save himself from death or great bodily harm—his self-defense was complete. State v. Eastham, 240 Mo. loc. cit. 250, 251, 144 S. W. 492; State v. Rapp, 142 Mo. 447, 44 S. W. 270; State v. Partlow, 90 Mo. 608, 4 S. W. 14, 59 Am. Rep. 31; State v. Feeley, 194 Mo. 321, 92 S. W. 663, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 351, 112 Am. St. Rep. 511; State v. Burns, 213 S. W. loc. cit. 116, 117; State v. Hopkins, 213 S. W. 126, loc. cit. 128; State v. Reeves, 195 S. W. loc. cit. 1029. In each of the above cases it is very distinctly held that an instruction of the kind set out above takes away the defendant's right of self-defense altogether.

[2-4] II. Error is assigned also in the motion for new trial to the action of the court in refusing several instructions asked by the defendant. All these are covered by the instructions given by the court, except an instruction on manslaughter in the fourth degree. It is necessary to determine whether such an instruction should be given on a retrial of the case under the evidence as presented. One gathers from the reading of the evidence that Canton was the aggressor and Diggs was endeavoring to keep out of his way. Although Diggs loaded himself with a stone, a knife, and a club, it may fairly be concluded that all that display was mere bluff, a bravado induced by fear rather than by criminal intent; possibly that was the view taken of the evidence by the jury. Yet there is positive evidence of his using those weapons, and the jury should have been instructed on the significance of such demonstrations.

The boys both had indulged in extravagant threats. This, however, should not be taken too seriously. When Diggs threatened to break his knife off in Canton, a week before the affray, and when Canton chased Diggs in the hall and said that he would kill him, these expressions might have been negro "big talk," that meant much less than the murderous purpose the words would signify. The people in the hall, who interfered between the boys evidently did not take them seriously. They took no steps which would be necessary, were the two boys understood to be intent upon killing each other. "Brother Nelson" and the others merely requested Canton to promise that he would behave. Their attention was not even diverted from the management of the festival on which they were engaged. They apparently almost lost sight of the boys immediately after their first entrance into the hall until the fight occurred outside.

What was the extent of Canton's criminal purpose, if any? He rushed into the hall after some "rucus" with Diggs. Diggs had a rock in his hand, but Canton had nothing—had no weapon of any kind at that time. This may have been a mere boyish scrap, without extreme anger, which involved a felonious purpose. Canton was put out, and immediately knocked on the door and secured admittance, entering with the knife in his hand. On the persuasion of "Brother Nelson," he quite submissively put up his knife and promised to behave himself. So far as outward manifestation went, his combative impulse had subsided. The next thing which occurred after that was when both boys had slipped out of doors; Diggs going first. There is evidence tending to show that immediately Diggs made a rush at Canton, hit him with a stone, assaulted him with a knife, and struck at him with a club. Just the precise sequence of these events is not clear. There is evidence tending to show that all these acts were performed before Canton made any further hostile demonstration; then he picked up the stick or club, which had slipped from Diggs' hand, and struck Diggs down with it.

One might reasonably conclude from this state of things that Canton struck the fatal blow with the cruel and unusual instrument he used, without design to inflict death. In that case he would be guilty of manslaughter in the second degree under section 4460. State v. Luke, 104 Mo. 563, 16 S. W. 242; State v. Jennings, 184 Mo. 277, 35 S. W. 614; State v. Wilson, 98 Mo. 440, 11 S. W. 985. However, there was no error assigned in the motion for new trial that the court did not fully instruct, or failed to instruct on manslaughter in the second degree.

It is possible to infer from the evidence that Canton really intended to "behave" when he put up his knife at the request of the preacher, cooled down, and intended to carry the difficulty no further; that when he went out of doors he was assaulted, without any additional aggressive action on his part by Diggs; and that he struck Diggs down in a sudden heat of passion aroused by that assault. In that case an instruction on manslaughter in the fourth degree should have been given.

The appellant has filed no brief in this court, but the errors above noted are the only ones deserving consideration mentioned in the motion for new trial.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

MOONEYHAM v. MYNATT et al.
(No. 20596.)(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)1. Appeal and error §1011(1)—Findings on conflicting evidence conclusive.

In suit to quiet title, where the case is one at law and is tried without a jury, the findings of trial court on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

2. Judgment §671—Unknown heirs represented by counsel bound by finding as to heirs.

In suit to quiet title under Rev. St. 1909, § 2535, against unknown heirs of certain persons, where court under section 1776 appointed counsel to represent heirs, if any, who did not appear, who filed answer for any such heirs, but did not appeal from the judgment, court's finding as to who were the only heirs was binding on any such unknown heirs.

3. Appeal and error §877(2) — Defendants, not heirs of decedent, cannot complain of finding as to his heirs.

In suit to quiet title under Rev. St. 1909, § 2535, against unknown heirs of certain persons, where court under section 1776 appointed counsel to represent heirs, if any, who did not appear, who filed answer for any such heirs, but did not appeal from the judgment, defendants, other than heirs of such persons, claiming land by adverse possession, could not complain of court's findings as to who were the only heirs of such persons.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; Joseph D. Perkins, Judge.

Suit by R. A. Mooneyham against Fannie Mynatt and others. Judgment for defendant, Stubblefield, and the other defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. H. & W. E. Bailey, of Carthage, for appellants.

John H. Crain, of Ft. Scott, Kan., for respondent Stubblefield.

BLAIR, P. J. This is a suit under section 2535, R. S. 1909, to quiet title to Jasper county land. After the answers were in the original plaintiff withdrew, and the case proceeded to judgment upon the conflicting claims of parties defendant. Appellants are the heirs of A. J. Osborn, who, they contend, acquired title by adverse possession. Respondent and his sister are nephew and niece of George and John Prigmore, who had the record title and died without issue. Respondent had acquired his sister's interest by deed. Respondent had appeared and answered in response to notice to the unknown heirs of George and John Prigmore. The case was at law, and was tried without a jury. No declarations of law were asked or given. The principal question presented is whether there is any correct legal theory, supported by substantial evidence, justifying the judgment.

ment. Thompson v. Stilwell, 253 Mo. loc. cit. 94, 161 S. W. 681.

[1] There was evidence tending to prove that A. J. Osborn had possession of the land for the requisite period, and some evidence that he claimed ownership of it. There was other evidence tending to prove that Osborn took possession of the land to care for it for the benefit of the heirs of George and John Prigmore and in recognition of their title. The trial court settled the conflict against appellants, and its finding, in the circumstances, is conclusive. Thompson v. Stilwell, supra, 253 Mo. loc. cit. 96, 161 S. W. 681.

[2, 3] It is contended that evidence offered to prove that respondent and his sister are the only surviving heirs of George and John Prigmore is not sufficient to justify the court's finding that they were so. The suit was brought against the unknown heirs of George and John Prigmore. The trial court appointed counsel (section 1776, R. S. 1909) to represent such of these, if any, as did not appear. Answer was filed for them. It is not suggested there was any defect in the notice. The issue whether respondent and his sister were the only heirs was tried, and the trial court sustained respondent's contention. No appeal by the unknown heirs was taken. This finding binds them. Appellants are in no position to question it.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDERSON v. COLLINS.(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)1. Wills §58(2)—Oral agreements to devise must be clearly established.

Oral agreements to devise land must be established by clear and convincing proof; loose remarks and statements of legal conclusions not sufficing under the law to establish such contracts.

2. Wills §58(2)—Evidence held insufficient to prove oral agreement to devise.

Evidence held insufficient to show any oral contract by an aged invalid to devise to plaintiff in return for care by plaintiff and his wife certain realty subsequently deeded by the invalid to defendant.

3. Quieting title §51—Court properly entered judgment for defendant, who showed best title.

In an action to quiet title, under Rev. St. 1909, § 2535, the court properly entered judgment for defendant, who showed the best title as between the parties, plaintiff claiming under an oral contract to devise not sufficiently established, and defendant claiming under a warranty deed from the alleged contractor with plaintiff.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pemiscot County; Sterling H. McCarty, Judge.

Suit by Richard Anderson against W. M. Collins. From decree for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

On August 11, 1917, plaintiff filed, in the circuit court of Pemiscot county, Mo., a petition in two counts. The first is a proceeding in equity in which it is alleged that in November, 1915, he made a contract with William Harris, who was then the owner of lot 1 in block 18 in Hunter's addition to the city of Caruthersville, in Pemiscot county, Mo., by the terms of which plaintiff was to maintain, take care of, and support said William Harris during his natural life, and in consideration thereof said Harris promised plaintiff to will him the house and lot where Harris resided and all other property owned by said Harris at the time of his death; that, pursuant to said contract, plaintiff and his wife moved to the Harris property aforesaid on November 29, 1915, and from that date until the _____ day of June, 1916, he maintained, took care of, and supported said William Harris; that on November 29, 1915, said Harris executed a will devising and bequeathing to plaintiff all his property, both real and personal; that on the _____ day of June, 1916, said Harris died, and his will aforesaid was probated in Pemiscot county aforesaid; that about June 1, 1916, one J. L. Smith, for the consideration of $1, and the further consideration of $5, to be paid by him weekly to said William Harris during his natural life, caused said Harris to execute to him a deed in writing conveying to said Smith the real estate aforesaid; that said instrument recites, as a further consideration, that said Smith was to comfortably support and maintain said Harris during his natural life; that Smith thereupon moved said Harris from the property aforesaid where he was living with plaintiff to an out-building on the premises of said Smith, at which place said Harris died within two or three weeks after said removal; that said change was made over the protest of this plaintiff; that up to the time of said removal plaintiff fully performed all of the conditions of his contract aforesaid, and would have performed the same in full but for the removal of said Harris as aforesaid; that, when plaintiff took charge of said Harris, the latter was an invalid, unable to care for himself, and when he executed said deed to Smith he was in a weak mental and physical condition, and was practically on his deathbed; that said Smith, when he received the deed from Harris aforesaid, had notice or knowledge of the contract existing between plaintiff and said Harris; that said Smith, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding plaintiff out of the benefits of his contract, induced said Harris to leave plaintiff's residence and make the deed to him, which was a fraud on plaintiff's rights; that the deed from Harris to Smith was duly recorded in said county in Book 59, page 319; that on July 29, 1916, said Smith and wife conveyed the real estate aforesaid to defendant, W. M. Collins, whose deed is also recorded in said county in Book 59 at page 386.

Said count concludes with a prayer asking that plaintiff be declared the owner of said real estate; that defendant has no interest therein; that the deed from Harris to Smith aforesaid and from the latter and wife to defendant Collins be canceled, for naught held, and for general relief.

The second count of said petition alleges that plaintiff is the owner of the real estate aforesaid; that defendant claims some right, title, estate, and interest in and to said real estate adverse and prejudicial to plaintiff.

This count concludes with a prayer in which the court is asked to try, ascertain, and determine the rights, title, and interests of the parties, plaintiff and defendant, respectively, in and to said real estate, and to define by its judgment and decree the rights, titles, and interests of plaintiff and defendant severally in said real estate, and that, if defendant is found to have no interest in same, he be enjoined from setting up any claim to same, and for general relief.

The court, in its decree, dismissed plaintiff's bill as to the first count of petition, and under the second count decreed that defendant is the owner of said real estate and that plaintiff has no interest therein.

The evidence and rulings of the court will be considered, as far as necessary, in the opinion.

Plaintiff filed his motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. Both motions were overruled, and the cause was appealed by him to this court.

Phillips & Brewer, for appellant.

McKay & Medling and Ward & Reeves, for respondent.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). I. The oral contract relied upon by appellant as a basis of recovery is heretofore set out, as disclosed by the first count of petition, and need not be repeated. This is not a suit for specific performance of the alleged oral agreement; for it appears from the record that on November 29, 1915, said Wm. Harris executed a will conveying all the real estate and personal property which he owned at the time of his death to this plaintiff, after the funeral expenses were paid. The above will, was duly probated in Pemiscot County aforesaid on October 25, 1916. The real question, therefore, presented for our consideration is whether or not such an oral contract was made between plaintiff and testator in November, 1915, as precluded the latter from conveying the real estate in controversy to J. L. Smith on June 10, 1916, by the warranty deed to the latter recorded in said county on June 12, 1916; in other words, was such an oral contract shown at the trial as would have warranted the chancellor in specifically enforcing said agreement had said Harris, or his legal representative, refused to convey said property to plaintiff under the will aforesaid?

In the well-considered case of Forrister v. Sullivan, 231 Mo. loc. cit. 373, 374, 132 S. W. 730, Judge Lamm, speaking for the other division of our court, laid down the following principles which should govern in a case of this character:

"(a) The conversations relied on as proof of the contract should not be too ancient, loose, and casual.

"(b) The contract should be fair and just, not a fetching, biting, or otherwise unconscionable bargain, regard being had to the condition in life of the parties.

"(c) The terms of the contract should be so clear and definite as to free it from ambiguity and leave no doubt in certainty of terms or intentment.

"(d) The proof must show not only that some contract was made, but that the contract counted on in the bill was made.

"(e) Performance must be shown as far as practicable. It must be unequivocal. The acts relied on to show performance must in their nature be referable alone to the very contract sought to be performed; for it is only thereby, because of the benefits arising to the promisee, that his conscience and that of those claiming under him are bound. In a word, the acts relied on to show performance must point unerringly to the contract in suit and to none other. There must be an absence of doubt or equivocation throughout the whole case in pleadings and proof. From end to end it must be made out beyond a reasonable doubt and the state of the proof must bring the case within the reason of the exception to the statute, viz. that not to perform in kind, or in sort, would itself be a fraud.

"(f) The contract must be grounded on an adequate and legal consideration and it should be made clear to the mind of the chancellor that the law could not give adequate and perfect relief in damages, thereby attaining the full end and justice of the case and reaching the whole mischief; hence the interference of equity is necessary to do rounded justice.

"(g) A mere testamentary disposition to devise by will or a mere benevolent disposition to convey by deed, by way of gift or as a reward for services not plainly provoked by and bottomed on the contract in suit, will not take the case out of the statute."

[1] The principles of law enunciated in the above quotation are recognized as sound in this state. McCune v. Graves, 273 Mo. loc. cit. 589, 201 S. W. 894; Hersman v. Hersman, 253 Mo. 175, 186, 161 S. W. 800; Walker v. Bohannon, 243 Mo. 119, 136, 137, 147 S. W. 1024; Oliver v. Johnson, 238 Mo. loc. cit. 373, 142 S. W. 274; Collins v. Harrell, 219 Mo. 301, 118 S. W. 342, et seq. It must also be kept in mind that oral agreements of this character must be established by clear and convincing proof. Loose remarks, and statements of legal conclusions, will not suffice under the law to establish such contracts. State ex rel. v. Brewing Co., 270 Mo. loc. cit. 108, 109, 192 S. W. 1022, L. R. A. 1917D, 1023; State ex rel. v. Railroad, 240 Mo. loc. cit. 50, 144 S. W. 1088; Gibson v. Railroad, 225 Mo. loc. cit. 482, 125 S. W. 453; Shohoney v. Railroad, 223 Mo. loc. cit. 671, 122 S. W. 1025; Vogeler v. Punch, 205 Mo. loc. cit. 576, 577, 103 S. W. 1001; Mallinckrodt Chemical Works v. Nemnich, 169 Mo. loc. cit. 397, 69 S. W. 355; Sidway v. Missouri Land & Live Stock Co., 163 Mo. loc. cit. 374, 375, 63 S. W. 705; Pier et al. v. Heinrichoffen et al., 52 Mo. loc. cit. 335, 336.

Let us turn to the evidence and consider the same in respect to the alleged parol contract.

Cam Bedford, a witness for plaintiff, testified on this subject as follows:

"I remember being at his [William Harris'] house one day when Richard Anderson was there, and there was some contract made between them.

"Q. Just tell what the contract was between old man Harris and Richard Anderson. A. He [William Harris] wanted somebody to take care of him during his life, and he would will them the place. He was talking to Richard Anderson. Richard Anderson said to him, 'I will see my wife, and it will be all right.'

"Q. What was Anderson to do? A. He was only to wait on him and take care of him.

"Q. Was he to move into the house and take care of Harris? A. No, sir; he didn't say that. He [Anderson] went and saw his wife and then came back and made the contract. The contract commenced with Anderson and finished with his wife. After that time, or rather after this conversation between Harris and Anderson, I think it was the same week. Anderson and his wife moved into the house with William Harris. Anderson stayed in the house with William Harris about five or six months from the time he moved there. While Anderson and his wife were in possession of that property, they took care of Harris; it seems like they were very careful in taking care of him, keeping him clean."

This witness gives no date; does not mention who was present; does not claim to have gone with Anderson to see the latter's wife; does not claim to have heard any conversation between Anderson and his wife; and, finally, does not testify to any facts tending to show a contract between plaintiff and Harris by which the latter obligated himself to give his home and property at his death to plaintiff for supporting and taking care of him during his natural life. Aside from the bald conclusion of witness that they made a contract, which is of no value in weighing the evidence, the above testimony does not prove or tend to establish the contract heretofore set out in petition.

George Veasey, in behalf of plaintiff, testified that he had a conversation with J. L. Smith before testator moved to the home of latter. Witness testified:

"I told him [Smith] he ought not to bother Anderson and his wife, and he said he was going to buy the place. I told him I knew there was a contract between Anderson and old man Harris, and if I was him I wouldn't disturb him, and he said to me then he had a right to buy the place; that old man Harris wanted to sell it and he had a right to buy it."

On cross-examination this witness testified:

"I told Smith there was a contract between Anderson and old man Harris, and he ought not to bother him, and I also told him that Harris had willed the property to Anderson."

"Q. You didn't tell him anything about the contract? A. I told him that he had willed it." (Italics ours.)

This witness was testifying as to a conversation he claims to have had with Smith, who is not a party to the suit, and who had parted with his interest in the property before this action was brought. Witness does not testify that he was present when any contract was attempted to be made between plaintiff and Harris. Nor does he undertake to give even the substance of any contract between said parties, much less the one alleged in petition. This evidence has no probative force in the way of establishing the alleged contract described in petition.

Richard Anderson, the plaintiff, testified in his own behalf, without objection, as follows:

"I am the plaintiff in this case. I moved into the house with old man Harris in November, 1915. I got out of possession of this house August 18, 1917. I lived in that house from the time I went there in November, 1915, until in August, 1917."

On cross-examination plaintiff testified:

"I claim this property by that will."

S. E. Juden was sworn as a witness in behalf of plaintiff, and testified without objection as follows:

"I am the sheriff of this county. I received an execution in the case of William Collins v. Richard Anderson in 1917 to dispossess Richard Anderson of the house in question. Refreshing my memory from the execution, I find that it was dated the 16th day of August, 1917. It was about two days, I think, the second day after I received it, I went out to dispossess Anderson, and he was in possession of the house at that time. I told him I had come to put him out of the possession of the property, and requested that he get a dray and move, and he consented to do that. That was something about the 18th day of August, 1917."

We have set out fully all the testimony in the case relating to the alleged oral contract pleaded in first count of petition. While the authorities heretofore cited require clear and convincing proof that the oral contract as alleged in petition was made between plaintiff and William Harris, yet there is an entire failure of proof upon this subject. Even considering the legal conclusions testified to by some of plaintiff's witnesses, still his evidence falls far short of establishing the contract mentioned in petition, or any other contract.

[2] The trial court reached a correct conclusion in holding that plaintiff was not entitled to recover on the first count of his petition.

[3] 2. Having found against the plaintiff on the first count, it necessarily follows that the deed from William Harris to J. L. Smith conveyed the legal title to the property in controversy, and plaintiff acquired no interest in said real estate on account of the will of said Harris. The evidence, as disclosed by the record, shows that defendant Collins was in possession of said property at the date of trial under a deed from said J. L. Smith. In the second count of petition the court was asked to ascertain and determine the title to said real estate under section 2535, R. S. 1909, as between plaintiff and defendant, and to render its judgment accordingly. The court was within the law in finding for defendant upon the second count of petition. Brooks v. Roberts (Mo.) 195 S. W. loc. cit. 1021, and cases cited.

The judgment below is accordingly affirmed.

STATE v. SMITH. (No. 21945.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)1. Criminal law \S 230—Evidence held to show that defendant was accorded a fair preliminary hearing.

Evidence held to warrant finding that defendant was accorded a fair preliminary hearing, under Rev. St. 1909, § 5056, as amended by Acts 1913, p. 225, and other statutes relating to preliminary hearing.

2. Homicide \S 223—Defendant's testimony at coroner's inquest admissible only if voluntarily made.

In determining whether a statement of a defendant accused of murder made at the coroner's inquest is admissible in evidence against him, the test is whether the statement was voluntary.

3. Homicide \S 223—That defendant was under arrest at time of coroner's inquest did not render testimony inadmissible.

That defendant was under arrest at the time of his testimony at coroner's inquest is not, of itself, sufficient to exclude testimony as involuntary.

4. Homicide \S 223—Defendant's statement at coroner's inquest held inadmissible.

Where defendant, accused of committing cold-blooded murder, was brought to the coroner's inquest after having been in the custody of an officer from the moment he knew he was suspected of the crime, was entirely without advice of counsel or friend, and at coroner's inquest was surrounded by a gathering crowd of angry citizens who threatened to lynch him, his testimony during the inquest, in which he disclaimed all knowledge of the incidents connected with the alleged crime, held inadmissible; the circumstances being such as to indicate that statement at inquest was not entirely voluntary.

5. Homicide \S 175—Testimony as to analysis of deceased's stomach admissible only on showing identity of stomach examined.

In prosecution for murder by furnishing deceased with poisoned whisky, it was necessary, in order to admit testimony showing the result of the analysis of deceased's stomach, to satisfy the court of the identity of the stomach examined with that of deceased and to prove that it was in the same condition when examined as when removed from deceased's body, by proof of circumstances such as to establish a reasonable assurance that stomach was the same and in the same condition; but it was not necessary to show that it was not accessible to anybody or that there was an entire absence of opportunity for anybody to tamper with it.

6. Homicide \S 175—Analysis of deceased's stomach admissible in absence of circumstances indicating tampering with same.

In prosecution for murder committed by furnishing deceased with poisoned whisky, testimony as to chemical analysis of deceased's stomach held admissible in absence of a showing of circumstances raising a suspicion as to whether it had been molested or tampered with prior to analysis, even though it had not been preserved with proper care.

7. Criminal law \S 387—When negative testimony is admissible.

Negative evidence is admissible only if it tends to contradict positive evidence introduced by other party, or tends to exclude the existence of a fact sworn to by other party.

8. Criminal law \S 387—That druggists immediately accessible to defendant had not sold defendant poison held inadmissible.

In prosecution for murder committed by furnishing deceased with whisky poisoned with strychnine, evidence that no druggist immediately accessible to defendant had sold him strychnine during the preceding two years was not admissible to show that defendant did not have possession of strychnine prior to alleged homicide, in absence of testimony that defendant could not have procured strychnine in any other manner.

9. Homicide \S 160—Poison may be traced into the possession of accused.

In a case of murder by poison it is important, if not necessary, to trace poison into the possession of accused.

10. Criminal law \S 419, 420(12)—Petition in civil action for assault inadmissible in prosecution for murder.

In prosecution for murder, where deceased had instituted an action for assault and battery which was pending at the time of the murder trial, the petition in the damage suit alleging facts showing cruel and violent assault and battery inflicted upon deceased by defendant was not admissible, being hearsay.

11. Criminal law \S 419, 420(12)—Anonymous letter to defendant purporting to have been sent by friend inadmissible as hearsay.

In prosecution for murder committed by furnishing deceased with poisoned whisky, testimony as to anonymous letter received by defendant, purporting to have been sent by a friend, warning him that there was danger of his water being poisoned, held inadmissible to show that his whisky had been poisoned by others who had planned to poison defendant; statements in the letter being hearsay and incompetent, and being too remote to possess any probative value.

12. Homicide \S 190(1)—Threatening letter from deceased admissible.

In murder prosecution, a threatening letter traced to deceased would have been admissible.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wright County; C. H. Skinker, Judge.

Randle Smith was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The appeal in this case is from a conviction of murder in the first degree. Defendant was charged with having murdered one

Alfred Hutsell on the 4th day of July, 1919, in Wright county, Mo., by administering strychnine to him. The defendant, Randle Smith, was a farmer about 35 years of age, living near Astoria, in the northeast part of Wright county, Mo. He was married and had two small children. The deceased, Alfred Hutsell, was unmarried, 21 years of age, and resided about a mile distant from the residence of the defendant. Some time prior to the date of the alleged homicide defendant was indicted for felonious assault upon Hutsell, and at the same time Hutsell sued him for $10,000 damage on account of the injuries received. Hutsell went to Kansas City, where he had X-ray pictures taken of his head, which was alleged to have been injured in the assault, for the purpose of using the pictures in his civil suit and in the criminal prosecution. Both of those cases were pending July 4, 1919, on which date a picnic was held at Astoria.

The state introduced evidence to show that defendant, Hutsell, and one Ernest Rayborn, a young man 25 years of age, attended this picnic. Some time during the forenoon the defendant requested Rayborn, who was a friend of his, to get Hutsell drunk and find out the result of the X-ray examination in Kansas City. Rayborn was not averse to undertaking the enterprise, understanding, perhaps, that he would be required to drink some too. Accordingly, Smith drove off and returned in about 20 minutes with his coat on. Rayborn was in his shirt sleeves. The two went from the picnic ground down to a ford in a creek near by. Smith exhibited two Tanlac bottles full of liquid; one was paler than the other, and Rayborn suggested that there were two kinds of whisky. Smith replied, no, he had weakened one. Rayborn said he hardly ever drank weakened whisky. They hid the bottles in a pile of driftwood and returned to the picnic ground. Rayborn soon after found Hutsell, went with him to the driftwood, took out the bottle which exhibited color, and the two drank its contents. They returned to the picnic ground, loitered around for an hour and a half, and then went back to the drift for the purpose of drinking from the other bottle. They had been observed, however, by one Jim Wilhite, who followed them and came up as they drew the whisky from its hiding place. Rayborn tasted it and spat it out, saying it was very bitter; Hutsell and Wilhite, each in turn, did the same. Rayborn put the bottle back in the drift, hunted up Smith, and asked him what was the matter with the whisky. Smith explained that there was some caked Tanlac in the bottle which he could not get out and he just put the whisky in on it; he said, "There is nothing in it to hurt you." After loitering around the grounds for another hour and a half Rayborn and Hutsell went back to the drift; each took a drink from the bottle and returned to the picnic ground. In a short while Rayborn became quite sick and sent for Smith, who manifested great reluctance to come but finally came. A conversation ensued between Rayborn and Smith in which Rayborn asked Smith what he poisoned him for, saying that Smith had put poison in the whisky that he gave him that morning. Smith denied giving him poisoned whisky.

Antidotes of grease, eggs, cream, and sweet milk were administered to Rayborn and he recovered, although he was confined to his room for about two weeks. Hutsell died a few minutes after the two returned from taking the last dram. Physicians who attended Rayborn and who were told of the symptoms shown by Hutsell said the symptoms all indicated strychnine poisoning. The stomach of Hutsell was removed from his body the next day by a physician and delivered to the prosecuting attorney, C. H. Jackson, who swore that he afterwards took it to Springfield and delivered it to a chemist, Dr. Atherton, together with the bottle containing the remainder of the pale liquor from which the last drinks had been taken. Dr. Atherton testified that a chemical analysis showed a large quantity of strychnine in the bottle; a quantity so great that very little of the liquor would be sufficient to produce death. He also found traces of strychnine in the stomach which was handed to him by the prosecuting attorney. Wilhite testified that he was made sick by the taste which he took of the liquor.

The defendant was arrested the afternoon of Hutsell's death. He was kept in custody that night and the next morning was taken to Astoria, where an inquest was held. There he was sworn and stated that he had not given Rayborn any whisky at any time and repeated the statement later in the afternoon of the same day at Manes, a short distance from Astoria, where his preliminary hearing was held before a justice of the peace.

The state showed that some threats had been made by the defendant against the deceased a year or more before the picnic. The defendant testified that he had been advised by his attorney to have some friend talk to Hutsell and learn the result of his X-ray examination in Kansas City, and that on one occasion before the picnic he requested Rayborn, who always had been his friend, to find out what he could from Hutsell in regard to the matter, and Rayborn relied that he might if he had a quart of whisky. Defendant soon afterwards purchased a quart of whisky in Mountain Grove from a man who was designated as a bootlegger. Defendant took the quart of whisky to his barn, filled the two Tanlac bottles, also another bottle which he took to his house, leaving the Tanlac bottles in the barn; he said he never saw them again until the 4th of July, when he had a talk with Rayborn, got the whisky, and delivered it to Rayborn in the manner above described. He testified that he had never owned any strychnine, had never bought any, had never been out of Wright county and Texas county except on one occasion when he made a short visit to relatives in Arkansas. The defendant put his character in issue and offered a number of witnesses to testify that he had a good reputation for honesty, truth, and veracity, and as a law-abiding citizen. The state offered several witnesses who testified that the defendant had a bad reputation in those respects. Other facts shown in the evidence will be mentioned in considering the errors assigned by the defendant.

A. M. Curtis, J. W. Jackson, and Geo. C. Murrell, all of Hartville, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen. (Don C. Carter, of Sturgeon, of counsel), for the State.

WHITE, C. (after stating the facts as above). I. The defendant filed a motion to quash the information on the ground that he had not been accorded a proper preliminary hearing. The trial court took evidence upon the motion.

On the 5th day of July, after the inquest was held at Astoria, the defendant testified that he was asked by the prosecuting attorney if he were ready for his preliminary trial and he said he was not; that he wanted his attorney, Mr. Curtis. Mr. Curtis was in Colorado. Then he asked for Mr. J. W. Jackson, attorney, and Mr. Jackson was at Hartville. The prosecuting attorney advised him that it was not necessary to have an attorney: that he could go ahead and have his preliminary anyway. He made no further objection.

The prosecuting attorney, C. H. Jackson, testified that after the coroner's inquest was over the defendant came to him and told him he wanted his preliminary examination that day. The prosecutor told him he could have it that afternoon if he could get the state's witnesses. The preliminary proceeded without objection from the defendant until nearly all the witnesses for the state were examined; the defendant then said that he saw where he had made his mistake; that he ought to have had a lawyer. Both the justice and the prosecuting attorney stated that the defendant was told several times during the progress of the hearing that he could have any witnesses he desired and they would stop the proceedings until he could get them. The defendant himself did not claim to have made any further objection to proceeding with the hearing. Upon this evidence the trial court overruled the motion.

he was not advised fully of his rights in the matter—his right to counsel; his right to have witnesses—nor did he complain of a lack of opportunity to procure witnesses. The finding of the trial court upon the evidence thus produced that the defendant was accorded a fair preliminary hearing was warranted, and the requirements of section 5056, as amended by the Acts of 1913, p. 225, and other sections relating to the preliminary hearing, were fully met.

II. The state offered to prove the statements made by the defendant at the coroner's inquest and also at the preliminary hearing. The trial court sent the jury out and took evidence for the purpose of ascertaining under what circumstances the statements were made, then excluded the statement made at the preliminary hearing, but permitted the state's witnesses to testify to what defendant said at the coroner's inquest.

The facts developed in determining the competency of the evidence showed that the defendant was arrested late in the afternoon of the day of the death of Hutsell, charged with murder. He was put in jail that night and the next morning taken to the coroner's inquest at Astoria, the exact distance from Hartville not given. At the inquest, during the progress of the investigation, the justice of the peace, U. S. Wade, who conducted the inquest, went to the defendant and asked him if he desired to testify. What was said by the defendant in answer to that is somewhat in dispute. The defendant swore that he asked the justice, "What would you do about it?" And the justice said, "You do just as you please about it." And defendant said, "I don't know what I ought to do;" but finally said he would just as well testify. The prosecuting attorney did not arrive at the coroner's inquiry until after it had begun; he and another witness, who testified to what was said by the defendant to the justice at that time, seemed uncertain as to the exact language used. At any rate, the defendant was sworn, gave his statement, and was cross-examined, mainly by the members of the jury.

It was shown that quite a crowd had gathered at the place where the inquest was held. Feeling ran high against the defendant and showed itself in remarks indicating a desire of some to lynch him. This was said by the state's witnesses. No one told the defendant that what he said at that time might be used against him at his trial. He said himself that he was ignorant of his constitutional right that he could not be compelled to make a statement against himself. The state claims that the excited crowd did not gather at the inquest, but at the preliminary in the afternoon; but the evidence of the prosecutor himself shows the crowd and angry expression "at the time of the coroner's inquest."

[2, 3] In determining whether a statement of a defendant under such circumstances is admissible in evidence against him, the test is whether the statement is voluntary. State v. Marion, 235 Mo. 359, loc. cit. 376, 138 S. W. 491; State v. Blackburn, 273 Mo. loc. cit. 482, 201 S. W. 96; State v. Young, 119 Mo. 495, 24 S. W. 1038; State v. Thornton, 245 Mo. loc. cit. 440, 150 S. W. 1048; State v. Miller, 264 Mo. loc. cit. 450, 175 S. W. 191. It may be gathered from those cases that in every case where a defendant is subpoenaed and appears at a coroner's inquest or a preliminary hearing and testifies, his statement is not voluntary and therefore is not admissible against him. The fact that he is under arrest, it appears, is not of itself sufficient to exclude his testimony as involuntary, but if the circumstances under which he is in custody are such as to show it was not entirely voluntary it should be excluded.

[4] Here the defendant was brought to the coroner's inquest after having been in the custody of an officer from the moment he knew he was suspected of the crime, and was entirely without advice of counsel or friend. The attorneys who represented him in cases then pending were absent: the principal one away from the state, and the other one at Hartville. He was suddenly confronted with condemning evidence of the state's witnesses; he was charged with a cold-blooded murder which included his friend Rayborn, and surrounded by a gathering crowd of angry citizens who were breathing threats against his life, and doubtless by their attitude showed their hostile feeling. Under the pressure of those circumstances he disclaimed all knowledge of the incidents connected with the alleged crime—he had not bought any whisky; had not given any to Rayborn; had not talked about it—statements which naturally would spring from a frightened man who was perplexed by the sudden emergency and the danger of immediate violence at the hands of the mob. If he should at that time confess the facts to which he testified on the trial—that he had bought the whisky and procured the agency of Rayborn in administering it to the deceased for the purpose of loosening Hutsell's tongue—he naturally feared the result. The circumstances were such as to indicate that the statement was not entirely voluntary, and not what he would have said nor what he did say after the apparent danger was removed. The admission of the evidence was error requiring a reversal of the case.

III. Dr. J. Leroy Atherton, chemist living at Springfield, testified to what he found in the contents of the human stomach and in a Tanlac bottle delivered to him by Mr. Jackson, prosecuting attorney of Wright county. This was objected to on the ground that it was not shown that the stomach of Hutsell had been kept in the same condition in which it was taken from his body, and that it remained so at the time Dr. Atherton examined it. The evidence shows that on the 5th of July the stomach was removed from the body of Hutsell by Dr. Latimer, who placed it in a large glass jar. The jar was not fastened, but had a glass top that set down in the jar. A part of the contents of the stomach spilled out in the jar and remained in that condition. He delivered it to the prosecuting attorney, Jackson, who took it to Hartville to the ice plant, where he left it in charge of persons in control of the plant and where it remained about two days. It appears from the testimony of the two men in control that it was undisturbed, though it is possible that other persons may have seen it while it was there. On July 6th, a day or two after the death, Mr. Jackson took the jar in his automobile and drove to Mountain Grove. The jar, packed in ice in a box and covered with an old sack was placed in the front of his car. He parked his car at Mountain Grove and spent an hour or two trying a case before a justice of the peace there. He drove from there to Norwood, another station on the railroad, and remained over night with a friend, leaving the jar in that condition in the car all night. Early next morning he took the jar containing the stomach to Springfield and delivered it to Dr. Atherton. There were no suspicious circumstances indicating that the jar had been tampered with.

[5] In order to admit testimony showing the result of the analysis it was necessary to satisfy the court of the identity of the stomach examined with that of Hutsell and that it was in the same condition when examined as when removed from his body. It was not necessary that it should have been hermetically sealed so as to be inaccessible to anybody; it was not necessary to show that there was an entire absence of opportunity for anybody to tamper with it; it was only necessary to show the circumstances were such as to establish a reasonable assurance that it was the same and in the same condition.

The case of State v. Van Tassel, 103 Iowa, 6, 72 N. W. 497, is where the organs of a deceased were shipped by express from Nashua, Iowa, to Chicago, for analysis. The testimony of the chemist who made the analysis was held admissible in evidence.

In People v. Bowers (Cal.) 18 Pac. 660, jars which contained the stomach and contents of the intestines to be examined were covered like preserve jars and wrapped in paper, but were not sealed at any time, and afterwards were locked for two days in the laboratory of Cooper Medical College, to which the physician and janitor had access; it was held that the evidence as to the result of chemical analysis was admissible. The court noted there were no circumstances tending to show that the jars had been tampered with.

Where internal organs were removed by the undertaker and placed in a galvanized iron vessel covered over with a piece of cloth, and passed through three or four different hands before reaching the chemist who made the examination at the expiration of two or three days, the evidence of the chemist was admissible. State v. Daly, 210 Mo. loc. cit. 675, 677, 109 S. W. 58.

In the case of State v. Thompson, 182 Mo. loc. cit. 321, 34 S. W. 31, where a considerable interval of time passed between the sealing of the organs in a jar and the examination afterwards by a chemist, the court notes the absence of evidence to create a suspicion that the organs were other than those preserved, and evidence showing the result of the examination was held admissible.

[8] The viscera of the deceased in this case were not preserved with that care which should characterize the conduct of an officer in such a case, and the glass jar containing the stomach was carted around in a careless sort of way; but there was no time when anything occurred to suggest a suspicion that the stomach was molested or that any one who might be interested in tampering with it knew that the prosecuting attorney had the jar in his possession when he drove to Mountain Grove and to Norwood. We think the court did not err in admitting the evidence.

IV. Defendant offered as witnesses 12 druggists to prove that each kept a record of all strychnine poisons dispensed by him, that he had examined his record as far back as January 1, 1917, and that no record showed a sale to the defendant, Randle Smith, of any quantity whatever of strychnine, and that the 12 druggists mentioned were all the druggists in Wright county and territory adjacent to the home of the defendant. This was excluded, and appellant assigns error to the ruling.

[7] Negative evidence is admissible only if it tends to contradict positive evidence introduced by the other party. 9 Cyc. of Ev. pp. 865-866. This is a very general statement of the rule, but the authorities, instead of expressing it in more definite terms, usually state simply the facts in each case to which it is applicable. If the negative statement would tend to exclude the existence of a fact sworn to by the other side, then it is admissible. For instance, in a case where negligence is asserted on a failure of the railroad company to give a signal of an approaching train, it is competent for witnesses to swear that they never heard any signal given, if they were in a position to have heard and were attentive to the circumstances which would cause them to hear. On the other hand, if the witnesses were inattentive, or in a position where the sound of the signal would not likely attract their attention, the fact that they did not hear it would possess no probative force. Bennett v. Met. St. Ry. Co., 122 Mo. App. 703, loc. cit. 709, 710, 90 S. W. 480; Shaw v. Railroad, 104 Mo. 648, 16 S. W. 832; Armstrong v. Railroad, 195 Mo. App. loc. cit. 86, 190 S. W. 944; Butler v. Met. St. Ry. Co., 117 Mo. App. loc. cit. 358, 93 S. W. 877; Quinley v. Traction Co., 180 Mo. App. 296, 165 S. W. 346; Underwood v. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 190 Mo. App. loc. cit. 412, 177 S. W. 724.

The case of Norris v. Railroad, 239 Mo. 695, loc. cit. 712, 713, 144 S. W. 783, is cited. It was an action for injuries caused to plaintiff by derailment of defendant's train on which she was a passenger. It was held competent for the defendant to prove that no other passengers were injured by the shock. This evidence, while negative, tended directly to show the shock caused by the derailment was not so severe as claimed by the plaintiff.

[8] In the present case, the evidence offered that no druggist immediately accessible to the defendant sold him any strychnine since 1917 would not tend to show that he did not have strychnine in his possession just immediately prior to the alleged homicide. If it had been further shown that the defendant could not have procured it in any other manner, the evidence would have been competent; but he might have obtained it before the date mentioned, or he might have procured it from a druggist through the instrumentality of another; he might have procured it by mail, so far as the evidence shows. The evidence would possess no probative force unless it tended to exclude opportunity on the part of the defendant to procure the poison.

[9] It is true that in case of murder by poison it is important, if not necessary, to trace poison into the possession of the accused. State v. Hyde, 234 Mo. loc. cit. 241, 136 S. W. 316, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 191. It is asserted by appellant that there was no evidence that Smith had strychnine in his possession prior to the alleged homicide. In this appellant is incorrect. He had the poisoned whisky and delivered it to Rayborn, with the fatal result to Hutsell. The trial court properly excluded the evidence.

[10] V. Hutsell's suit for damages on account of an alleged assault and battery was pending at the time of the trial of this case. The state offered the petition in the damage suit and it was admitted in evidence. This, appellant claims, was error. The fact that a suit of that character was pending went to the jury without objection. But the petition alleged certain facts showing a cruel and violent assault and battery inflicted upon Hutsell by defendant. That statement of facts was hearsay and inadmissible. Defendant in examining witnesses throughout the trial brought out some of the facts relating to the assault. It is unnecessary to go through the record and determine with care whether the petition does state facts not otherwise proven, without objection, but on another trial the court should exclude it.

[11, 12] VI. On March 24th, prior to the alleged homicide, the defendant received an anonymous letter warning him of danger which threatened him—danger of a mob and poison in his water—the writer claiming to be a friend of Smith. The letter was destroyed, but Smith showed it to two other persons who read it, one of whom was the postmaster at Astoria, Mo. Defendant offered the two witnesses to prove the contents of the letter, and offered to show by the postmaster that the paper on which the letter was written was from certain tablets of the same "nature and description" as the paper in the tablets which the postmaster had sold to the brother of the deceased. Defendant also offered to prove the contents of another threatening note which he received. The evidence was excluded, and error is assigned to the ruling. It is claimed by the appellant that there was a conspiracy to do him harm, and the evidence should have gone to the jury as tending to show some one else had discovered his whisky hidden in his barn and poisoned it, and thus prove that he did not intentionally give poisoned whisky to Rayborn. If it had been shown by competent evidence that the defendant had some definite enemy who made threats against him and there was a possibility that such enemy had discovered the whisky in his barn and poisoned it, such evidence probably would have been admissible. The statements in the letters from an anonymous friend that the defendant was threatened with poison were pure hearsay and incompetent. If defendant had received a threatening letter which would have been traced to the deceased it would have been admissible, but the vague warning by an unknown person of an uncertain danger from an uncertain source was too remote to possess any probative force. The evidence was properly excluded.

VII. The court gave several instructions covering all features of the case. To several of these the defendant objected and submitted complete instructions of his own which the court refused. Error is assigned to the refusal. Instructions given by the court were expressed in the briefest and most colorless terms, so that they were not as explicit as they might have been. It was brevity at the expense of clearness. While the instructions possibly complied with the law, they might very properly have been a little more favorable to the defendant. For instance, the instruction on reasonable doubt did not require the reasonable doubt which would justify an acquittal to arise from a consideration of all the evidence in the case. State v. Christian, 253 Mo. 397, 161 S. W. 736. The instructions nowhere, except in the one relating to the presumption of innocence, direct a verdict of not guilty in case of the failure to find the facts constituting the guilt of the defendant. In the instruction relating to circumstantial evidence it would have been entirely proper for the court to have added that on a failure to find the circumstances of the character mentioned the jury should find the defendant not guilty. The instructions nowhere place the burden of proof upon the state in direct terms; it only appears inferentially in two or three of the instructions. The instructions asked by the defendant and refused were fuller and more explicit in those respects, and some of them might very properly have been given by the court, in fairness to the defendant.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

RAILEY and MOZLEY, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion by WHITE, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

All the Judges concur; WALKER, J., in result.

STATE V. COSTELLO. (No. 21934.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §1064(7)—Where not preserved by motion for new trial, rulings on instructions cannot be reviewed.

Where the motion for new trial failed to assign error to the giving or refusing of instructions, assignments of error, complaining of instructions, cannot be reviewed.

2. Criminal law §1064(6)—Error in cross-examination cannot be reviewed, where not presented by motion for new trial.

Alleged error in permitting the prosecuting attorney to cross-examine defendant as to matters not testified to in chief cannot be reviewed, where the motion for new trial did not mention the cross-examination or improper conduct of prosecutor.

3. Criminal law §1043(2)—Objections insufficient to raise question of unfair cross-examination.

An objection to the introduction of evidence in order to warrant a review must be pertinent and specific, so as to enable court to intelligently rule, consequently a mere statement or objection to the cross-examination, coupled with the further objection that the matter was immaterial, is not sufficiently specific to cover the conduct of the prosecuting attorney in conducting an unfair cross-examination.

4. Criminal law §720(5)—Statement of prosecuting attorney arguing an objection not improper.

Statement by the prosecutor in arguing an objection that the witness stated he had not seen one B. recently, and that it was desired to show the witness had seen him recently, is not objectionable; the prosecutor being entitled to so test the credibility of the witness.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; G. A. Wurdeman, Judge.

Tony Costello was convicted of robbery in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Rowe, Jr., of St. Louis, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and Lewis Hord Cook, Sp. Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WHITE, C. The appeal is from a conviction of robbery in the first degree. The information charges that the appellant, Tony Costello, and Edward Ridgely, on or about the 18th day of April, 1919, in St. Louis county, made an assault upon one David Koeler, and by putting him in fear, and by force and violence to his person, took from him and in his presence the sum of $50.80, lawful money of the United States.

Koeler was secretary of St. Peter's Cemetery located in Wellston, St. Louis county. He kept the records and handled the money of the cemetery company. In the afternoon of April 18, 1919, while he was in his office waiting on some customers, Costello and Ridgely came into the office and waited around among the customers. They walked out of the office and sat down on a bench outside the door. After the last customer had gone they came in, and Costello asked Koeler if he might use the telephone. A counter in the office was surmounted by a wire screen, and behind this counter was Koeler's desk and telephone. Costello came behind the screen for the purpose of using the telephone. Koeler soon noticed that his visitors were making no attempt to use the telephone, he looked up, and saw a pistol pointed at him through the screen by Ridgely. He immediately yelled for help. Costello began to beat him over the head with his fists, and Ridgely came around and hammered him with a revolver. The robbers then opened the money drawer and took $50.80, and ran down the road towards a machine, got into it and drove away. The witness was badly beaten up. Other witnesses corroborated Koeler in the facts to which he testified regarding the appearance and the running away of the men, and identified Costello and Ridgely as two men that were about the office before the assault. One witness identified the defendant as one of the two running away after the assault.

The defense was an alibi. Costello swore he was at Lang's saloon on Franklin avenue, the day of the robbery, from 11:30 a. m. until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, when he was arrested there. He was playing horseshoes in Lang's back yard with Ridgely and one Baumer. He is corroborated in this particular by the evidence of Lang and other witnesses.

[1] I. The appellant claims there was error in the giving by the court of several instructions. The motion for new trial does not assign any error to the giving or refusing of instructions, and does not mention instructions in any manner. Therefore we are precluded from reviewing that assignment.

In justice to the attorney for appellant it should be said that he was not defendant's attorney in the circuit court, "and consequently is not responsible for the manner and form in which exceptions to the rulings of the trial court were saved."

[2] II. It is complained that the court committed error in permitting the prosecuting attorney, over defendant's objection, to cross-examine the defendant as to matters not testified to in chief by the defendant. Several pages of the defendant's cross-examination are set out, to which this objection is applied. We are precluded from reviewing this testimony and the error assigned, because no mention is made of that objection in the motion for new trial. The motion nowhere mentions the cross-examination of the defendant or the alleged improper or unfair conduct of the prosecuting attorney in cross-examining him.

[3] III. Objection is properly assigned in the motion for new trial to the cross-examination of the witnesses by the defendant. On these cross-examinations the state's attorney endeavored to show that one Baumer, with whom the defendant was playing horseshoes in Lang's back yard, had been convicted of some crime and was in jail. The objection of defendant's counsel at the time appears in the record in this fashion: "I object to this line of examination." At other times the objections were thus: "I object to that as immaterial." "Objected to as immaterial." The objections were overruled, exceptions saved, and the trial proceeded. No objection in any more definite or specific form was made to any questions asked on cross-examination. An objection to the introduction of evidence, in order to warrant a review, must be pertinent and specific, in order to enable the court intelligerly to rule upon the same. State v. Hamilton, 263 Mo. 298, 172 S. W. 593; State v. Miller, 264 Mo. 441, loc. cit. 449, 175 S. W. 191. The objection that the testimony was immaterial, even if that was sufficiently specific, would not cover the improper conduct of the prosecuting attorney in conducting an unfair cross-examination.

[4] IV. On one point defendant's counsel was specific. The state's attorney in arguing an objection of defendant's made this remark regarding Baumer:

"This man says he has not seen Baumer for a long time and I want to show that he has seen him recently."

This was objected to, and the objection overruled. Witness then answered that he (witness) had not been down there. Defendant's attorney:

"I ask that the jury be instructed to disregard the statement of the prosecuting attorney in reference to Baumer."

This objection was overruled, and exception duly saved. The statement of the prosecuting attorney in relation to Baumer was entirely proper. He had a right to cross-examine the witness and test his credibility by showing that he had misstated a fact about having seen Baumer. The statement was not in the least objectionable.

There being no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

KIRKLAND v. BIXBY et al. (No. 21212.)
(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §758(3)—Rule as to sufficiency of assignment of error in brief stated.

Appellant's brief, though it contains no formal collective assignment of error in any given part thereof, is sufficient where appellant separately assigns error specifically in distinct sub-heads of his points and authorities; such a brief being a substantial compliance with the statutes and with court rule No. 15 (198 S. W. vi).

2. Appeal and error §758(3)—Use of word "erred" not necessary in making assignment of error in brief.

It is unnecessary, in making assignments of error in brief, to say that the court "erred" in doing so and so; it being sufficient if it is made plain by the language used, considering record before appellate court, that error is charged.

3. Master and servant §137(4)—Section men not entitled to warnings.

Section men are not entitled to warnings of approaching trains, either by bell or whistle, except when required by the humanitarian rule.

4. Master and servant §264(5) — Pleading held not to authorize proof of custom.

In an action for the death of a section man riding on a hand car struck by train, under a petition alleging that the trainmen negligently failed to ring the bell and sound the whistle in the fog, held, that proof of the existence of a custom requiring trainmen to give warnings during foggy weather was incompetent.

5. Negligence §110 — Pleading violation of duty essential.

A petition for negligence should charge a duty and its violation to show liability.

6. Customs and usages §18—Custom of long standing to give rise to a duty should be pleaded.

If the violation of a duty arises from the failure to observe a custom of long standing, the custom should be pleaded, so as to clearly point out the duty.

7. Master and servant §258(18)—Mode of pleading custom defined.

A petition for negligence in failing to observe a railroad's custom to warn section men of trains during foggy weather should not only plead such custom, but should allege the plaintiff's knowledge thereof.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Clarence A. Burney, Judge.

Action by E. E. Kirkland, administrator, etc., against William K. Bixby and Edward B. Pryor, receivers of the Wabash Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

N. S. Brown, of St. Louis, and Sebree & Sebree and Mord M. Bogle, all of Kansas City, for appellants.

Atwood, Wickersham, Hill & Popham, of Kansas City, for respondent.

GRAVES, J. Action for damages for the alleged negligent killing of Albert Anderson in January, 1914. Defendants were the receivers of the Wabash Railroad Company, and deceased was section foreman on the line of said road at or near Randolph, Mo., near Kansas City, Mo. Anderson was killed in a collision between the hand car upon which he was going to his work and one of defendants' trains. The negligence charged in the petition, upon which trial was had, is as follows:

"Plaintiff alleges that the defendants were negligent and careless in advising said Albert Anderson that he could proceed safely to his destination, when they knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care on their part might have known, that he could not safely so do, and in not maintaining the track, over which said hand car was about to move, in a safe condition and free from trains or cars whose movement might injure persons situated as decedent was; that defendants, by their employes in charge of said train so colliding with the hand car, were further negligent and careless in failing to ring the bell and sound the whistle at such frequent intervals, while running through the fog, as would warn the crew on said hand car of the approach of said train in time to allow the employes on said hand car to safely remove themselves and said hand car from defendants' track; that as a direct result of each and all of said negligent and careless acts of the defendants, as aforesaid, the said Albert Anderson, deceased, was killed."

Answer is (1) a general denial; (2) contributory negligence; and (3) assumption of risk. Reply was a general denial. Upon a trial before a jury in division No. 6 of the Jackson county circuit court, plaintiff had a verdict and judgment for $10,000 and defendants have appealed.

The action was one under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), as said Anderson was foreman of a section crew, and his section covered track both west and east of Randolph. At about 7:30 on the morning of the accident he started west from Randolph with his crew on a hand car, to repair some tracks near what is known as the Milwaukee bridge, within his section. The morning was quite foggy, as they frequently were near the Missouri river. When about a mile and a half west of Randolph, the hand car was struck by an east-bound freight train, and Anderson was killed. Further details will be left to points discussed in the course of the opinion.

[1] There is a motion to dismiss the appeal for failure to comply with rule 15 of this court (198 S. W. vi), in that—

"There are no separate assignments of error as provided by the rules; and under the so-called points and authorities no specific errors are alleged such as to comply with the rules of the court."

Among other cases we are cited to Vahldick v. Vahldick, 264 Mo. loc. cit. 531, 175 S. W. 199. As applied to the facts in this case the ruling in that case does not support respondent. At page 532 of that opinion in 264 Mo. (175 S. W. 200), Faris, J., refers to the universal ruling of this court, in this language:

"It has been held that where appellant, though making no formal collective assignment of errors in any given part of his brief, yet separately assigns error specifically in distinct subheads of his points and authorities, we will accept this as a substantial compliance with the statute and our rules. Perry v. Strawbridge, 109 Mo. 621; Mugan v. Wheeler, 241 Mo. 376; Collier v. Lead Co., 208 Mo. 246."

This announces the true rule of this court, and the cases cited by our former Brother bear him out in the pronouncement. In the particular case he held that this rule had not been met. So, too, as to other cases cited.

[2] But in the instant case the points and authorities bristle with alleged error. There is no formal assignment of errors, but when the points made clearly point out the errors nisi (as here) we have always ruled it to be sufficient. Nor is it necessary to say in the point made that the trial court "erred" in doing so and so, if it is made plain by the language used, considering the record before us, that error is charged. There is no substance in the motion to dismiss the appeal in this case, and it is overruled.

[3] II. The plaintiff's case was submitted to the jury on the sole ground that the agents in charge of the east-bound freight train were negligent in failing to sound the bell and blow the whistle at frequent intervals, upon this foggy morning. This simplifies the issues for present determination. The rule in this state requires section men to protect themselves from passing trains. In other words, the train crew, so far as section men are concerned, have the right to expect a clear track, and the humanitarian rule (when violated) is the only salvation for the unfortunate section man. This rule is not invoked in the instant case. We have written so much upon the status of the section man that we shall not attempt to reiterate, but rest content with the citation of our more recent cases. State ex rel. Lusk v. Ellison, 271 Mo. loc. cit. 463, 196 S. W. 1088; Gabal v. Railroad Co., 251 Mo. loc. cit. 268, 269, 158 S. W. 12; Woods v. Railroad, 187 S. W. 12, 13; Rashall v. Railroad, 249 Mo. loc. cit. 519, 520, 155 S. W. 426; Van Dyke v. Railroad, 230 Mo. loc. cit. 282, 130 S. W. 1; Degonia v. Railroad, 224 Mo. loc. cit. 587, 123 S. W. 807 et seq.

In the instant case the deceased, Anderson, was the section foreman. He was directing the hand car, and he was perfectly familiar with the situation. George Rigley, witness for plaintiff, among other things said:

"Q. At that time of the morning there were a good many trains passing over that particular piece of track, weren't they? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Those trains were liable to come along at any time? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. There are a number of trains due on regular schedule time—I mean by regular schedule time trains appearing on the time-card—and a good many other trains over that part of the track had no regular time? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You and Anderson, of course, knew that fact? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And the Wabash have large storage yards at Randolph, just east of the depot, where they haul in their freight and leave it until such time as is necessary to deliver it over in the city? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In other words, they break up and make up their trains over there; that is one of the principal freight yards? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And many trains in addition to the regular trains pass over that track, switch trains carrying cars? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You and Anderson knew that fact? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you people always keep out of the way of those trains, don't you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You were expected to do that? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Nobody expected to look out and take care of you? A. No.

"Q. You understood it was your duty, he understood it was his duty, to keep out of the way of those trains? A. Yes, sir."

So that it is clear that there is no liability in this case, unless the "foggy" condition of the weather changed the situation. As to section men, under ordinary circumstances, the train crew had the right to expect a clear track, and were not required to give warnings, either by bell or whistle, for the benefit of the section men. By this we do not mean that the humanitarian rule, if pleaded, would not require the trainmen to give warnings, if they saw section men wholly oblivious to impending danger. This subject, however, is not in this case.

III. There was evidence tending to show that there was a custom of long standing as to the sounding of the bell and the blowing of the whistle at frequent intervals when the weather was foggy along the river, for the purpose of advising section men of the approaching trains. Whilst there is conflict in the evidence, there was sufficient to make such matter a question for the jury to determine; i. e., was there or was there not such a custom? This evidence of this custom was consistently opposed by the appellants, and it was admitted over the vigorous objections of appellants. They claimed that no such custom was pleaded, and herein is the serious question.

A full reading of the petition and the evidence shows that plaintiff failed in the case, save and except a proven custom existed to give warning during foggy weather. The question then is: Was this custom pleaded, and the evidence thereof competent? The general rule is that warnings to section men are not required. We have quoted all that is said about the fog in the petition. There is no allegation as to a custom to give warning during foggy weather. The only thing found in the petition is:

"That defendants, by their employes in charge of said train so colliding with the hand car, were further negligent and careless in failing to ring the bell and sound the whistle at such frequent intervals, while running through the fog, as would warn the crew on said hand car of the approach of said train in time to allow the employes on said hand car to safely remove themselves and said hand car from defendants' track."

[4-7] This only says that they negligently failed to ring the bell and sound the whistle in the fog, but nowhere in the petition is it averred that there was a duty resting upon the defendants to do this by and through a long-established custom. The petition should charge a duty and its violation in order to show liability. If the violation of a duty arises from the failure to observe a custom of long standing, the custom should be pleaded, so as to clearly point out the duty. In other words, if the duty arises from a custom, or usage, the custom or usage should be pleaded, and, if not pleaded, no evidence of a custom is admissible. This petition should not only have pleaded this local custom or usage, but should have averred that deceased had knowledge of it. 12 Cyc. 1097 et seq.

As to section men the general rule of law is that they must look out for their own safety, and no warnings are required to be given them. If this general rule of law is to be changed by a local or particular usage or custom, this custom or usage must be pleaded. In Hayden v. Grillo's Adm'r, 42 Mo. App. loc. cit. 5, Thompson, J., said:

"It is necessary to plead a special custom, where such a custom is relied upon, to take a case out of the general rules of the law."

And this court, in Staroske v. Publishing Co., 235 Mo. loc. cit. 76, 138 S. W. 38, has announced the same rule, thus:

"Nor do the allegations of the petition meet the requirements of the rule, supported by reason and the great weight of authority, that if a particular or local custom is relied upon, it must be pleaded (Sherwood v. Savings Bank, 131 Iowa, 1 c. 530 et seq.; Oriental L. Co. v. Blades L. Co., 103 Va. 1 c. 741; Mobile Fruit & Trading Co. v. Judy, 91 Ill. App. 1 c. 91; Con. Coal Co. v. Jones, 120 Ill. App. 1 c. 146; Hayden v. Grillo's Adm'r, 42 Mo. App. 1 c. 5, 6), and pleaded so explicitly that it will appear not only that such local or particular custom existed, but that both parties had knowledge of it at the time the contract was made and, in addition, contracted with reference to it (Hendricks v. Middlebrooks Co., 118 Ga. 1 c. 137; Antomarchi's Ex'r v. Russell, 63 Ala. 1 c. 361; Wallace v. Morgan, 23 Ind. 1 c. 402 et seq.; Overman v. Bank, 30 N. J. L. 1 c. 65)."

To like effect is Nivert v. Railroad, 232 Mo. loc. cit. 641, 135 S. W. 37, whereat it is said:

"In the absence of some rule, custom, or usage of the company applicable to the appellant, requiring it to be on the lookout for appellant and to warn him of his danger, the respondent owed him no such duty as charged in the petition; and as no such rule, custom, or usage is pleaded, we must presume that none such existed. It is the well-settled law of this state, as shown by repeated adjudications of this court, that the agents and servants in charge of railway trains owe no duty to look out for the safety of trackmen and section hands. They are presumed to be familiar with the character of their employment, the schedules and time-cards of trains, when due, and the dangers incident to such employment."

The reason of the thing is with the practice that the local usage should be pleaded, if such local usage is relied upon to take the case out of the usual rules of law. In the instant case the local usage or custom was relied upon to take plaintiff's case out of the general rule of law. That local usage or custom was to the effect that in foggy weather along the Missouri river bottoms, on this road, the trainmen gave section men warning by ringing the bell and sounding the whistle at frequent intervals. This local usage or custom, if pleaded and proven, would take the case out of the general rule. Fairness demands that such usage and custom be pleaded. It is not pleaded in this case, and all that evidence tending to show such usage and custom should not have been admitted under the present petition. For this error the judgment will have to be reversed, but, in view of the evidence which was erroneously admitted, we think the case should be remanded. It may be (a matter not now ruled) that further proper steps can be taken to meet the situation.

Other matters complained of may not appear in a new trial, and need not be discussed. Suffice it to say that, if there was such a usage and custom as to warnings, and a jury so found upon satisfactory evidence, plaintiff could make a case by pleading and proving such usage and custom. It is only in this way, so far as the present record shows, that negligence of defendants can be shown.

Let the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

All concur, except WOODSON, J., absent.

STATE v. GALLAGHER. (No. 21926.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Homicide \S 340(4)—Errors in instructions on murder in first degree immaterial where verdict was in second degree.

Errors in instructions as to murder in the first degree are immaterial, where defendant has been found guilty of murder in the second degree.

2. Criminal law \S 829(1)—Instructions covered are properly refused.

It is not error in a criminal case to refuse instructions covered by instructions already given.

3. Witnesses \S 61(1), 278 — Statute as to cross-examination of spouse held not to apply to testimony of a codefendant found guilty in separate trial.

Where decedent's wife and another were charged with the murder of decedent, and the wife was awarded a severance and separate trial, and upon the trial of her codefendant testified without objection to her own conviction, without showing that any appeal had been taken by her, she was a competent witness for all purposes, without reference to Rev. St. 1909, \S 5242, relating to competency of husband and wife for each other, and it was proper to cross-examine her as to matters not referred to on direct examination.

4. Criminal law \S 1170½(2)—Question as to relationship between codefendants, if error, held harmless.

In a prosecution for homicide, where defendant's former wife was asked whether defendant was a relative of his codefendant and she answered that she could not say, the error, if any, was harmless.

5. Criminal law \S 722(3)—Argument of prosecuting attorney as to defendant's conduct held supported by evidence.

In a prosecution for homicide, a remark by the prosecuting attorney that defendant had destroyed the domestic relations of decedent's family, alienated the affections of the wife and daughter of deceased, and had ultimately disposed of deceased in order that he might live with his wife, held supported by evidence that the wife had said that she and defendant intended to go on a farm and live together after she procured a divorce.

6. Criminal law \S 719(3)—Prosecuting attorney may state opinion as to evidence.

While a prosecutor should not be permitted to travel outside the record and poison the minds of the jurors in respect to matters not before them, yet he has the legal right to express his own opinion as to what the evidence tends to show as long as he keeps within the record.

7. Criminal law \S 1159(2)—Verdict will not be reversed because against the greater weight of the evidence.

A verdict of guilty in a homicide case will not be reversed because it is against the greater weight of the evidence; it being the special province of the jury to pass upon the weight of the evidence.

8. Homicide \S 354—Ten years' imprisonment held not excessive.

Imprisonment in the penitentiary for ten years held not excessive, where defendant had conspired with deceased's wife to murder deceased, so that he could live with her.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; John W. Calhoun, Judge.

William Gallagher was convicted of second degree murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

On April 10, 1917, the circuit attorney of St. Louis, Mo., filed in the circuit court of said city, an information charging defendant William Gallagher and Mrs. Rose Parker, jointly, with murder in the first degree for the killing of one William Parker, husband of Rose Parker aforesaid, in said city, on March 10, 1917. On April 19, 1917, each of the above-named defendants were arraigned, and each entered a plea of not guilty. On October 22, 1917, a severance and separate trial was granted defendant Rose Parker. Thereupon the state elected to try her first. On January 15, 1918, a change of venue was granted defendant William Gallagher, and said cause sent to Division 12 of said court. The trial of defendant Gallagher was commenced in the circuit court aforesaid on February 27, 1918. On February 28, 1918, the trial of defendant Gallagher was completed, and on said date the jury returned into court their verdict, as follows:

"We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree and assess the punishment at imprisonment in the penitentiary for ten years.

"John D. Fidler, Foreman."

On March 5, 1918, defendant filed his motion for a new trial, which was continued from time to time until January 27, 1919, when the same was overruled. On January 30, 1919, defendant filed his motion in arrest of judgment. On the following day said motion in arrest of judgment was overruled, and defendant duly sentenced as required by law. The facts in the case are substantially as follows:

The deceased, William Parker, had resided as 1422 Sulphur avenue, in the city of St. Louis, for about 4 years prior to his death. He was a large man, about 6 feet and 4 inches tall, weighing about 240 pounds, and was employed by parties engaged in the furniture moving business. He was paid about $15 or $20 per week for his services, was a steady worker, and bore a good reputation. His family, consisting of his wife and two small daughters about 11 and 13 years of age, lived with him in the little 3-room house at 1422 Sulphur avenue, aforesaid. Up to within a few months of his death he permitted said family to purchase necessary supplies at stores near by, having charge accounts at said stores, and promptly paid such bills at the end of each week.

The house in which they lived was owned by the defendant, Gallagher. They paid him $9 per month rent for the same. Gallagher was a man about 50 years of age, and had been divorced by his wife shortly after the Parkers moved into his property at 1422 Sulphur avenue. For about 3 years prior to the shooting of Mr. Parker said Gallagher had boarded at the Parker home, which was but a block or two from his own house. During those 3 years Gallagher and Mrs. Parker were frequently seen out together on the streets of evenings and in the parks in the afternoon, and there was considerable gossip among their neighbors concerning their intimacy.

In the latter part of December, 1916, several neighbors saw Mr. Parker come home one evening and chase Gallagher out of the house into the street, where he beat said Gallagher and drove him away. Neoma Parker, the oldest daughter, on this occasion carried Gallagher's hat and coat down the street to him after this affray. The defendant tries to explain this by stating that there was no trouble between him and Parker on that occasion; that Parker was drunk, was threatening the family and wanting more liquor, and he was merely keeping Parker from hurting some of the family and from obtaining more liquor. The daughter Neoma attempts to corroborate his story, but her testimony is worthy of but little credence.

About the 5th day of February 1917, Mrs. Parker, accompanied by Gallagher, went to the office of Assistant City Counselor Sadler and filed a complaint against Parker, charging that he frequently came home drunk and beat and abused her and the children and threatened to kill her. Gallagher displayed so much interest in the matter that Mr. Sadler inquired as to the ground for his concern, and was told that Gallagher was a cousin of Mrs. Parker. None of the neighbors had ever heard them mention this relationship before. Neoma Parker testified that Mr. Gallagher's mother and her grandmother were first cousins. Neoma also stated that her father beat and mistreated her. However, it developed that he probably punished her for taking her little sister out with her and having intercourse with some boys. She admits the illicit act, but states they were lured away by another girl.

Sadler notified Parker that he had better stay away from his home for a while, and issued a summons for him to appear and answer the charge filed against him. Parker called at Sadler's office and explained the situation to the latter, and then Sadler notified Gallagher and Mrs. Parker "to stay away from each other." They then called at his office and dismissed their complaint against Parker, and Sadler again told Gallagher to stay away from Mrs. Parker.

On the 17th of February, 1917, Mrs. Parker filed suit for divorce. On the 5th of March, Gallagher had a cot placed in the front room of the Parker home, and slept there until the night of March 10th, when Mr. Parker was killed. About 9 o'clock p. m. of the last-mentioned date, Mr. Parker came to the back door of his home and asked admittance. He entered and an altercation took place, during which a window was broken out and two pistol shots were fired. One of these shots entered Parker's back, pierced the lungs and heart, and lodged in the muscles of his chest.

The pistol with which the shooting was done was later found hidden in the yard back of the Parker home. The state offered evidence tending to show that the pistol was the property of the defendant; that defendant had been intimate with the wife of the deceased; that there had been some trouble between them; and that defendant wanted to get Parker out of the way so that he could live with Mrs. Parker. The testimony offered for defendant tended to contradict this, and show that there was no trouble between Parker and Gallagher; that the latter was a man of good reputation; that on the night of March 10, 1917, Parker came into the house and attacked his wife, and she got hold of the pistol and shot him in self-defense.

The instructions given and refused, the rulings of the court in regard to the admission and rejection of evidence, and the complaints of defendant's counsel as to the alleged improper remarks of the prosecuting attorney in the presence of the jury will be considered in the opinion as far as may be deemed necessary.

Defendant in due time appealed the cause to this court.

Charles P. Johnson, I. A. Rollins, and Jos. G. Williams, all of St. Louis, for appellant. Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and C. P. Le Mire, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). I. Defendant in his brief assigns 14 errors alleged to have been committed by the trial court to his prejudice, which we will consider as far as necessary in the order presented:

[1] 1. "The court erred in giving the instruction on murder in the first degree." No reason is given for challenging the validity of said instruction. It is not even set out in appellant's brief. It is numbered 2, and clearly defines murder in the first degree. As the jury found defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, it is unnecessary to consider said instruction further. State v. Baugh, 217 S. W. loc. cit. 280, and cases cited.

2. "The court erred in giving instruction on murder in the second degree." No mention is made in appellant's brief in respect to said instruction, aside from the foregoing assignment of error. The instruction complained of is numbered 4, and properly declares the law as to murder in the second degree. State v. Bauerle, 145 Mo. 18, 46 S. W. 609; State v. Moxley, 115 Mo. 644, 22 S. W. 575.

[2] 3. "The court erred in refusing to give the instructions offered by the defendant." The instructions thus refused are designated in the record as A, B, C, D, and E. The propositions involved therein are fully covered by instructions 5, 7, and 13, given by the court. This was a sufficient ground for refusing same. State v. Driscoll, 235 Mo. loc. cit. 385, 188 S. W. 527; State v. Stackhouse, 242 Mo. loc. cit. 448, 449, 146 S. W. 1151. Appellant has made no effort, in his brief, to defend said refused instructions. Upon a careful consideration of same, we do not think they fully and correctly stated the law in respect to the matters attempted to be covered thereby. In our opinion, this assignment is without merit and overruled.

4. "The instruction given by the court did not properly declare the law." Appellant does not point out in his brief the instruction complained of under this head, nor have we any idea as to which one he is attempting to challenge. The above assignment is too vague and indefinite to require at our hands any extended consideration of same. State v. McBrien, 265 Mo. loc. cit. 594, 595, 178 S. W. 489; State v. Rowe and Sanders, 271 Mo. 88, 196 S. W. 7; State v. Selleck, 190 S. W. loc. cit. 180; State v. Mann, 217 S. W. loc. cit. 69. We have carefully read the instructions given by the court and find no reversible error in the giving of same.

5. "The court erred in admitting illegal, incompetent, and prejudicial testimony offered by the state." In view of the voluminous record brought to this court, appellant's counsel ought at least to have advised us as to some improper ruling on this subject. We have, however, examined the record and do not find this contention sustained thereby.

[3] 6. "The court erred in permitting Mr. Reeder to cross-examine the witness Mrs. Parker, the codefendant, as to matters that were not referred to or brought out upon the direct examination." Mrs. Parker had been tried and found guilty of manslaughter in the fourth degree. She was put upon the stand by defendant Gallagher, and her examination in chief covered a wide range. She described her domestic relations with deceased, referred to the divorce case which she had brought, and undertook to cover in substance that which occurred when her husband was killed. She was cross-examined along practically the same lines. She testified, without objection, that she was convicted for the killing of her husband. She was then permitted to testify, over defendant's objections, that she had taken no appeal. She was also asked as to the conversation which she and Gallagher had with the prosecuting attorney and, over defendant's objection, was permitted to give her version of what occurred. Mrs. Parker having been granted a severance and separate trial, and having been convicted of killing her husband, we can see no good reason for confining the prosecuting attorney, in his cross-examination of this witness, strictly to those matters referred to by her in chief. The state was attempting to show that defendant Gallagher and Mrs. Parker had previously entered into a conspiracy to take the life of Mr. Parker and live together thereafter as husband and wife. Under the circumstances of this case, we do not think the legal rights of defendant have been violated by the admission of the cross-examination of Mrs. Parker. We are of the opinion that the cross-examination of Mrs. Parker did not violate the provisions of section 5242, R. S. 1909. Having been awarded a severance and separate trial, and having testified, without objection, to her own conviction for the death of her husband, without showing that any appeal had been taken by her, she was a competent witness for all purposes, without any reference to above section of our statute. State v. Hunt, 91 Mo. 491, 13 S. W. 868.

7. "The assistant circuit attorney was guilty of misconduct in asking various questions which were incompetent, and of a character to inflame the minds of the jury and cause them to be prejudiced, and so prejudiced as not to offer the defendant a fair trial." Appellant's counsel, after having made the above charge, should have at least pointed out to this court the names of the witnesses referred to, and have stated what occurred. Upon carefully reading the record, we are unable to find where injustice has been done defendant in respect to any of the above matters complained of in said assignment.

8. Assignments 8 and 9 are as follows:

"(8) The court erred in permitting Mrs. Gallagher, the former wife of the appellant, to testify.

"(9) The assistant circuit attorney was guilty of misconduct that was prejudicial in parading Mrs. Gallagher, the former wife, before the jury, and in placing her upon the witness stand."

[4] Rose Gallagher testified in rebuttal, in substance, that she was formerly the wife of defendant, but was not his wife at time of trial; that she did not know whether he was a relative of Mrs. Parker. It is unnecessary to discuss the question as to whether Mrs. Gallagher was a competent witness for some purposes after having been divorced from her husband. The state sought to prove by her that defendant was not related to Mrs. Parker. Her answer was that she could not say. There is nothing in respect to this matter which would warrant us in reversing and remanding the cause.

9. Assignments 10 and 11 read as follows:

"(10) The court erred in permitting the circuit attorney to argue the case in the manner that he did.

"(11) The assistant circuit attorney was guilty of misconduct in arguing the case to the jury, and in making various remarks during the trial of the case in the presence of the jury, and in asking questions which were prejudicial to the defendant and forcing the defendant to object to the same."

[5, 6] In reading the record, we find that various objections were made by appellant's counsel to the opening and concluding arguments of Mr. Reeder before the jury. Some of these objections were sustained by the court and others overruled. Upon a careful examination of the record concerning the remarks objected to, we do not find that the trial court committed error in overruling said objections. The prosecutor was within the testimony in expressing his opinion that defendant, after appearing upon the scene, had destroyed the domestic relations of the Parker family, alienated the affections of the wife and daughter of deceased, and had ultimately disposed of deceased in order that he might live with his wife. James Rice testified that Mrs. Parker told him that she and defendant intended to go on a farm and live together after she got a divorce. While a prosecutor should not be permitted to travel outside the record and poison the minds of the jurors in respect to matters not before them, yet he has the legal right to express his own opinion as to what the evidence tends to show, as long as he keeps within the record. We are of the opinion that the trial court committed no error in overruling the foregoing objections.

[7] 10. "(12) The verdict of the jury is against the greater weight of the evidence." This would be no ground for reversing and remanding the cause, even if we agreed with appellant's counsel, as it was the special province of the jury to pass upon the weight of the evidence.

11. "(13) The verdict is the result of prejudice and passion on the part of the jury." We are unable to find in the record any evidence of either passion or prejudice upon the part of the jury.

[8] 12. "(14) The punishment assessed by the jury is excessive." We do not agree with counsel in respect to this matter. In our opinion, the facts presented in the record are amply sufficient to sustain the punishment inflicted by the jury.

We have carefully read the record and briefs of counsel, and have not only considered the foregoing assignments of error but, with painstaking care, have considered each of the 40 alleged errors assigned in the motion for a new trial. Taking the case as a whole, we think the defendant has had a fair and impartial trial, that no reversible error was committed against him during the progress of the trial, that there is abundant substantial evidence in the record sustaining his conviction, and that he is not entitled to a new trial.

The judgment below is accordingly affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of RAILEY, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

GAMMAGE v. LATHAM et al. (No. 20224.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)1. Cancellation of instruments ¶27—Right to cancellation of note and deed held not dependent on title in plaintiff absolutely or in trust.

Where plaintiff, without consideration and as a matter of accommodation had given a note and deed of trust securing it on land, she was entitled to have the note and deed of trust canceled, regardless of the question as to whether she was the absolute owner of the land, or held it in trust for the person for whose accommodation the note and trust deed were given.

2. Trusts ¶89(1)—Evidence of resulting trust must be clear.

To establish a resulting trust as to realty, the evidence must be clear, strong, unequivocal, definite, and so positive as to leave no room for doubt in the mind of the chancellor.

3. Trusts ¶89(3)—Evidence held not to show resulting trust.

Evidence held not to show a resulting trust in property bid in at foreclosure of trust deed.

4. Trusts ¶90—No resulting trust can be declared from fraudulent transaction designed to cut off equity of redemption.

If testator had title taken in plaintiff's name, by having her bid in the property at foreclosure sale, and had her give a bogus deed of trust on the property for his benefit, to cut off the right of redemption by the mortgagor, neither testator nor his legal representatives could maintain an action in equity to have a resulting trust declared in their favor against plaintiff.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; O. A. Lucas, Judge.

Action by Harriet B. K. Gammage (now Cousins) against W. T. Latham and another, as executors of D. C. Gammage, deceased, and R. J. Brown, trustee for the estate of D. C. Gammage, deceased. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

This action was commenced by plaintiff in the circuit court at Kansas City, Mo., on December 24, 1915. The petition alleges that on March 16, 1915, D. C. Gammage, a resident of Jackson county, Mo., departed this life testate, and by his last will, filed in the probate court of said county, at Kansas City, Mo., plaintiff and defendants, W. T. Latham and T. R. Gammage, were named as executors of said will, and in accordance therewith were, by said probate court, duly appointed to act as such; that since said time they have been, and still are, the duly qualified and acting executors of the will aforesaid; that at all the dates herein mentioned plaintiff was, and still is, the holder in fee simple of lots 3 and 4 in block C, David Walk place, an addition in and to Kansas City, Jackson county, Mo.; that on November 23, 1914, at the special instance and request of said D. C. Gammage, deceased, she executed and delivered to the latter a pretended promissory note for $4,000, purporting to bear interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and purporting to become due and payable on November 23, 1917; that in connection with and as part of said purported transaction, and contemporaneous with the execution of said note, she also executed and delivered to said D. C. Gammage, deceased, a pretended deed of trust, purporting to convey to said R. J. Brown the above-described real estate in trust, however, to secure to said D. C. Gammage, deceased, the payment of said pretended promissory note; that the pretended deed of trust aforesaid, on November 23, 1914, was duly filed for record in the recorder's office of Jackson county, Mo., at Kansas City, in Book B 1593, at page 224; that at the time of the execution of said pretended note and deed of trust plaintiff was not indebted to said D. C. Gammage, in any sum whatever, nor did she at any time prior to the making thereof, or at any other time, receive from said D. C. Gammage, or any one for him, the principal sum, or any part thereof, named in said note, etc.; that said pretended note and deed of trust were and are without consideration, and constitute a cloud upon the title of plaintiff to the real estate aforesaid, etc.

Plaintiff prayed for a decree canceling said note and deed of trust, and divesting said Brown of his record title to said real estate, and vesting the same in plaintiff, in fee simple. She also prayed for general relief.

Defendants, W. T. Latham and T. R. Gammage, for their joint answer to said petition, admit that since about the 16th of March, 1915, they have been, and still are, executors of the last will of said D. C. Gammage, deceased. They admit that said testator died about March 16, 1915. They admit that as such executors they hold and have in their possession the $4,000 note aforesaid, and admit that said note is secured by first lien on above-described real estate. They deny every other allegation of plaintiff's petition. They prayed to go hence without day and recover their costs.

On April 6, 1918, the case having proceeded to trial before Judge O. A. Lucas, the latter announced from the bench he thought the evidence clearly disclosed that said note and deed of trust were without consideration, but intimated to counsel for defendants that a cross-bill might be filed, asking that plaintiff be divested of the legal title to said real estate.

Defendants, W. T. Latham and Dr. T. R. Gammage, pursuant to leave of court, filed herein their joint answer and cross-bill. They pleaded therein the same facts contained in the original answer, and by way of cross-bill alleged that on November 23, 1914, and for more than a year prior thereto, said D. C. Gammage was the owner of a $4,000 note, executed by one M. M. Robinson to H. B. Knowles, secured by a deed of trust on the real estate in controversy; that the maker of said last-described note defaulted in the payment of same, etc. On or about November 1, 1914, said D. C. Gammage demanded of defendant W. T. Latham, the trustee in said deed of trust, that he foreclose same; that on November 21, 1914, said Latham advertised and sold said real estate under the deed of trust aforesaid.

Defendants, Latham and Gammage, allege that said D. C. Gammage was then 75 years of age, in poor health, and was physically unable to attend the foreclosure sale; that he authorized and empowered this plaintiff, who had been acting as his agent in the transaction of his business, to attend said sale and buy in said property for him; that plaintiff, in compliance with said instructions, bought in the property aforesaid for testator for the consideration of $4,135; that said real estate was sold to plaintiff by said Latham, as trustee, for the use and benefit of said D. C. Gammage, for the price of $4,135; that said D. C. Gammage continued sick, and died about March 18, 1915; that said Latham, as trustee, executed to this plaintiff a deed for said property, and credited the Robinson note with the net proceeds of said sale; that plaintiff paid nothing to said trustee for the real estate aforesaid; that by reason of the premises plaintiff holds said real estate in trust for the use and benefit of said D. C. Gammage.

Said answer and cross-bill, after describing the note and deed of trust mentioned in petition, contains the following:

"That the plaintiff herein executed and delivered the aforesaid note for four thousand ($4,000) dollars, dated on or about November 23, 1914, and the said deed of trust, bearing the same date (given to secure the said note), as a matter of accommodation and convenience to the said D. C. Gammage, deceased." (Italics ours.)

The answer and cross-bill then alleges that the note and deed of trust described in petition should not be canceled, etc., until plaintiff executes and delivers to said defendants, Latham and T. R. Gammage, executors, a deed conveying to them the fee-simple title to said real estate.

The answer and cross-bill concludes with a prayer, declaring that plaintiff holds the legal title to said real estate in trust, for the use and benefit of the estate of said D. C. Gammage, and that when she has executed and delivered to said executors a deed for said real estate the note and deed of trust described in petition be canceled, etc. In case plaintiff failed to execute to said executors a deed to said property, then the court was asked to divest plaintiff of the title thereto, and vest the same in said Latham and Gammage, as executors aforesaid. They also asked for general relief. On July 20, 1916, additional evidence was heard, and the cross-bill treated as denied by plaintiff.

In order to avoid repetition, the evidence and rulings of the court during the progress of the trial will be considered, as far as necessary, in the opinion. The court found the issues for the executors, and entered a decree substantially as prayed for in the cross-bill. Plaintiff in due time filed her motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the cause duly appealed by her to this court.

Walter W. Calvin and Alfred N. Gossett, both of Kansas City, for appellant.

Marley & Reed, of Kansas City, for respondents.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. It is alleged in petition that on November 23, 1914, plaintiff, at the special instance and request of D. C. Gammage, deceased, executed and delivered to the latter a promissory note for $4,000, and that the same was secured by a deed of trust on the real estate in controversy, the legal title to which was then in plaintiff. It is alleged in petition, and the evidence conclusively shows, that said note and deed of trust were without consideration, and given to said testator as a matter of convenience. In fact the cross-bill filed by defendants as executors practically concedes the foregoing to be true, as shown by the statement therein, to wit:

"That the plaintiff herein executed and delivered the aforesaid note for four thousand ($4,000) dollars, dated on or about November 23, 1914, and the said deed of trust bearing the same date (given to secure the said note), as a matter of accommodation and convenience to the said D. C. Gammage, deceased." (Italics ours.)

Regardless of the question as to whether plaintiff is the absolute owner of the property in controversy, or holds the same in trust for said estate, she was, and is, entitled to have said note and deed of trust canceled.

2. Treating the defendant's cross-bill as an independent action, brought by defendants, as executors and trustees under the will of D. C. Gammage, deceased, to establish a resulting trust in their favor, as against plaintiff, and to divest her of the legal title to said real estate, and waiving the question as to whether said defendants can maintain this kind of an action, we will express our views of the law and facts as though their right to maintain the same were unquestioned.

[2] It is undisputed that the legal title to the property in controversy was conveyed to plaintiff under the express direction of testator, with full knowledge upon his part as to all the facts relating to the transaction. The law is well settled in this state that in order to establish a resulting trust as to real estate the evidence must be clear, strong, unequivocal, definite, and so positive as to leave no room for doubt in the mind of the chancellor. Forrester et al. v. Scoville et al., 51 Mo. 268, 269; Ringo v. Richardson et al., 53 Mo. 385; McFarland v. La Force, 119 Mo. 585, 25 S. W. 530, 27 S. W. 1100; Reed v. Painter, 129 Mo. 674, 31 S. W. 919; Curd v. Brown, 148 Mo. 82, 49 S. W. 990; Brinkman v. Sunken, 174 Mo. 709, 74 S. W. 903; McKee v. Higbee, 180 Mo. loc. cit. 299, 300, 79 S. W. 407; Reed v. Sperry, 193 Mo. 167, 91 S. W. 62; Smith v. Smith, 201 Mo. loc. cit. 547, 100 S. W. 579; Easter v. Easter, 246 Mo. 409, 151 S. W. 413; Ferguson v. Robinson, 258 Mo. 113, 167 S. W. 447; Davis v. Cummins, 195 S. W. loc. cit. 754, 755; Thompson v. Pinnell, 199 S. W. loc. cit. 1014; Johnson v. Jameson, 209 S. W. loc. cit. 924.

[3] Turning to the evidence, we find that testator loaned to M. M. Robinson, $4,000 on June 28, 1905; that a note of said date for said amount was executed by said Robinson to this plaintiff; that a deed of trust of same date was executed by said Robinson, conveying the land in controversy to W. T. Latham, as trustee, to secure said last-named note, and that this plaintiff was designated as the beneficiary therein. The above note was indorsed by plaintiff to testator. The latter in turn indorsed the same to plaintiff, and the latter again indorsed the note to testator. The latter directed Latham, as trustee, to foreclose the above deed of trust. After the property was advertised for sale under the deed of trust, Latham says testator told him the plaintiff, his daughter, would come down and bid in the property. She bid the property in at the sale, and under the direction of testator, Latham, as trustee, conveyed the property to plaintiff, and her deed therefor was duly recorded.

Testator in his will designated plaintiff as his daughter, spoke of her as such in his conversations, traveled with her, had her transact his business for a long time, and, after plaintiff bought in said property and received a deed therefor, she and testator moved on to said property and occupied the same as their home up to the time of his death. Plaintiff was not the natural daughter, and there was no evidence offered to show that she had been adopted. She was, however, related to testator in some way, and he called her daughter and treated her accordingly.

Testator, a widower, had no children, and left an estate of about $100,000. After providing in his will for plaintiff as his daughter, and for other relatives, he left a large portion of his estate to charitable institutions.

Aside from the foregoing, Mrs. Francis B. Jarrott, a professional nurse, who attended testator in his illness and who witnessed his will, testified to several conversations with testator, in which he mentioned plaintiff as the owner of the property in controversy. Shortly before testator's death, he was preparing to go to Florida, and asked witness to rent the above property for plaintiff. She asked him what rent she should charge, and testator "said it belonged to Harriet (plaintiff); that it did not make any difference to him what rent she charged." He also told her he did not care to sell the property, as he intended it for Harriet. She heard him speak of it on numerous occasions as Harriet's home. On cross-examination of this witness by defendants, she testified:

"Q. I believe you say that he said that he got the place for Harriet? A. Yes.

"Q. He intended it for Harriet? A. Yea."

Leaving out of consideration the testimony of plaintiff and that of her husband, we are of the opinion that testator intended that plaintiff should become the owner of said property, and directed the trustee to convey the same to her. It was not conveyed to her through mistake, but under the positive direction of testator himself. If he did not intend her to own it, why did he not direct the trustee to convey the same to himself? He knew of his extreme age and poor health; he was dealing with the plaintiff as his own daughter, and was expecting to make his home with her on this property. There is nothing in his will to indicate that testator claimed to own this property, or that he was attempting to dispose of same in his will. In short, the defendants have failed to come up to the requirements of foregoing authorities in respect to their proof concerning the alleged resulting trust.

W. T. Latham was testator's attorney, and is named as the executor in the will. He was allowed to testify as to conversations with deceased, while the mouths of plaintiff and her husband were practically closed by the trial court in respect to same matters.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, we are of the opinion that plaintiff has established a good title to the property in controversy, and that the proof offered in support of the cross-bill is insufficient to warrant a court of equity in overturning her title.

[4] 3. Aside from the foregoing, there is another aspect of the case, which precludes these defendants from having a resulting trust declared in their favor, even if testator had intended that plaintiff should hold the title to said property for his use and benefit. Bush was entitled to redeem the property within a year from the date of Latham's foreclosure. Either testator intended to give the property to plaintiff, or he was having the title taken in her name, and a bogus deed of trust given by her on the property for his benefit, in order to cut off the right of redemption upon the part of Bush. If he had the title taken in plaintiff's name for that purpose, then neither he, nor his legal representatives, can maintain an action in equity to have a resulting trust declared in their favor against appellant. Sell v. West, 125 Mo. 621, 28 S. W. 969, 46 Am. St. Rep. 508; Creamer v. Bivert, 214 Mo. 473, 113 S. W. 1118; Derry v. Dielder, 216 Mo. 176, 177, 115 S. W. 412; Chambers v. Chambers, 227 Mo. loc. cit. 284, 285, 127 S. W. 86, 137 Am. St. Rep. 567; Stillwell v. Bell, 248 Mo. 61, 154 S. W. 85; Rowley v. Rowley, 197 S. W. 152.

Mr. Latham testified that testator knew the beneficiary in a deed of trust could not buy in the property without giving the grantor the right to redeem within the year, "and for that reason he had Harriet to buy it in—I mean Miss Gammage or Mrs. Cousins—because he was the holder of the note, and did not want it to appear that the beneficiary bought it in." After the deed of trust was given by plaintiff to testator, the latter said to Latham "he thought it might prevent Bush from redeeming." (Italics ours.)

Mr. Latham, at the instance of his counsel, testified as follows:

"Q. Now what, if anything, was said at or prior to the foreclosure sale by you about the reason why you should make the trustee's deed to Harriet, the plaintiff here, rather than to Mr. Gammage? A. There wasn't anything said by me, but Mr. Gammage the night before told me that he wanted it made that way so it could not be redeemed." (Italics ours.)

Joseph F. Cousins, who married plaintiff, after the death of testator, and who had transacted business for the latter, in discussing the bogus deed of trust given by plaintiff to testator, while testifying in regard to the cross-bill, without objection, said:

"Q. What did he (testator) say about having it released? A. He said he put it on there just temporary, to have it released so Mr. Bush would not come in and redeem it."

If, therefore, testator had the title taken in the name of plaintiff at the trustee's sale, and had her execute the bogus deed of trust to himself for the purpose of cutting out Bush's right of redemption under the statute, then his legal representatives are precluded from declaring a resulting trust in favor of his estate, and divesting plaintiff of the title to the real estate in controversy.

4. Considering the case as a whole, we are of the opinion that the note and deed of trust described in plaintiff's petition are without consideration, void, and should be canceled. We further hold that defendants should take nothing by their answer and cross-bill, and that plaintiff, under section 2535, R. S. 1909, should be declared the owner in fee of the real estate aforesaid.

We accordingly reverse and remand the cause, with directions to the trial court to set aside its decree and to enter a decree in favor of plaintiff in conformity to the views heretofore expressed.

WHITE and MOZLEY, CO., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of RAILEY, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

HUNTER v. WEIL et al. (No. 20603.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Adverse possession §44—Usual acts of ownership must be continuous.

Under Rev. St. 1909, § 1882, providing that usual acts of ownership shall be deemed possession of whole tract claimed, the usual acts of ownership must be exercised for a continuous period of ten years.

2. Appeal and error §1010(1)—Finding supported by substantial evidence conclusive.

Where cause was submitted to lower court, sitting as a jury, without any instructions asked or given, its determination is binding on appeal if there is any substantial evidence on which to base it.

3. Adverse possession §114(1) — Evidence held to support finding against plaintiff claiming by adverse possession.

In an action to quiet title, where plaintiff claimed by adverse possession under Rev. St. 1909, § 1882, land in possession of defendant, held, that there was substantial evidence to support finding that plaintiff was not the owner of the property sued for.

4. Property §9—Person in possession of land prima facie owner.

One in possession of land for nine years under a deed from heirs, in good faith claiming ownership, is prima facie the owner of the land as against every person other than true owner, although all heirs did not sign the deed.

5. Appeal and error §877(4)—Appellant, not having title, cannot complain that defendant was adjudged title.

In an action to quiet title, having found that plaintiff was not the owner, that the lower court may have erred in declaring that defendant in possession was the owner is not a matter of which plaintiff can complain.

6. Evidence §182—Parol evidence of letter admissible where letter is shown not to be in existence.

Witness was properly permitted to testify, over objection that the writing was the best evidence, that he wrote a letter to plaintiff, where the witness testified he did not have the letter, and plaintiff testified he never received such letter.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pemiscot County; Sterling H. McCarty, Judge.

Suit by William Hunter against Houston Weil and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. L. Ward, of Caruthersville, for appellant.

Wm. Fitch and Oliver, Raithel & Lacy, all of St. Louis, for respondents.

SMALL, C. I. Suit to quiet title with count in ejectment in usual form for 80 acres of land, to wit, W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 32, township 18, range 13, in said county.

The answer is a general denial, except that it admits possession of defendants. Also contains paragraph pleading ten-year statute of limitations.

The trial was by the court without a jury. No instructions were asked or given. The court found for the defendant Cunningham Land & Improvement Company; that defendant Weil had no interest, except as tenant of said company; and that plaintiff had no interest or title in the land. Judgment was rendered accordingly, and plaintiff appealed to this court.

Plaintiff had no record title, but claims ownership by adverse possession. Plaintiff claims under deed made to him October 12, 1889, by one William C. Finley, purporting to convey to him a number of tracts of land, aggregating some 700 acres, including the tract sued for. The larger portion of the land described in the Finley deed was in one irregular body extending from the 40-acre tract in the southeast corner of section 20 in a southwesterly direction through section 29 to the land in dispute, which was located in the southwest corner of section 32. The following plat, within the shaded lines, shows this irregular tract. The tract sued for is marked A.

Plaintiff does not claim that he ever fenced or cleared, deadened the timber on, or in any manner improved the land in question. It was low, wet land, and a portion of it was covered by a lake. It was not cultivated nor fit for cultivation until after the year 1901, when public and private drains were constructed after it was in possession of the defendant Cunningham Land & Development Company. The land was part of the swamp land originally conveyed by the United States to the state of Missouri, and by the state of Missouri to Pemiscot county. The county sold it to George W. Bushey on the 14th of May, 1857, who at the time paid the purchase price, but took no patent. Bushey and wife conveyed the land to Robert B. Turner by deed dated May 27, 1858, who in turn conveyed it to Wyatt Mooring by deed dated March 2, 1859. Mooring died intestate in 1874, leaving a widow and nine children surviving him, without having parted with his title. The record title was in Mooring's heirs prior to the time defendants' possession under deeds from them commenced.

Plaintiff's testimony showed that in the year 1898 his agent sold $200 worth of cottonwood timber off of the land to the Cunningham brothers, who afterwards became the incorporators and owners of the defendant company, Cunningham Land & Improvement Company. It also tended to show that portions of the other land described in the deed from Finley in sections 20 and 29 were cleared, fenced, and cultivated by plaintiff and his tenants for more than ten years prior to 1901, when the evidence tended to show that the Cunninghams took actual possession of the land in question, cleared a portion of it, and put a small house thereon, and a fence around it, so as to include it within their inclosure of other tracts of adjoining land which they owned. The defendants' evidence further tended to show that the Cunninghams went into possession in 1901, under a contract to purchase the land from one Porter, whose wife was one of the heirs of Wyatt Mooring, and who had acquired the interest or had power to convey the interest of numerous other heirs of said Mooring. When Mooring died in 1874 or 1875, most of his children were married and had children, and some of them died and their children inherited their parents' interest. It does not appear whether all the heirs interested conveyed their title to the Cunninghams, but it does appear that a substantial part of them did. The conveyance from Porter was made to John A. Cunningham August 7, 1902. Defendants subsequently procured other deeds conveying the interest of other Mooring heirs.

The petition in this case was filed June 10, 1910. The undisputed evidence shows that John A. Cunningham and the defendant company were in actual possession and control of the land from 1901 up to and including the day suit was brought; that up to the year 1910, from and including the year 1902, they paid the taxes on the land, and would have paid the taxes in 1910 had not the plaintiff "got ahead of them" in so doing.

Defendants' evidence tended to show that in 1909 there was a division fence built between the plaintiff's property on the north and the property in question, and that the plaintiff paid half the cost of this fence and the Cunningham Company the other half; also that a few years after the Cunninghams took possession some ditches were built which drained the land in question, as well as some land adjoining the same belonging to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff paid his proportion of the expense for his other land, and the defendant company paid its proportion of the expense for the land in question. But plaintiff denies that he knowingly permitted defendants to pay any part of such expense for the division fence or ditches. There was also evidence on the part of the plaintiff that his tenants on his other land took timber for rails, fences, and firewood, from the part of plaintiff's land that was not cleared. But whether they did so from the particular land in question was not shown. Plaintiff testified generally that his tenants "used it right along." But what the plaintiff intended to say they used it for, or meant by "right along," was not stated. Plaintiff also testified that he sold timber to one Strother and one Plinon and authorized them to cut it from his land generally, including the land in question. But it does not appear that either of them ever cut any timber from the land sued for. The evidence does not show that plaintiff commenced clearing the 160 acres of land in the same section 32 immediately north of and adjoining the land in suit until about 1896, a year or two before the Cunninghams cut cottonwood timber off of the land in question. So it is not entirely clear from plaintiff's testimony that he paid the taxes every year from 1889 to 1901. He says that he always included this land in his list to the collector to pay the taxes, and he paid them every year, unless some other person "got ahead" of him and paid the taxes. Plaintiff said: "There were some years, that somebody else might have paid the taxes before I did." The tax receipts were not put in evidence, except for two or three years. Plaintiff said that he had the receipts in court for all the years since he purchased it, including the years 1902, 1903, and 1904, but it was afterwards admitted that defendant Cunningham Company paid the taxes for 1902, 1903, and 1904, and subsequent years to 1910. There was no evidence that plaintiff's predecessor, Finley, ever paid taxes or exercised any acts of ownership over this land.

The defendants, to further sustain their title, introduced a patent from Pemiscot county dated July 1, 1910, and recorded July 2, 1910. This patent recited, in the usual form, that on the 14th of May, 1857, George W. Bushey purchased and made full payment for the land, and that by mesne conveyances said Bushey sold and transferred it to Cunningham Land & Improvement Company, who was then the owner of it and was entitled to a patent therefor; that in consideration of the premises, and in conformity with law, the county of Pemiscot therefore "doth give and grant unto the said Cunningham Land & Improvement Company, and their heirs, the land above described," to wit, the land in controversy. This patent was duly executed by Joseph M. Brasher, the presiding judge of the county court, and countersigned by B. M. Tinsley, the clerk of said court.

II. It is strenuously contended by appellant that the undisputed evidence shows that prior to 1901, when Cunningham took possession, the plaintiff had acquired title by acts of ownership over the land in question, under section 1882, R. S. 1909, which is as follows:

"Possession of Part, When Possession of the Whole Tract.—The possession, under color of title, of a part of a tract or lot of land, in the name of the whole tract claimed, and exercising, during the time of such possession, the usual acts of ownership over the whole tract so claimed, shall be deemed a possession of the whole of such tract."

[1, 2] Appellant claims that his deed from Finley in 1889 gave him color of title to all the land described in said deed (which is not denied), including the land in suit, and that under the undisputed evidence he claimed title, paid the taxes, and exercised "the usual acts of ownership" over the land in question, as well as being in actual possession of other parts of the land described in the Finley deed (such actual possession of other parts is also not denied), from the year 1898 until the year 1901, at which time the Cunninghams took possession. But plaintiff's learned counsel is in error in saying that the facts with regard to plaintiff's acts of ownership over the land in suit were not disputed. The very crux of the case before the lower court was the issue whether plaintiff did exercise the usual acts of ownership over this land continuously for the statutory period of ten years prior to 1901. It would seem from the evidence that all of this land was wild, unfenced, unimproved timber land, and there is no clear evidence that any timber was removed from it prior to 1898, when the Cunninghams cut cottonwood from it under contract with the plaintiff. The statement of plaintiff's witnesses that tenants on other land included in this conveyance from Finley took timber for firewood, rails, and fence posts from the uncleared portions did not necessarily include the land in suit. So the statement of plaintiff himself that "the tenants used it right along in connection with the other land" is too general in its nature to be of conclusive probative force. In any event, it was for the lower court to say what probative force it would attach to the testimony. The land in question was separated from the cultivated land and lands occupied by tenants by other tracts of timbered land of the plaintiff until at least the year 1896, when plaintiff first began to remove the timber from the northwest quarter of section 32, which immediately joined the land in question on the north. So that plaintiff's tenants, up to 1896, had more convenient timber land from which to procure their timber for firewood, fencing, or other purposes, and apparently no occasion nor necessity for taking it from the land in suit. As appears from the testimony, as we view it from the record, the only admitted acts of ownership which plaintiff exercised over this land was to sell cottonwood timber from it in 1898 to the Cunninghams. Under the statute plaintiff must have exercised the usual acts of ownership for a continuous period of ten years. That was a mixed question of law and fact, and the burden of proving the facts in relation thereto was upon the plaintiff. It was submitted to the lower court, sitting as a jury, without any instructions asked or given, and the determination of that question by the lower court is therefore binding upon us, if there is any substantial evidence upon which to base such a finding.

The cases cited by learned counsel, Truitt v. Bender, 193 S. W. 838, Dowd v. Bond, 199 S. W. 954, In re Lankford's Estate, 272 Mo. 1, 197 S. W. 147, and Toler v. Edwards, 249 Mo. 152, 155 S. W. 26, do not rule this case. So also as to Nall v. Conover, 223 Mo. 477, 122 S. W. 1039.

In Truitt v. Bender, supra, the undisputed and distinct testimony was:

"I used it just the same as I did the rest, for my timber, rail timber, board timber, firewood, anything like that just the same as I did the rest. I did this all of the time I was there, some 25 or 30 years."

The evidence in that case also showed that the adjoining 40, a part of the same 80 acres, had been in cultivation for "35 or 40 years." There was no contradictory evidence. In that case the land had never been in actual possession of any one, and was not in possession of defendant, and had been for 9 years, as in the case at bar.

In Dowd v. Bond, supra, the court held that, where neither party shows good title, but the plaintiff is in possession, the judgment should be for the party in possession, the plaintiff in that case.

Here the plaintiff never had actual possession, and the only question is whether he exercised the usual acts of ownership for the required period.

In the Lankford Case, supra, the question of domicile was involved, and it has no bearing on this case, as the testimony passed on in that case was a document, a will, and not parol testimony, as in the case before us.

Toler v. Edwards, supra, simply holds that, where the evidence as to the character of the possession is conflicting, this court will not interfere with the finding of the lower court, sitting as a jury.

In Nall v. Conover, supra, the lower court found that the acts relied on were established and did constitute usual acts of ownership, which is the very reverse of the finding of the lower court in this case.

We find no authority to sustain the position of plaintiff's learned counsel that under the evidence in this case, the lower court was bound, as a matter of law, to find that the plaintiff had established his title by adverse possession. The plaintiff waited for nine years, after he knew the defendants were in possession of the land and were expending their money in clearing, fencing, and draining it and paying the taxes upon it, including perhaps drainage taxes (it was in a drainage district and a public ditch had been built), before bringing his suit. While this would not have estopped him, as a matter of law, from claiming the land, it would naturally call for clear and decisive evidence by the trier of facts concerning the details of plaintiff's "usual acts of ownership" before rendering a verdict in his favor.

[3] We must therefore rule that there was substantial evidence to support the finding of the lower court that the plaintiff was not the owner of the property sued for.

[4, 5] III. Whether the deeds from the heirs of Wyatt Mooring, under which the defendant company claims embraced all of the said heirs is immaterial to consider, because the defendant company, being in possession and having been so in possession in good faith, claiming ownership under said deeds for about nine years before the suit was instituted, is prima facie the owner of the land, as against every person other than the true owner. Indeed, having found that plaintiff is not the owner, the fact that the lower court may have erred for any reason in declaring that defendant company was the owner is not a matter of which the plaintiff can complain. Wheeler v. Land Co., 193 Mo. 291, 91 S. W. 1050; Rutledge v. First Presbyterian Church, 212 S. W. loc. cit. 861.

[6] IV. On cross-examination of plaintiff's witness Reynolds, he was permitted to testify (over the plaintiff's objection that the writing was the best evidence) that in 1898 he wrote a letter to the plaintiff informing him that his title to the land in question was not good. But, as the witness testified he did not have the letter, and plaintiff, Hunter, testified he never received any such letter, the parol testimony was competent.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

REYNOLDS et ux. v. KINYON. (No. 21185.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations §705(1)—Right of public to use streets defined.

As far as the use of a public street is concerned, the public includes young and old, without necessary reference to their physical or mental ability or their means of locomotion, the right of each to be on the street being subject to the obligation to use it with due regard to the safety and use of all.

2. Municipal corporations §706(5)—Evidence of automobile driver killing child held an admission of negligence.

In a parents' action for wrongful death of their two year old child struck by defendant's automobile while in the street, evidence by defendant, in view of Laws 1911, p. 327, § 8, subd. 2, relating to the operation of motor vehicles, held to constitute an admission of negligence directly causing the death of the child.

3. Negligence §95(3)—Negligence of visitor taking care of child not imputable to child where defendant's negligence was direct cause of death.

Where a child between two and three years old left by its parents in the care of a visitor, went into a public street and was killed by defendant's automobile, the negligence of such visitor was not imputable to the child as a defense in favor of defendant, whose negligence was the direct cause of death.

4. Witnesses §389—Evidence of person in charge of child killed by automobile held inadmissible in impeachment.

In a parents' action for the wrongful death of a child between two and three years old, killed by defendant's automobile while in the street after having been left in charge of a neighbor, evidence by policemen that such neighbor, in response to a direct question, stated that the accident was unavoidable held inadmissible in impeachment; the witness having merely denied any knowledge or recollection of such testimony.

5. Municipal corporations §705(3)—Automobile driver must exercise as to children highest degree of care prescribed by statute.

It is the duty of an automobile driver on a public street to exercise not merely ordinary care as to children, but the highest degree of care prescribed by the statute.

Appeal from Circuit Court, St. Louis County; G. A. Wurdeman, Judge.

Action by James F. Reynolds and wife against Albert S. Kinyon for wrongful death. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Robert H. Merryman, of St. Louis, for appellants.

Conrad Paeben, of St. Louis (James T. Roberts, of St. Louis, of counsel), for respondent.

BROWN, C. This is a suit by a father and mother for damages sustained on account of the negligent killing of their child, between two and three years old, by running over it with an automobile while driving over Vista avenue, a street in St. Louis. The sufficiency of the petition for the purposes of the case is not questioned. The answer, in addition to the usual general denial, pleads contributory negligence, in that the child, without warning of any kind, suddenly ran into the path of defendant's automobile in such manner that defendant, in the exercise of due care, could not prevent striking it, and that plaintiffs assigned the care and control of the child to one Grace Gallagher as their agent and servant, and that Grace Gallagher was inexperienced and incompetent in the care and control of children, as was known by plaintiffs; that the child had a tendency to run into the traveled part of the street and off the sidewalk, which was known to the servant, who carelessly and negligently permitted him to run off the sidewalk and into the path of defendant's automobile, which she saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have seen, approaching in time to have prevented it; also that the parents were negligent in the selection of an agent competent to care for and control the child. Issue was joined by replication.

There is no conflict with respect to the controlling facts. The plaintiffs were young people, and this boy was their only child. He was two years five months and three days old at the date of his death on July 1, 1915. They were in such circumstances that they kept no servant, the wife alone performing all the domestic services, as well as caring for the baby. Mrs. Grace Gallagher was a friend, whose husband, Frank Gallagher, was a soldier of the Twelfth Engineers, stationed at the Chain of Rocks, and she was going to see him that afternoon. Mrs. Reynolds was going to take a street car ride with her cousin to Meramec Highlands later in the same afternoon. The child wanted to go with Mrs. Gallagher to see the soldiers, which the mother permitted, and they left for the camp at 2 o'clock, while Mrs. Reynolds and her cousin left at 3 o'clock. Mrs. Gallagher returned about 6:15, and went with the child to the Reynolds house, which was on the north side of Vista avenue, the third house east of Theresa avenue, and sat down on the porch with a book to wait for the return of Mrs. Reynolds. She took a book, and the child played in front of the house with other children for a while. He then went to the next door and played with the children there. After a while she called him, and he started back to her, and she glanced at her book. She says that it was no more than two minutes afterward when she looked up and saw him in the street just as the automobile struck him. The child was not large enough to step down from the curb 10 inches high, but would turn his back to the street and slide down.

The defendant himself tells the story of the accident substantially as follows: He was driving east along Vista avenue on the south side of the center of the street, which was 36 feet wide between the curbs at that place. There was no one on the street between the curbs that he saw, and no vehicle in sight. He saw people on both sides, but paid no attention to them, because he was watching the machine. He first saw the child, almost in front of the machine, running across the road. He turned the machine to the left to miss him, the machine struck him, knocked him down, and ran over him. He stopped the machine within 15 feet. Some man picked the child up and ran with it. He did not see the child at all after it was struck. On cross-examination he said that he started to turn the machine to the right. He did not see the child, because he was not watching for children.

Mrs. Kinyon said she was sitting in the seat with her husband. She testified that when she first saw the child he was pitched forward, right in front of the machine, and her husband was trying to stop the machine. None of the passengers in the machine who testified saw the child in the street until he was in front of the machine. One of them said the child was about 2½ feet high. She saw him on the sidewalk with other children as they approached. The view was clear. She did not see him again until she saw him in front of the machine.

Two witnesses who saw the accident testified for plaintiffs. Mildred Lee lived next door to the Reynolds, and saw it get down from the curb, and run across the street and saw the machine hit it. The boy ran about as fast as one would walk.

Mr. Downey lived on the south side of Vista avenue in the same block. He saw the boy run across the street to the front of the automobile, and saw it strike him. He said the child ran at the rate of about 2 miles an hour. The automobile was moving at a speed of 12 or 15 miles an hour.

On cross-examination Mrs. Gallagher was asked by defendant's counsel whether or not after the accident she told Officer Doerdelman at the Reynolds house that "the machine was not going fast at all, and the accident was unavoidable." She answered that she did not remember saying any such thing.

Officers Doerdelman and Thomas were called up by the defendant. Both testified that they went to the Reynolds house immediately after the accident to investigate. They found Mrs. Gallagher nervous and crying, and she seemed to be in quite a nervous state. They asked her if the accident "was unavoidable," and against the objection of plaintiffs they were both permitted to testify that she said it was. This ruling was duly excepted to, and is assigned as error by the plaintiffs.

The court of its own motion and against plaintiffs' objection gave the following instruction numbered 15:

"The court instructs the jury that the negligence of the servant or agent is imputable to the master or principal to prevent recovery by him for injuries to which the servant's or agent's negligence contributes, and the master or principal assumes the risk of the negligence of the employé. Therefore, if you find and believe from the evidence that on the day of the injury referred to in the evidence plaintiffs assigned the care and control of their minor son to one Grace Gallagher as their agent and servant, and that she, the said Grace Gallagher, carelessly and negligently suffered said minor child to run off the sidewalk and onto the street unattended, when she knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care, as defined in these instructions, would have known, that automobiles were frequently passing on said street, and that she, the said Grace Gallagher, carelessly and negligently suffered said minor child to run off of the sidewalk and onto the street unattended in the path of defendant's automobile, when she saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care as defined in these instructions might have seen, defendant's automobile approaching in time, by the exercise of ordinary care, to have prevented said minor from running into the street and in the path of said automobile, then the carelessness and negligence, if any, of said Grace Gallagher is the carelessness and negligence of these plaintiffs, and they cannot recover, unless you find that the defendant is liable under the other instructions given in this case.

"And in determining whether the plaintiffs contributed, by their negligent care and custody, if any, of their minor child to its injury and death, you are to consider whether or not they or their servant and agent, if any, exercised that degree of caution, care, and watchfulness over their child in keeping him off the street and out of danger which was reasonable and proper for parents in their circumstances of life."

To the giving of this instruction the plaintiffs at the time excepted.

1. This action being founded upon section 5426 of the Revised Statutes of 1909, which provides that "whenever the death of a person shall be caused by a wrongful act, neglect or default of another, and the act, neglect or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who or the corporation which would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured," the first question which arises in natural sequence is whether the act which caused the death of plaintiffs' child was negligent on the part of defendant. We will consider and dispose of this question apart from the questions relating to the contributory negligence presented by the pleadings. In doing this we will refer only to the undisputed facts.

[1] The child was killed in a street in the residential portion of the city of St. Louis devoted to the public use. The public includes the young and old, without necessary reference to physical or mental ability or their means of locomotion. The right of each to be upon the street is subject to the obligation to use it with due regard to the safety and use of all. The law expressly recognizes the dangerous character of the automobile in respect to both its speed and its weight, which particularly makes it an instrument of death to those it strikes. In this respect it recognizes also that persons on foot are liable to be found on any portion of the street. The statute (Laws 1911, p. 327) provides that—

"Upon approaching a pedestrian, who is upon the traveled part of any highway and not upon a sidewalk, and upon approaching an intersecting highway or a curve or a corner in a highway, where the operator's view is obstructed, every person operating a motor vehicle shall slow down and give a timely signal with his bell, horn or other device for signaling." Section 8, subd. 2.

This recognizes the duty to not only keep watch to ascertain the presence of pedestrians in front of his vehicle, but in case his view is so limited that he is liable to come upon them without seeing them to warn them by a sound indicating his approach. It also involves the duty, upon discovering them, to so manage his machine as not to do them harm. If he sees a man on a crutch in front of him, it is his duty to avoid him, or give him an opportunity to escape; and, if it is a child evidently too young to understand the danger, he must act accordingly. This statutory rule is firmly founded in the impulse of common humanity as well as in public safety. The duty to watch is an instinct of the normal mind. While the operator has the right to assume that persons whom he sees in his path will do their part, that right ceases when it is developed that it is a child too young to understand the danger.

In this case the defendant was driving his vehicle upon the public street at a speed of 15 miles per hour. He says that he saw persons on the sidewalk on either side, but the traveled part of the street, so far as he knew, was absolutely empty. He could, if necessary, stop within a distance of 15 feet, and did so stop on striking the child with the front of his machine. When he was still 150 feet away it had slipped down from the curb, and started at a speed of 2 miles per hour to cross his path on the south side of the center of the street. The young woman riding in the rear seat of his machine saw it as it stood upon the curb. She did not see it while it was toddling diagonally across the street, a distance of as much as 20 feet, to the path of the machine, where he was struck and killed. In the interval defendant had driven a distance of 150 feet without lifting his eyes to the road before him. That the field of his vision was broad enough to take in the sidewalk is definitely stated by him in his testimony. He also said that somebody immediately picked up the child and ran with it across the street. We presume that this was Mr. Downey, who lived on the south side of the street and saw the accident, and was carrying the child to his home. Mr. Kinyon refrained from saying what he did at the time but it appears from the statement of one of his witnesses that he was at a police station within a few minutes, and that the two policemen were at once sent to investigate, and arrived at the Reynolds house about 6:45. It does not appear that he went across the street to inquire whether the child was dead or alive.

[2] We think the facts stated amounted to an admission on the part of the defendant of negligence directly causing the death of the child. The only explanation he gives is that he was not looking for children in the street. We can see no difference as a matter of law between the case so stated and the one that would be presented had he turned his automobile loose in the street with neither driver nor passenger at the same speed and with the same result. The victim was a child, and the defense is that he was not bound to anticipate the possible presence of a child in the street, and for this reason was not guilty of negligence in killing it. The same defense would be equally applicable to the act of turning his automobile loose, had it killed a child instead of an adult. This theory is illogical as well as inhuman. If the duty rested upon any one to keep the child from the street, it was a duty owing to the child and not to him. So far as he was concerned, he had no right to demand that it be kept out of his way any more than he had the right to demand that the aged or infirm or feeble in mind or body be kept out of his way. The common law and statute as well as humanity imposed upon him the duty to look out for all. His negligence began with his failure to do so in time to avoid the injury, and was complete with the deathblow.

2. The real question in the case lies in instruction No. 15, given by the court of its own motion. There was no evidence that Grace Gallagher occupied the relation of agent or servant of the plaintiffs, unless the fact that she was a visitor at their home, and the child was left with her with the intention that she should take it on her visit to the Chain of Rocks that afternoon, constituted such evidence. No contractual relation existed between them, unless this circumstance created it. Nor is there any evidence that she was not thoroughly competent in the care of children, so that there is nothing in the case to justify the submission of the question of contributory negligence of the parents in leaving the child with her. It was therefore a question of law and not of fact whether or not Mrs. Gallagher was the "servant or agent" of plaintiffs, and the jury were told "that the negligence of the servant or agent is imputable to the master or principal to prevent recovery by him for injuries to which the servant's or agent's negligence contributes, and the master or principal assumes the risk of the negligence of the employé." The instruction virtually told them that the relation existed, and that if Mrs. Gallagher was negligent in permitting the child to escape to the street there could be no recovery. In determining whether this was a current proposition of law, we shall not stop to consider whether or not she owed to the child, as the instruction assumes, the duty to watch for the defendant's automobile and prevent it from running off the sidewalk and onto the street unattended, in the path of said automobile when in the exercise of ordinary care she might have seen it approaching in time to have prevented it. We mention this point because, as we interpret the language, the instruction assumes that this duty is unconditional and absolute, and we do not desire to be understood to apply that rule to the circumstances in this case. See Cosmoyski v. Transit Co., 207 Mo. 268, 108 S. W. 51. We will therefore confine ourselves to the question whether or not the conduct of Mrs. Gallagher is imputable to plaintiffs in the defense of this case. As we have already said, her fault, if fault it was, consisted in permitting the child to be unattended upon the street. The fault charged against the defendant consisted in killing a child upon the street by his own active negligence in running over it with his machine. The statute which we have already quoted gives this action for wrongful death in every case where the death is caused by a wrongful act, neglect, or default of another "such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof." The right of the injured party to recover had he survived is made, in words too plain to admit of construction, the absolute test of the right of the plaintiffs.

The defense in this case is contributory negligence. It is admitted that the child was so young as to be incapable of any act of negligence, but the defendant says that the negligence of the woman who with the consent of his parents had the control of his person at the time would be imputed to him in bar of a recovery of damages for the injury had he survived it. It is true that there can be no recovery for injuries where it appears that the person injured was guilty of contributory negligence, which is defined as being "where the injury is the result of the united, mutual, concurring, and contemporaneous negligence of the parties to the transaction." 20 R. C. L. p. 99, and cases cited. This rule is illustrated by the operation of what we sometimes call the doctrine of the last chance, which requires one operating a dangerous appliance or vehicle, who sees another in danger from its movement, or by the exercise of proper care would see him in such danger, in time to avoid striking him, and neglects to do so, to respond in damages for the injury so inflicted. This rule is applied in all cases in which the injured party is in a place of danger from his own negligence, and is founded in the principle that one who has been negligent is entitled in common humanity to all practicable protection from injury. By heedlessly placing himself in danger he does not become an outlaw and deserving of death or mutilation. For this reason it is often expressively denominated the humanitarian doctrine. In all such cases the negligence arises when the danger becomes apparent, whether seen or not.

[3] That the same principle applies in this case is evident. The act of the driver in failing to stop his machine was neither mutual, concurrent, nor contemporaneous with the act of the woman in permitting the child to escape from her. It was distinct in its character and independent and complete in itself. Had the child been a drunken man lying stupified in the path of the automobile he would have been entitled to the same protection, and it could not be said that the proprietor of the saloon who had turned him out helpless in the street, knowing his condition and inability to take care of himself, would be attributable to him to prevent a recovery. It may be that the saloon keeper might be liable in a separate action for the same injury, or that he might be solely liable in an action for turning him out in the face of a known and imminent danger, but that his act would be imputed to the victim as contributory negligence cannot be imagined. We can see nothing in the relation of Mrs. Gallagher to the child that would charge him with the consequence of her act in favor of the wrongdoer although, if wrongful, she herself might be liable.

This same question was before this court in Czezewska v. Benton-Bellefontaine Ry. Co., 121 Mo. 201, 25 S. W. 911. The court said:

"In the instructions for the plaintiff the jury are, in substance, instructed that if the child's death was caused by the negligence of the driver, while running the defendant's car and without negligence on the part of its parents the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, and that, although they may believe that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in permitting her infant son to escape upon the street, yet, if they find from the evidence that the death of the infant might have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care upon the part of the driver, they will find for the plaintiff. The doctrine of these instructions as applicable to cases of infants of such tender years as to be incapable of the exercise of judgment or discretion, in actions brought by the parent for the death of the child or by the child for injuries under the statute for damages, has been sanctioned and maintained by this court in a long and unvarying line of decisions. Boland v. Railroad, 36 Mo. 484; O'Flaherty v. Railroad, 45 Mo. 70; Morrissey v. Ferry Co., 43 Mo. 380; Isabel v. Railroad, 60 Mo. 475; Farris v. Railroad, 80 Mo. 325; Donahoe v. Railroad, 83 Mo. 543; Reilly v. Railroad, 94 Mo. 600; Winters v. Railroad, 99 Mo. 509; Rosenkrantz v. Railroad, 108 Mo. 9."

That case was approved in Cornoyski v. Transit Co., supra, and upon authority as well as principle expresses the law as it exists in this state. The only issue before the jury being negligence in running over the child after the defendant had seen, or by the use of the proper degree of care might have seen, its dangerous position, instruction No. 15, given by the court of its own motion, in so far as it imputes to the child or its parents any negligence of Mrs. Gallagher in permitting it to escape into the street, was fatally erroneous.

[4] 3. One other question deserves notice. Two policemen were permitted to testify that they went to the Reynolds house immediately after the accident, and that Mrs. Gallagher told them, in answer to a direct question, that the accident was unavoidable; the court placing its decision on the ground that it tended to impeach the witness. A careful examination of her testimony shows that she had testified to nothing which this statement, if she made it, had any tendency to dispute, nor to any contested fact. She did not testify directly or indirectly to the speed at which the vehicle was being driven, nor that she saw it until the instant of the collision, nor did she attempt to give any opinion on that subject. Nor did she state any fact except the collision as admitted by all, relating in any way to its culpability. She did not attempt to say positively that she had not given the answer attributed to her, but denied definitely any knowledge or recollection of it, and her denial was undoubtedly honest, for, as the policemen testified, she was weeping and hysterical at the time of the inquisition. It seems to have been, if the interview occurred, an attempt to secure some admission from her in words the officer admits having put in her mouth. It was an opinion as to the legal effect of the incident which neither bound the plaintiffs nor tended to dispute her testimony on the trial. It was admitted by the court after a legal controversy calculated to enhance its effect, and with the statement by the court that was calculated to cast the stigma of "impeachment" upon the plaintiffs' case without ground therefor. It was plainly reversible error.

[5] 4. In one of the instructions given for defendant his duty is defined as the exercise of ordinary care instead of the highest degree of care prescribed by the statute. Although this was error, we have preferred to dispose of the case upon questions relating to its merits.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the circuit court for St. Louis county is reversed, and the cause remanded.

WADE v. MEYER. (No. 16162.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Submitted on Briefs May 11, 1920. Opinion Filed June 8, 1920.)

1. Tenancy in common §28(1) — Tenants cannot collect rents from cotenants.

Generally tenants in common cannot collect rents from cotenants.

2. Tenancy in common §28(1)—Cotenants' agent in possession of premises liable for rent which he failed to collect from cotenant in possession as tenant of agent.

Where cotenants by agreement turned control of the premises over to an agent, who took possession as such agent and thereafter rented the several apartments to the cotenants, the occupancy of the cotenants was as tenants in severalty under such agent, making it agent's duty to collect rent from such tenants, and making him liable for the rental value of the apartments which he permitted some of the tenants to occupy without payment of rent.

3. Costs $$260(4)$ —No damages for vexatious appeal where appellant acted in good faith.

Where appellant appears to have acted in good faith, and, under a mistake as to his duty under the law in the facts, damages will not be imposed as for a vexatious appeal.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; William T. Jones, Judge.

Action by George E. Wade against Christian F. W. Meyer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

August C. Hilmer and J. C. Robertson, both of St. Louis, for appellant.

Grant & Grant, of St. Louis, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. This is an action for an accounting brought by plaintiff in his own right and as assignee of his son, Claude A. Wade, against Christian F. W. Meyer—originally also against Henry and August Miller, but these latter dropped out of the case—Claude A. Wade and the Millers owning the premises as tenants in common, and the plaintiff claiming curtesy in right of his deceased wife. The property was in charge of defendant, Christian F. W. Meyer, who had rented apartments in the building to the Millers and Claude A. Wade, collecting rents from the latter but not from the Millers. This suit is for an accounting of the rentals collected or owing. The cause was tried by the court and much testimony taken. By his first account defendant Meyer admitted that there was due plaintiff, as assignee, $151.15, but claimed that this was an error, and that there was due him only $108.60, denying plaintiff's right to any allowance on account of his claim by the curtesy, as to which defendant claimed plaintiff was barred and estopped by his laches to any allowance on this account. The court found that plaintiff was entitled to $402.02, including the curtesy, and entered judgment accordingly, from which defendant Meyer has duly appealed.

Although we might refuse to examine the evidence in the case by reason of the points made by appellant in his motion for a new trial, which really attack the finding as not supported by the weight of the testimony, we have read all of it and found it ample to sustain the finding and judgment.

[1, 2] Learned counsel for appellant under their points and authorities claim as their first point, that tenants in common cannot collect rents from co-tenants. That is generally true, but the occupancy of the Millers was not as co-tenants but as tenants in severalty under Meyer, to whom all the owners had turned over the control of the premises and each of the Millers and Claude A. Wade rented their several apartments from him—none of them, however, except Wade actually paying rent—and it is for this rent due as well as that collected that the account is in great part asked.

Learned counsel for appellant further make the point that the relation of landlord and tenant must exist to sustain an action for use and occupation, and they claim that this relation did not exist between "plaintiff" (so it is printed, but meaning appellant) and the Millers. The trial court, on substantial evidence, found against appellant on this.

The third point is that respondent was guilty of laches in failing to assert his interest in the property for twenty years after it became vested and that under the circumstances of the case, appellant will be protected. The learned trial court found on this that there were here no laches which barred or estopped respondent, and it had substantial evidence to show lack of knowledge of the facts to excuse respondent.

The final point is that Meyer, the appellant, was not acting in a fiduciary capacity and is only liable, in any case, for the rents collected, and that he had no power to compel tenants in common and in actual possession to pay rent to those not occupying the premises. That is not this case. Meyer, under agreement of all the owners, was in possession as agent for all. Each of them was in possession, not as owner, but severally, as tenants of specific apartments and liable to Meyer for rents. It was his duty to collect; he did collect from Claude A. Wade but not from the Meyers. In this he was derelict in his trust and duty and made himself liable for the rental value of his tenements.

We find no error in the judgment of the trial court.

[3] Counsel for respondent asks that we impose damages as for a vexatious appeal. We decline to do that. The appellant appears to have acted in good faith, mistaken only as to his duty under the law and the facts.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

EADS v. STIFEL. (No. 16155.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Argued and Submitted May 10, 1920. Opinion Filed June 8, 1920.)

1. Contracts ⇐124—Employment to promote candidacy for presidential nomination and for national committeeman void.

Under Rev. St. 1909, § 4401, a contract whereby plaintiff was employed for $100 a week and expenses to devote his time and services and personal political influence to promote a candidacy for the Republican nomination for President, and the candidacy of defendant for Republican national committeeman for Missouri, was void as against public policy.

2. Contracts ⇐137(3)—Plaintiff cannot recover for legal services inextricably mingled with illegal.

Where legal items of services claimed by plaintiff and illegal items in promoting a candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination, and another for national committeeman for the state of Missouri, were so mingled that plaintiff could not separate them in his testimony by fixing the value for the legal services, plaintiff cannot recover for any of such services.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Wilson A. Taylor, Judge.

Action by Henry L. Eads against Otto F. Stifel. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John B. Denvir, of St. Louis, for appellant. Schnurmacher & Rassieur and John M. Goodwin, all of St. Louis, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. This is an action by plaintiff against defendant, the petition in two counts. In the first count it is averred that on or about February 1, 1912, a certain agreement was made and entered into by and between plaintiff and defendant to the following effect:

"Plaintiff was employed to devote his time and services to promoting the candidacy of Mr. William H. Taft for nomination as President of the United States (and of Mr. Otto F. Stifel for National Committeeman for Missouri), in the various Congressional Districts of Missouri, and for said time and services was to receive one hundred dollars ($100.00) per week, and the actual expenses incurred by him in carrying out the objects of his said employment."

Plaintiff states that he has duly performed all the conditions of the contract on his part to be performed, and rendered the services contracted to be performed as aforesaid, whereby the sum of $1400.00 is due him from defendant for salary for such services; that defendant has paid him the expenses incurred in pursuance of the terms of contract and on April 24th paid him the sum of $100.00, and on June 16th, 1912, the further sum of $50.00, leaving a balance due of $1250 for salary. Averring demand and failure and refusal to pay, plaintiff asks judgment for that amount.

The second count is on the same transaction but on quantum meruit.

The words in brackets were stricken out of both counts on motion.

A general denial was filed and the cause tried before a jury. At the close of plaintiff's evidence the court gave a peremptory instruction for defendant. Verdict and judgment went accordingly, from which latter plaintiff, filing a motion for new trial, has duly appealed.

The contract, as testified to by plaintiff, was to the effect that defendant said he would pay plaintiff $100.00 a week and his expenses, if he would go out and undertake the work such as he had laid out for him to do in this state; that is, use his personal influence in procuring delegates to the National Convention favorable to Mr. Taft; that plaintiff's acquaintance with every one of the districts, with the different chairmen, was just what he wanted and he wanted plaintiff to interest himself in the campaign, and plaintiff consented and told defendant he would go out and enter the work for a short time. On cross-examination plaintiff testified that the purpose for which Mr. Stifel employed him was to go around in the several counties where the counties were holding county conventions to elect delegates to the Congressional and State Conventions to see or use his influence to see that Taft delegates were elected in those counties and that ultimately the delegates sent to the convention would be for Taft. That was the ultimate result of his duty of going into each of the counties and getting men to work. Plaintiff testified that his long experience in politics in this state had given him an acquaintance throughout the state; that as he stated in his petition, his expenses had been paid. Plaintiff also testified that in connection with this work he had looked after the interest of defendant in securing delegates who would vote for him as National Committeeman. Plaintiff testified at great length as to his acquaintance throughout the state, and as to his services rendered under this contract; that he went into different parts of the state, saw different men who were prominent and active in politics and endeavored, used his acquaintance and influence, to secure delegates to the convention who were in favor of the nomination of Mr. Taft for President of the United States. Under cross-examination plaintiff was asked this question: "Mr. Stifel never asked you then for what consideration you would undertake this work, did he?" To which he answered, "I don't think so, for the reason I didn't want to undertake the work, but he said he would give me one hundred dollars if I would do that." Plaintiff was then asked, "What work," to which he answered, "Such work as he wanted me to undertake to do in the campaign, to go into the different counties, wherever he asked me to go and to work; first, to secure delegates for Taft and at the same time to secure influence for Mr. Stifel" for National Committeeman. Plaintiff further testified that when he went into a district, he would go to people whom he thought approachable and try to interest them in the candidacy of Mr. Taft; that he would ascertain who were likely to be delegates from the county conventions and whether they were for Taft, and if not, take such steps as he could to induce them to be for him; that was generally his line of work. Asked what part of his services in the case were rendered for contests which he had assisted in conducting before the National Committee, and what part was outside of that, he said that the services were so mingled together that he could not make a difference in charge or value of the services under the several accounts. It may be said here that the evidence showed that there were contests instituted before the National Committee and plaintiff, with another lawyer, was engaged to attend to them, for which he was paid by the National Committee; but his testimony was that included in those services was his employment by the defendant, for which he was charging.

Plaintiff produced a witness, who testified that he had some correspondence with defendant, to whom he had written about the condition of political affairs in his county, and in reply defendant wrote that he had plaintiff hired and that he (plaintiff) would be in the county if he could get there; that plaintiff would come on and help in the campaign in his county.

Beyond testimony of a lawyer as to having been employed by plaintiff to institute this action, but who had thrown up the employment, which testimony was introduced for the purpose of showing why action had been delayed, the petition having been filed January 31, 1917, this was all the testimony in the case.

Without setting out the evidence in detail it is sufficient to say that the substance of plaintiff's own testimony is, that he was hired to use his influence to secure delegates favorable to the candidate supported by defendant.

Our court, in Keating v. Hyde, 23 Mo. App. 555, held that a promise to pay for services rendered by another as a canvasser at a primary election to secure the promisor's nomination for an office, was unlawful and void. In that case, at page 559, the court quotes section 1474, Revised Statutes 1879, which is as follows:

"If any person shall, directly or indirectly, give or procure to be given, or engage to give any money, gift or reward, or any office, place or employment upon any engagement, contract or agreement, that the person to whom, or to whose use or on whose behalf, such gift or promise shall be made, shall, by himself or any other, procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person to any office, at any election by the electors, or any public body, under the constitution or laws of this state, the person so offending shall, on conviction, be adjudged guilty of bribery, and punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding five years."

This is section 3722, Revised Statutes, 1889; section 2090, Revised Statutes, 1899; and section 4401, Revised Statutes 1909.

Our court said, in Keating v. Hyde, supra, that this section had been in force since the revision of 1855, and that it is sufficient for the conclusion of our court, since it clearly indicates the policy of the state. The conclusion of our court in the Keating Case was, that the agreement was void as against public policy. That decision has been cited approvingly by law writers, as see notes to Exchange National Bank of Fitzgerald v. Henderson, 139 Ga. 260, 77 S. E. 86, in 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 551, and is amply supported by the decisions of courts of other states. These cases are so fully cited in the notes in 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) supra, and there commented upon that we do not think it necessary to reproduce them here. Among the cases sustaining this, is Trist v. Child, 21 Wall. 441, 22 L. Ed. 623, where the principle is recognized and it was there held that a contract to take charge of a claim before Congress, by personal solicitation by the agent, and others supposed to have personal influence in any way with members of Congress, to procure the passage of a bill—lobbying for its passage—was void.

Another case is that of Swayze v. Hull, 8 N. J. Law, 54, 14 Am. Dec. 399, in which it was held that a promissory note is void which was made in consideration that the promisee should give the promisor his interest in promoting his election to the office of sheriff, the note being payable after the election if the promisor was elected, and the court held that no recovery could be had upon it by the promisee against the promisor.

Another case is that of Wilcox v. Puryear, 12 Ky. Law Rep. 556, where it was held that a contract by which one agrees, for money or other personal profit, to use his efforts, influence, etc., to induce a majority of the voters at an election to vote for a particular candidate or for any proposition, as for a subscription by a city or county in aid of a railroad, is against public policy, and therefore void. See also King v. Raleigh & Pamlico Sound R. R. Co., 47 N. C. 263, 60 S. E. 1133, 125 Am. St. Rep. 546, 15 Ann. Cas. 40.

These are but a few of a multitude of cases to like effect.

[1] Our conclusion is, that under the public policy of our state, as announced in the decision of our court in Keating v. Hyde, supra, and under our statute, as here quoted, and under the great weight of authority in other states, the learned trial court was correct in directing a verdict for the defendant.

[2] It is true that some of the items of services claimed, as for instance those rendered before the contest committee of the National Convention may be legal charges, but plaintiff himself says that they are mixed with the other account in such a way that he cannot separate them and does not undertake to do so in fixing a value for his services to defendant. That being so, plaintiff cannot recover for any of them. As said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Meguire v. Corwine, 101 U. S. 108, loc. cit. 112 (25 L. Ed. 899), quoting from Trist v. Child, supra, 21 Wall. loc. cit. 452, 22 L. Ed. 623, and referring to the mingling of legitimate with illegitimate charges or claims:

"But where they are blended and confused with those which are forbidden, the whole is a unit and indivisible. That which is bad destroys that which is good, and they perish together. * * * The taint lies in the stipulation for pay. Where that exists, it affects fatally, in all its parts, the entire body of the contract. In all such cases, protior conditio defendantis."

While the second count is on quantum meruit, the services there depended on were of like character and under like contract of employment as in the first count and fall under like condemnation.

It follows that the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STATE BANK OF WILLOW SPRINGS v. ELGIN. (No. 2639.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 5, 1920.)

Venue §61—Failure to allow time to prepare application for change held error.

Where the court was insistent that a case should be tried at once and denied counsel's application for a few minutes time to prepare an application for change of venue, stating that such change of venue would be denied, the court's action was erroneous; defendant's application for time being made as soon as possible after obtaining information from his client.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Texas County; L. B. Woodside, Judge.

Action by the State Bank of Willow Springs against G. S. Elgin. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Lamar, Lamar & Lamar, of Houston, for appellant.

Barton & Impey, of Houston, and John C. Dyott, of Willow Springs, for respondent.

BRADLEY, J. The trial court declined to grant defendant a few minutes' time in which to prepare and file an affidavit and application for change of venue, and the correctness of that action is the only question here. Plaintiff in separate counts sued to recover on two promissory notes in which defendant was the named payee. He had sold the notes to plaintiff bank and had indorsed them over. The makers had not paid them, and plaintiff bank proceeded against defendant. Suit was filed returnable to the November term, 1918, of the circuit court. Defendant filed a motion to make the petition more definite and certain, alleging that the second count was indefinite in that defendant could not determine therefrom whether he was being sued as an indorser or guarantor. The motion was overruled, but the cause was continued, reason not stated, and plaintiff filed an amended petition endeavoring to meet the objections raised in the motion. This amended petition was filed on July 8, 1919, and at the August term thereafter defendant again filed his motion to make more definite and certain. The case appeared on the docket for the third day together with a number of other civil cases, 11 of which appeared on the docket ahead of this case. The criminal cases were set for the first two days. At the close of the second day the criminal docket was not disposed of, and none of the 11 cases appearing on the docket ahead of this case had been disposed of or called. On Tuesday night, the night of the second day of the term, defendant, an old man, who resides at Cabool, a town some few miles from the county seat, called his attorney and inquired if his case would be called for trial on the next day, Wednesday. His attorney advised him that in his judgment the case would not be reached, and also advised him of the condition of the docket and the pending motion.

On the next morning the court called the civil docket. When defendant's case was reached, the motion to make more definite and certain was taken up, argued, and overruled. When the motion was overruled, plaintiff's attorney stated that he desired a trial as soon as possible, and the court asked defendant's attorney if he was ready. Defendant's attorney thereupon advised the court of the conversation with his client the night before, and promised to have defendant present as soon as possible. Before defendant's attorney had time to communicate with his client, a case was called in which said attorney was engaged until noon. At the noon hour he called his client and advised him to come at once. Defendant arrived in the courtroom about the middle of the afternoon, and at that time his attorney was engaged in a trial. When the cause then on trial was finished, the court again called this case. Defendant's attorney stepped back in the courtroom to speak to his client. The court was insistent that this cause proceed, and stated that "defendant must go to trial," and defendant, sitting in the courtroom and seeing the situation, advised his attorney that he desired a change of venue on account of the bias and prejudice of the judge, and instructed his attorney accordingly. Defendant's attorney walked back in front of the bench and informed the court that his client desired to take a change of venue on account of the bias and prejudice of the judge, and knowledge thereof had come to defendant since reaching Houston, the county seat. Defendant's attorney therefore requested a few minutes' time to prepare the affidavit for such change. The court in reply stated:

"That he thought some good faith should go with such things, and that such a change of venue would be denied, or rather no time would be granted to prepare such papers, and told counsel for plaintiff to proceed with their case."

Defendant's attorney in his affidavit filed with the motion for new trial and considered in passing on the motion stated that his request for time to prepare said affidavit was in good faith, and in response to the request of his client, and that he had no reason to question the good faith of his client. Defendant in a similar affidavit stated that he was in good faith in asking for a change of venue. Defendant's affidavit also set up his defense, and states that it is meritorious. His attorney's affidavit states that from the statements made to him by defendant he believes that defendant has a good legal defense to the cause of action. When time was denied the court inquired of defendant's attorney if he desired a jury, and said attorney advised that he did not. The trial thereupon proceeded before the court. At the close defendant's attorney called the court's attention to the fact that no answer had been filed, and the court replied that if he had asked for time in which to file an answer it would have been granted.

Defendant urges that he has not been accorded a square deal, and insists that the cause be reversed and remanded. In Douglass v. White, 134 Mo. 228, 34 S. W. 867, the cause was reversed and remanded because the court refused to grant a change of venue to the plaintiffs. The cause was filed returnable to the March term, 1893. At that term the defendant appeared and filed a motion to require a cost bond, and this motion was sustained, a cost bond ordered filed in vacation, and the cause continued to the September term. Plaintiffs failed to file the cost bond, but on the second day of the September term, the day the cause was set down for hearing, defendant filed answer setting up a counterclaim. Plaintiffs then asked for a continuance, which was refused, whereupon plaintiffs asked leave to take a nonsuit, and defendant objected. The court advised plaintiffs that they could take a nonsuit as to the cause of action stated in their petition, but that the cause would stand for trial on defendant's counterclaim. Plaintiffs then declined to take a nonsuit, and asked leave to examine the answer and file reply, and said that they would go to trial if the court would give them until 1 o'clock of that day. This was just before the noon adjournment. At 1 o'clock plaintiffs' attorney in open court filed and passed to defendant's attorney an affidavit and application for a change of venue. The application being taken up, defendant objected to the granting of the change because no notice of the intended application had been given. The change of venue was denied, and the cause proceeded, resulting adversely to plaintiffs. Discussing the application in the Douglass Case, the Supreme Court said:

"The application in this case was filed immediately on the convening of court at 1 o'clock in the afternoon of the day, and at the hour that the cause was set down for hearing. The information and knowledge of the existence of the undue influence of defendant over the mind of the judge of the court and of the inhabitants of the county, as alleged in the application, was first obtained since the filing of plaintiff's reply to defendant's answer, just previous to the noon adjournment of the court on that day, so that it is seen that the filing of the application for the change of venue was made as soon as possible after the receipt of the information by plaintiff of the existence of the prejudices that rendered the judge of the court an improper person to hear and determine the matter of their right in this litigation."

In that case, as we see, the filing of the application was made by plaintiffs as soon as possible after obtaining the information upon which it was based. In the case at bar a request for time to prepare an application was made by defendant as soon as possible after obtaining the information upon which he proposed to base his application. The action of the court in the instant case was in fact tantamount to denying the change on application in due form, because the court stated "that such a change of venue would be denied." If defendant had in fact filed his application, the court, under the authority of Douglass v. White, supra, would have been compelled to grant it; and, if defendant was entitled under the law to the change, the court could not deprive him of that right by refusing to grant a few minutes time in which to prepare the application. In the Douglass Case the applicants for the change had stated that they would go to trial at 1 o'clock, and at that hour appeared with an application for change of venue, and had given no notice, and it was held error not to grant it. In the Douglass Case the court further said:

"While applications of this character in so far as the question as to whether their presentation is timely, or whether the notice of the intended filing of same is sufficient, or whether the application itself is sufficient as to substance and form, are addressed to the sound discretion of the court, when these questions are settled in the affirmative of the proposition, or when from the facts of the case they should have been so settled, the duty of the court in the premises is no longer discretionary, but imperative, and the change should go in favor of the litigant asking it as a matter of right, and not as a matter of favor or discretion."

We think that the learned trial court should have granted defendant a reasonable time in which to prepare and file his application, and to deny him this right was under the circumstances unjustifiable.

The cause should therefore be reversed and remanded; and it is so ordered.

CARROLL v. CLARKE. (No. 2659.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 5, 1920.)

Brokers §86(3) — Evidence held to show abandonment of sale, precluding compensation.

In a broker's action against the owner of land for compensation, evidence held to show a mutual termination and abandonment of the sale attempted under the contract shown in evidence, which was not the same as that pleaded, so that plaintiff could not recover.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Howell County; E. P. Dorris, Judge.

Action by William F. Carroll against M. B. Clarke. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William F. Carroll and T. J. Delaney, of Springfield, for appellant.

W. N. Evans, of West Plains, for respondent.

STURGIS, P. J. Appellant's abstract of the record does not set forth his petition on which this case was tried, but states that he sues for an amount due him for work and labor performed by him at defendant's request in procuring a purchaser for certain land owned by defendant, which amount defendant had agreed to pay. According to the petition the amount sued for was not to be due plaintiff on condition that he find and produce a purchaser for this land, but was due him for the labor and efforts in that respect. The evidence does not support the contract pleaded, but shows a contract, not to pay for the labor and services in finding a buyer, but an amount to be due only in case such labor and service was crowned with success.

The plaintiff's evidence is to the effect that defendant gave him the right to sell defendant's land at a fixed price per acre, and if plaintiff sold for more than that price he was to have the excess for his commission. We think the plaintiff will and does concede that under this contract defendant had a right to insist on a cash sale, and any variation therefrom, as to giving time on part of the purchase money and the terms on which such deferred payments would be granted, if at all, was wholly at defendant's pleasure. The plaintiff claims to have found a purchaser for defendant's land in one Davidson, but the trial court found from the evidence that such proposed purchaser and plaintiff were not willing to comply with the terms of payment which defendant was willing to grant. The commission claimed by plaintiff was part of the purchase money, and defendant had a right to insist that the commission be paid and accepted by plaintiff on such terms as would in no way interfere with or prejudice the deferred payments due defendant. The purchaser wanted deferred payments of most of the purchase money, including that going to plaintiff for his commission, secured by mortgage, and defendant was willing to do this only on condition that the part going to plaintiff be made in the nature of a second mortgage, and that defendant have a preference and first lien on the land for his part. The plaintiff was not willing to do this, and wanted his commission paid pro rata with the purchase money going to defendant. While plaintiff and defendant were trying to arrange this matter, the purchaser became dissatisfied, and the plaintiff, acting for himself and the purchaser, wrote defendant a letter calling the whole deal off, and consenting that the deed and other papers which had been placed in escrow be returned to the respective parties. This was done. The plaintiff later changed his mind, and then, conceding defendant's right to priority of payment, insisted on the deal being consummated. This, however, was too late, especially in view of the fact that the purchaser was no longer willing to consummate the deal.

The evidence shows a mutual termination and abandonment of the sale.

Such is the finding of the trial court, and, being supported by the evidence, the judgment is affirmed.

CHARLES RENFROW COMMISSION CO. v.
W. B. NORTHRUP CO. et al.
(No. 2604.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 5, 1920.)

Banks and banking ¶127—Bank held owner of draft.

A bank held to be the absolute owner, by purchase, of a draft.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Howell County; E. P. Dorris, Judge.

Action by the Charles Renfrow Commission Company against the W. B. Northrup Company, wherein the Midland National Bank interpleaded. From judgment for plaintiff, the interpleader appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the interpleader.

M. E. Morrow, of West Plains, for appellant.

Green & Green, of West Plains, for respondent.

BRADLEY, J. This action was commenced by attachment against defendant W. B. Northrup Company, a nonresident. Chas. Renfrow Commission Company was the trade-name adopted by Chas. Renfrow, the plaintiff. The Midland National Bank is interpleader, and the cause here is on the interplea. Plaintiff's petition against the defendant was in two counts, the first asking $195.60 in damages for defendant's alleged failure to properly pack a shipment of potatoes in 1917; the second count asked $106.30 on the same grounds on a shipment of potatoes in 1918. In February, 1919, plaintiff whose place of business is at West Plains, Mo., ordered a car of merchandise, kind not stated, from defendant of Minneapolis, Minn. The car was shipped to plaintiff, and a draft drawn on plaintiff by defendant, payable to the Market State Bank of Minneapolis, for the net sum of $608.91, was attached to the bill of lading, and deposited in the said Market State Bank to the credit of defendant. The Market State Bank indorsed and delivered said draft and bill of lading to the Midland National Bank, the interpleader, and this bank in turn gave the said Market State Bank credit for the amount of the draft. The interpleader, Midland National Bank, sent the draft with the bill of lading attached to the First National Bank of West Plains for collection. The draft was presented to plaintiff, and he paid it. Immediately after paying said draft and receiving it and the bill of lading, plaintiff attached $400 of the proceeds of said draft in the hands of the First National Bank of West Plains as the property of the defendant W. B. Northrup Company. The Midland National Bank of Minneapolis filed an interplea, claiming the absolute ownership of the draft and likewise of the proceeds. The cause was tried to a jury, and the verdict and judgment went against the interpleader, and it appealed.

Interpleader requested a directed verdict in its favor, and this request was refused. The correctness of this ruling is, we think, the only matter for determination. The cashier of the Market State Bank, the payee named in the draft, testified by deposition that his bank bought the draft from W. B. Northrup Co., and paid this company $608.91 by deposit to their account. That the draft was deposited on February 17, 1919, and that on same date his bank sold the draft to the Midland National Bank, the interpleader, and received for it $608.91 by way of credit to his bank. This witness stated that he had no knowledge of any transactions or correspondence between plaintiff and defendant. The cashier of the interpleader bank testified by deposition that interpleader purchased the draft on February 17, 1919, from the Market State Bank for the sum of $608.91. That the interpleader bank had no arrangement with the Midland State Bank to charge back this draft, or any other, any further than as indorser. That the draft in question here was indorsed. That his bank handled a great many drafts for the Midland State Bank. "When I place them to their credit they have the right to check out the money on such credit until one comes back unpaid, and then I charge it back to them."

The cashier of the First National Bank of West Plains testified that his bank received the draft and bill of lading from the interpleader bank, and that notice was given plaintiff, and that plaintiff paid the draft, and that the draft and bill of lading were delivered to him; that he remitted to the interpleader all except the $400 attached. Defendant put in no evidence, except by a banker in West Plains, who testified as to the general custom of banks in taking drafts. This witness stated that if the drawer was insolvent banks did not generally give such drawer credit for a draft drawn until it was paid, and that in any event if the draft was not paid it was charged back to the drawer.

The court instructed that the burden of proof was on the interpleader, and that before said interpleader would be entitled to recover it must show by the greater weight of the evidence that at the time of the levy of the attachment it was the absolute owner of the property in question. This instruction states a correct proposition, but there is absolutely no evidence in this record tending to show that the interpleader was not the absolute owner. All the evidence is that interpleader was the absolute owner, and nothing to the contrary. It is wholly unnecessary to enter into an extended discussion of the law applicable here. We think it sufficient to say that under the authority of Ayres v. Bank, 79 Mo. 421, 49 Am. Rep. 235; Flannery v. Coates, 80 Mo. 444, Hendley v. Refining Co., 106 Mo. App. 20, 79 S. W. 1163; Bank v. Milling Co., 163 Mo. App. 135, 145 S. W. 508; Haas v. Fruit Co., 136 S. W. 676, and under the evidence disclosed by this record, the court should have directed a verdict. The cause is reversed and remanded, with directions to enter judgment for interpleader in accordance with the prayer of the interplea.

TERRY v. ADAMS-HICKS ZINC & LEAD CORPORATION. (No. 2515.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 5, 1920.)

Sales §439—Burden to prove breach of warranty set up as counterclaim on defendant.

In action by assignee on account for shells sold, wherein defendant buyer counterclaimed for breach of warranty that shells would crush a certain number of tons of rock, burden to prove such breach of warranty was on defendant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; Joseph D. Perkins, Judge.

Action by M. C. Terry against the Adams-Hicks Zinc & Lead Corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Grover C. James, of Joplin, for appellant.

McReynolds & McReynolds and John H. Flanigan, all of Carthage, for respondent.

STURGIS, P. J. The defendant is appellant, and its one assignment of error is that the court erroneously gave an instruction placing on it the burden of proof as to its counterclaim or claim for recoupment. The plaintiff, as assignee, sued on an account for goods and merchandise sold to defendant. The merchandise sold to defendant consisted for the most part of what are termed shells used in the defendant's mining plant as part of the machinery for crushing mineral-bearing rock. The defendant in its answer, by way of counterclaim or recoupment, alleged that these shells were sold to defendant under a warranty that such shells would each crush not less than a specified number of tons of rock, and agreeing to make reductions in the price in proportion to any failure in that respect. At the trial the defendant admitted the purchase of the shells and the correctness of plaintiff's account, less a small deduction, amounting to $1,580.41, subject to the verdict of the jury on the recoupment claim. The jury found for plaintiff for such amount, plus interest, and against the defendant on its counterclaim.

The evidence was sharply contradictory as to whether or not the agent selling those rolls made the warranty in question. Such agent testified that he made no representation or warranty as to the rolls crushing any particular amount of rock, but only that same were well made, of good material, and would do as good work as other similar shells. There was no breach claimed of the latter warranty, and the court, by the instruction complained of, told the jury that the burden of proof was on defendant to prove that the Central Foundry Company, plaintiff's assignor of this account, warranted that the shells sold to defendant would each crush the quantity of rock as claimed by defendant.

The defendant states his position to be that, while the burden of proof was on defendant to show a warranty, yet, since plaintiff admitted that a warranty had been made, and only the character of the warranty was in question, this put the burden of proof back on plaintiff. This, however, is not, we think, a correct statement of either the law or the facts. As to this counterclaim there could not be any shifting back to plaintiff of the burden of proof, since such burden was on defendant in the beginning. The only case cited by defendant in support of his position as to the burden being on plaintiff is that of Roth v. Continental Wire Co., 94 Mo. App. 236, 68 S. W. 594. That case holds no more than that, if a plaintiff sues on a contract, alleging its terms, which are that plaintiff sold defendant a particular kind or quality of merchandise, and alleges that he furnished merchandise of that kind and quality, the burden is on him to so prove. In that case the plaintiff's petition alleged that he had sold certain machines for making nails by sample, and agreed to furnish machines of like kind and quality, and alleged that he had done so. "In this condition of the pleadings," the court said that it was not sufficient for plaintiff to merely prove that he had furnished "the number of machines called for by the contract," but must show that same were of the kind and quality the contract sued on required. The court, however, there held (syllabus):

"If the purchaser defends a suit for the purchase price for certain machines sold by sample, that they were not as warranted, the burden of proof is not on the party buying to prove that the machines were not as good and did not work as well as the sample."

In the present case plaintiff does not set out and sue on a contract by which he agreed to sell defendant certain shells capable of and which would crush 10,000 tons or some such amount of rock. He denies such contract, and instead of admitting in his petition that such was the contract, defendant so asserts by way of foundation for its counterclaim, and plaintiff denies it. The counterclaim became in reality an independent suit by defendant against plaintiff, and certainly the defendant must prove his cause of action, or such part of it as is not admitted, in order to recover. In Ingersoll v. Bond, 184 S. W. 903, the plaintiff sued for the price of a horse sold to defendant. The defense was that the plaintiff had warranted the horse to be sound, and that he was not so. The plaintiff admitted at the trial that he warranted the horse to be sound. The court held, however, that the burden of proof as to the breach of the warranty was on defendant. These cases are cited and support that ruling: Branson v. Turner, 77 Mo. 489, 495; Garvey v. Hauck, 85 Mo. App. 14; Roth v. Continental Wire Co., 94 Mo. App. 236, 270, 68 S. W. 594; Burns v. Nichols, 89 Ill. 480; Hoffman v. Hampton School Dist., 96 Iowa, 319, 65 N. W. 322; Keystone Co. v. Forsyth, 123 Mich. 626, 82 N. W. 521; Wallace v. Douglas, 58 W. Va. 102, 51 S. E. 869.

The judgment is affirmed.

BAUERDORF v. FISHER. (No. 2557.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 5, 1920.)

1. Sales \S 348(1)—Set-off by buyer for distribution of samples cannot extend to samples of another firm.

Where wholesalers contracted to sell wall paper to defendant, who made up sample books of their paper and also of the paper of another concern to send to his customers, and such wholesalers broke their contract by failing to deliver, defendant cannot recover on set-off for a loss sustained in making and distributing sample books made up of samples from the other concern, in such wholesaler's action for paper sold.

2. Sales \S 359(1)—Buyer must show difference between freight, if shipped as per contract, and cost as it was shipped.

In a seller's action against a buyer for the price of goods, defendant under its set-off should show with certainty the difference between the freight he would have paid, had this shipment been made in carload lots as per contract, and what it actually cost him coming in smaller shipments.

Error to Circuit Court, Jasper County; J. D. Perkins, Judge.

Suit by Charles R. Bauerdorf, trustee for Frederick Beck & Co., bankrupts, against H. B. Fisher. Judgment for plaintiff for the difference between his claim and defendant's counterclaim, and, plaintiff's motion for new trial being overruled, he brings error. Reversed and remanded.

R. M. Sheppard, of Kansas City, for plaintiff in error.

Pearson & Butts and John L. McNatt, all of Joplin, for defendant in error.

BRADLEY, J. Plaintiff, as trustee for Frederick Beck & Co., bankrupt, brought this suit to recover $1,299.40 on account for wall paper sold defendant. Beck & Co. was a wholesale dealer in New York, and defendant was a wholesale and retail dealer in wall paper in Joplin, Mo. The answer pleads an equitable set-off, based on the alleged failure of Beck & Co. to ship the order in full and on time, and alleged damages sustained in making and distributing sample books, and for freight paid in excess of what would have been required, had Beck & Co. shipped defendant's order in carload lots. Defendant alleges that on September 14, 1915, he bought from Beck & Co. certain wall paper, and that Beck & Co. agreed to ship in carload lots not later than January 1, 1916, and also agreed to ship on or before November 15, 1915, two rolls of each pattern ordered to be used in making sample books; that Beck & Co. failed to ship in carload lots, but shipped by local freight and at a time long after it agreed to ship, and did not ship but half of the order; that defendant had made his sample books from the order from Beck & Co., and had distributed them among his customers, and that the failure of Beck & Co. to ship as agreed caused defendant to lose the outlay in making and distributing the sample books, and to lose his customers and their business. Beck & Co. was adjudged a bankrupt March 9, 1916, and defendant was notified of this fact by letter under date of March 29th. Defendant alleged the insolvency of Beck & Co. in addition to the other allegations mentioned. He asked for $3,000 damages.

The cause was tried before the court, and resulted in a finding for plaintiff for $1,- 299.40, and for defendant on his counterclaim in the sum of $752, leaving a balance in favor of plaintiff of $547.40, which, with interest, amounted to $653.93, and for this sum judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff. Deeming this amount inadequate, plaintiff moved for a new trial, and, being unsuccessful, brings the cause here by writ of error.

The evidence shows that defendant received the paper in due time for his sample books, from which he made up two varieties, and distributed these books among his customers and prospective customers. It is also shown that defendant was a customer of a wholesale wall paper dealer of Illinois, and that he made three varieties of sample books, displaying the wall papers of this concern, and likewise and at the same time distributed these among his customers and prospective customers. The total cost of making the five varieties of sample books was $500, and the total cost of distributing was $180. These two items account for $680 of what the court allowed defendant, and just what the remaining $72 is for does not clearly appear in the record. Plaintiff trustee says in his brief that the $72 was for alleged excess freight. Beck & Co. shipped about half of defendant's order February 1, 1916, and defendant contends that, had Beck & Co. shipped his order in full as agreed, he would have had in stock any order received from a customer ordering from either of the two Beck & Co. sample books, but that Beck & Co. did not ship when they agreed, and did not ship but half of his order, and in some instances incomplete patterns, and that he was therefore unable in some instances to fill orders made from the Beck & Co. sample books.

The trial court sustained objections to evidence attempting to show what defendant was damaged by reason of alleged loss of profits generally, on the ground that such was too speculative and indefinite. Plaintiff trustee concedes that defendant should recover for two-fifths of the amount expended in making and distributing sample books, but urges that he should not be liable for more. Defendant contends that he should recover for the total expense of making and distributing the books and for excess freight. It appears that in distributing the sample books, one of each set was left with each customer; that is, five books were left, two displaying Beck & Co. paper, and three the paper of the Illinois company. According to defendant, the expense of making and distributing the sample books was a total loss. Defendant testified:

"We only received about half of our nice goods, and could not fill the main part of our orders. We would write them, telling them what pattern we could not show and could not fill, and tell them to tear these out of the sample books. He sometimes had another selection made by his customer there, and sometimes they didn't follow instructions, and the mistake was made there. Finally this contractor would discontinue our books, and took Kansas City or Chicago books. Before the season was over, that was the outcome with practically all our customers. In this list of 30 which I have, I know these were all my customers. Q. How many of these were you able to retain after you had ordered your sample books? A. We had been several years in working up this line of customers—The Court: He asked you about those 30 men. A. We lost them all in the one year. I know of no other reason for losing them. We had been holding them before, gradually adding to them; building them up. We have been able to get back only 2 of them."

[1] The trial court evidently found that because of the dissatisfaction created among defendant's customers, due to confusion and failure to fill their orders, they sought other dealers, and that defendant's sample books availed him nothing, and there was evidence to support this conclusion. The amount defendant was out for making and distributing the sample books was definite. There was no speculation as to that. But another feature intervenes here. Can it be said that the loss for making and distributing the sample books carrying samples of the Illinois concern, was fairly within the reasonable contemplation of the parties when defendant entered into the contract ordering the wall paper? Can it be said that the damages resulting from the loss sustained by realizing no returns from the Illinois concern's sample books were fairly and reasonably within the contemplation of the parties as damages likely to follow a breach of the contract by Beck & Co? The leading case in the question here presented is Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 356, which is followed by the courts of our own state and by most of the American courts. In that case the rule is announced as follows:

"Where two parties have made a contract, which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally—i. e., according to the usual course of things—from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract, which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated. But, on the other hand, if these special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he, at the most, could only be supposed to have had in his contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances, from such a breach of contract; for, had the special circumstances been known, the parties might have specially provided for the breach of contract by special terms as to the damages in that case, and of this advantage it would be very unjust to deprive them."

See Mark v. Cooperage Co., 204 Mo. loc. cit. 285, 103 S. W. 20; Martin v. Lumber Co., 167 Mo. App. 381, 151 S. W. 984.

There is no evidence that Beck & Co. had any knowledge that defendant was dealing with the Illinois concern, or any other concern. It would therefore be unreasonable to say that loss sustained by defendant on account of making and distributing the sample books of the Illinois concern was fairly and reasonably within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. The special circumstance that defendant dealt with some other wall paper company, and made and distributed sample books from its samples, was "wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract," and Beck & Co., "at most, could only be supposed to have had in contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally" from a breach of the contract. It seems clear that defendant cannot recover on his set-off for the loss sustained in making and distributing the sample books made up of samples from the Illinois concern, and we so rule.

[2] Defendant ought to recover for the loss he sustained in making and distributing the sample books of Beck & Co. There can be, and is, no question as to that; and this amount is two-fifths of $680. Defendant should also recover for excess freight, but the record here is too indefinite and uncertain to support any finding on the freight item. On a retrial defendant should show with some degree of certainty the difference between the freight he would have paid, had his shipment been made in carload lots, and what he paid by reason of Beck & Co. failing to ship in carload lots as it agreed to do. There is nothing left about which there should be any controversy, except the freight item.

The cause is reversed and remanded.

BECK v. COFFEEN. (No. 2684.)

(Springfield Court. of Appeals. Missouri.
June 5, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1062.—Verdict on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where evidence was sharply conflicting, verdict is conclusive.

2. New trial \Leftrightarrow 102(1)—Failure of defendant to produce testimony which he could have produced not ground for new trial.

In an action for balance of purchase price of land, defendant, who asserted that the full price had been paid, is not entitled to new trial on production of depositions of a woman and her children in corroboration of his statement, where they were living with defendant at the time the alleged contract was executed, and defendant married the woman only shortly before trial.

Error to Circuit Court, Douglas County; Fred Stewart, Judge.

Action by Leonard Beck against Ben Coffeen. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jos. V. Pitts, of Ava, for plaintiff in error.
J. S. Clarke, of Ava, for defendant in error.

BRADLEY, J. Defendant in error, plaintiff below, sold some land in Douglas county to plaintiff in error, defendant below, and this cause is to recover $200, with interest, as an alleged balance due on the purchase price. For convenience we will refer to the parties as styled below. Plaintiff, Beck, alleged in his petition that on January 1, 1917, he sold and transferred to defendant by warranty deed certain land, describing it; that the agreed consideration was $1,000, and that defendant paid him $800 in cash, and promised to pay the balance, but had failed and refused to do so. He asked judgment for the $200, with interest, and prayed that said judgment be made a special lien upon the land for the purchase price. Defendant admitted the purchase of the land, but alleged that the recited consideration in the deed was $2,000, but in truth and in fact the consideration was but $800, and that he had fully paid that price. The cause was tried to a jury, and verdict and judgment went for plaintiff for the amount sued for, and defendant brings the cause here by writ of error.

[1] Plaintiff testified that the consideration was $1,000, and that defendant offered to give a mortgage on the land to secure the balance, but that he (plaintiff) told defendant that his (defendant's) word was good enough without a mortgage, and that defendant agreed to pay the balance in June after the sale. Plaintiff introduced two other witnesses, but they did not corroborate him very much. Defendant testified that the consideration was but $800, and that he had paid that amount, and the evidence of the two witnesses introduced by plaintiff tended somewhat to corroborate defendant. Defendant also introduced other witnesses, who in some minor particulars corroborated his version. The only evidence, however, going directly to the issue, was that of plaintiff and defendant, and the jury's verdict settled the issue of fact.

[2] In his motion for a new trial defendant complains that the verdict is against the evidence, and that he was unable to present at the trial certain material evidence, and sets out in substance what this evidence would be. At the hearing on the motion defendant offered in support thereof the deposition of the witnesses, whose evidence he says he was unable to have at the trial. These depositions are those of a woman and two of her children, who were living with defendant in Douglas county at the time of the sale, and they corroborate defendant as to the consideration he was to pay. But defendant does not claim that this was newly discovered evidence. He could hardly make this claim, however, since these witnesses were of his own household at the time he made the deal, and he does not claim that he did not know of their evidence. He made no effort to secure a continuance, but went to trial with full knowledge of the facts. Defendant was living in Iowa at the time of the trial, and so were the witnesses whose depositions he offered in support of his motion. It also appears that the woman, whose deposition was offered, and defendant, were married in Iowa on September 3, 1918, a few days before the trial. In this situation the trial court committed no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff files here a motion to dismiss defendant's writ for failure to give notice required by section 2071, R. S. 1909, and defendant files his excuse for failing to give the notice; but, in view of our conclusion on the merits, it is not necessary to go into the motion and the excuse offered.

The judgment below is affirmed.

STURGIS, P. J., and FARRINGTON, J., concur.

JOHNS v. JOHNS. (No. 16133.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Submitted on Briefs May 7, 1920. Opinion Filed June 8, 1920.)

1. Husband and wife \S 278(1), 279(3)—Parties may contract as to separation and settlement of property rights; reconciliation avoids contract.

There may be a valid contract of separation and settlement of property rights between husband and wife, but a reconciliation will avoid and annul such contract.

2. Husband and wife \S 278(2)—Contract for future separation contrary to public policy.

While agreement for separation and settlement of property rights, when fair and reasonable, will be upheld by the courts, such agreements between spouses living together amicably without a present intention to separate are against public policy and invalid.

3. Husband and wife \S 279(3)—Separation agreement valid, though spouses continued to live in the same dwelling for about a week.

A separation agreement whereby the wife received $700 cash and the household furnishings in lieu of all alimony and maintenance is valid and cannot be attacked by the wife because the spouses continued to live in same house together for a few days and occupied the same bed, pending the removal of each to different quarters; the intention to separate appearing never to have been changed.

4. Husband and wife \S 279(2)—Before woman can receive alimony she must tender amounts received under separation agreement.

Before a woman seeking divorce and alimony can have separation agreement which provided for settlement of property rights set aside and receive alimony, she must tender the amount received under the separation agreement; for such is the requirement of statute, and divorce actions are wholly statutory.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court, Vital W. Garesche, Judge.

Action for divorce by Sadie Johns against George W. Johns. From so much of the decree of divorce as refused to allow alimony and suit money, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Ryan and Kinealy & Kinealy, all of St. Louis, for appellant.

William Hilkerbaumer and Edward J. Monti, both of St. Louis, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. Plaintiff brought her action for divorce against the defendant, on the ground of desertion continued for a period of more than one year next prior to the filing of the petition, which was on March 18, 1917. The date of the desertion is given as September 25, 1914, and alleged to have been without cause. Stating that the defendant is an able-bodied man and earns good wages, plaintiff prays alimony and suit money pending the suit and a reasonable sum by way of permanent alimony in the final decree.

The answer, after a general denial, sets up that on September 18, 1914, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement under which plaintiff received and accepted the sum of $700 in cash, and other good and valuable considerations, in lieu of all claims for alimony and maintenance which had accrued or which might accrue in future. A general denial by way of reply was filed.

Hearing the cause the court awarded a divorce to plaintiff but refused to allow any alimony or suit money. Plaintiff thereupon filed a motion for new trial, attacking so much of the decree as refused to allow alimony and suit money. This being overruled, plaintiff has appealed.

The right to the divorce is not contested.

The sole question here involved is as to the action of the trial court in refusing to allow alimony, etc.

It appeared that the parties were married on March 31, 1914, and separated on September 25, 1914. A separation had been contemplated, at least by defendant, some little time prior to that date, and on September 18, 1914, they entered into an agreement of separation. It is recited in this agreement that the—

"parties find it impossible to live peaceably together as husband and wife. It is therefore hereby agreed by and between them that they will for the future live separate and apart from each other. It is further agreed that the said Sadie Johns shall have of the personal property owned by the said parties, one parlor suit, one dining room set, one bedroom set and all kitchen furniture now located in premises known as 1425 North Newstead avenue. It is further agreed that the said George W. Johns will pay any and all obligations now due on aforesaid furniture. It is further agreed that the said George W. Johns will pay unto the said Sadie Johns seven hundred ($700.00) dollars in lieu of all alimony and maintenance. It is further agreed that neither of said parties shall have any present or further interest of any kind in the real estate belonging to the other party; and, if either shall sell any of his or her real estate, the other will, on request, unite in a deed of conveyance therefor, relinquishing his or her prospective right of curtesy or dower in such real estate. It is further agreed that if either of said parties shall hereafter institute divorce proceedings against the other, or prosecute any suit, it shall not vary the property rights of either of said parties."

This was signed by the parties.

Plaintiff testified that a short time prior to September 25th defendant became angry with her and said that they would break up housekeeping and sell the house, which he did, and plaintiff was compelled to vacate the house because it had been sold and rented; that she had since often asked defendant to live with her, and that her mother and friends had done the same, but he refused; that defendant earned $85 a month. Prior to this dispute there had been no serious differences between them. Plaintiff also testified that she joined in the deed to the property; that she was compelled to do so or get out and get nothing; that she received the $700 mentioned in the agreement and part of the furniture; that the real estate sold for $1,800. This was the only property that she knew of that her husband owned. She had been married previously. When this agreement between them was made and signed they were living together and continued to do so until September 25th, of the same year, when she moved away. Between the 18th and 25th of September they lived together as they had prior to that time. Within four or five days after the agreement was signed plaintiff left the house because the purchaser had rented it and the party to whom it was rented wanted to move in. She testified that they signed the agreement on September 18th and that she knew she was compelled to get out of the house because it was rented, and that she and her husband maintained marital relations after the contract was signed, that is until she left on September 25th. Defendant denied this and stated that while they had lived together in the same house, and in the same room, they had had no marital relations between the 18th and 25th of September and for some time prior to that.

Defendant, called as a witness by plaintiff, testified that he is a watchman at a bank and had been employed there for about eighteen years; that his salary is about $85 a month. On September 18, 1914, he owned a cottage on Newstead avenue in the city of St. Louis, which he then sold for $1,800, and has no personal property left except his wearing apparel. Defendant identified his signature to the agreement and stated that it was executed September 18th. He testified that at the time this agreement was executed the house was all furnished; that he had put $247 worth of furniture in it, which was some of the furniture mentioned in the agreement; that he delivered possession of the furniture mentioned to plaintiff and paid her the $700 mentioned in the contract. After the agreement was signed and up to the time they separated, they ate at the same table and slept in the same bed. Plaintiff commenced getting ready to move as soon as the paper was signed. She got out of the house on September 24th. Plaintiff read the agreement in the presence of witnesses before she signed it and said it was satisfactory; that while they had occupied the premises and the same room and bed they had no marital relations and had not had for quite a while before the agreement was signed.

It appears that this agreement was acknowledged before a notary public, who testified that he had asked plaintiff if it was her free act and deed, and she said it was. This is substantially the evidence in the case.

[1-3] As held by our Supreme Court in Rice, Stix & Co. v. Sally, 176 Mo. 107, 75 S. W. 398, and O'Day v. Meadows, 194 Mo. 588, loc. cit. 614, 92 S. W. 637, 112 Am. St. Rep. 542, the validity of the contract between plaintiff and defendant, then husband and wife, is no longer an open question in our state. So the Kansas City Court of Appeals said in Fisher v. Clopton, Adm'r, etc., 110 Mo. App. 663, 85 S. W. 623. It was further said in that case (110 Mo. App. loc. cit. 667, 85 S. W. 623), following Roberts v. Hardy, 89 Mo. App. 86, that there may be a valid contract of separation and settlement of property rights between husband and wife, but that a reconciliation would avoid and annul such contract.

In Spelser v. Spelser, 188 Mo. App. 328, 175 S. W. 122, it was held that agreements for separation and for settlement of property interest between a discordant husband and wife, when fair and reasonable are upheld by the courts, if made in prospect of an immediate separation; but that such agreements between parties living together amicably and without a present intention to separate, are held to be against public policy and void, since they have a tendency to promote separation and divorce. It was further held in that case that the destitute wife was entitled to suit money as a means of defending her husband's suit; but that was so held on the ground that the agreement there considered had been fraudulently obtained and was invalid because not made, as falsely stated on its face, pursuant to the separation of the parties or in contemplation of an immediate separation, but at a time when they were living together with the avowed intention of continuing to live together as husband and wife and because the contract was not fair and reasonable and undertook to divest the wife of all interest in her husband's property, of the value of $5,000, without giving her a penny in return, even the nominal consideration of $1 not having been paid. That case is cited by learned counsel for appellant in support of the contention that these parties lived together as husband and wife after the agreement had been entered into. They further cite in support of that contention Roberts v. Hardy, supra, and Harrison v. Harrison, a decision by the Kansas City Court of Appeals, not yet officially reported but see 211 S. W. 708. In all these cases the facts negated the idea of an actual separation or intent to do so. In the latter case especially, it appeared that after entering into the agreement of separation the parties had resumed marital relations, and that the defendant in the case had returned to plaintiff and they resumed their marital relations, so that the cause which led to the separation ceased and it followed that the property which the husband had released to the wife, by his course of conduct through seven years in letting her continue to manage and dispose of it as her own, had thereby become hers as by a gift or voluntary settlement. None of these cases meet the facts here. In the one at bar we do not think that the few days that these parties continued to occupy the same house after the signing of the agreement, at all affects the validity of the contract made between them. Their intention to separate was never changed. Such occupancy was with no intention of resuming or continuing the marital relations, but was occasioned by the immediate and unavoidable circumstances attendant at the sale of the property and procuring of a new residence for each of them. In other words, they had not in any manner whatever resumed their marital relations with the intention of becoming reconciled to each other, and the five or six days that elapsed between the execution of the contract and the actual separation which, according to the petition and testimony of plaintiff, occurred September 25th, in no manner whatever disturbed, vitiated or avoided the contract.

[4] Another obstacle to plaintiff's right to recover alimony, etc., is to be found in the action of the plaintiff in not offering to return the money and property she received. We have stated the substance of the petition. No such offer is there made.

In a very thorough and learned consideration of the status of divorce actions under our statutes, Judge Ellison, speaking for the Kansas City Court of Appeals in Gilsey v. Gilsey, 198 Mo. App. 505, 201 S. W. 588, held that where the wife entered into a contract of settlement and separation in which all money and property rights and obligations were adjusted in consideration of the husband paying her a certain sum of money, she cannot then bring an action for divorce and alimony and seek to repudiate the contract without tendering back the sum received by her under the contract, holding that the action under the statutes for divorce, where there has been a valid marriage, is not an action in equity under our statute although formerly it was within the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts. We have no such courts. "Jurisdiction in our courts," says Judge Ellison, "is dependent upon the statute and the action may be said to be statutory," and that "where a tender is requisite in maintaining a cause of action and none is pleaded, judgment may be rendered on the pleading." That is this case. Plaintiff makes no offer whatever to return the money which she received or the property which was turned over to her or any part of it. She is not entitled, therefore, to award of alimony or suit money in this case.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

CRAIN v. McKINLEY. (No. 2574.)(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 5, 1920.)1. Appeal and error ⇨994(2) — Appellate court cannot interfere with judgment of jury as to credibility of witnesses.

The jury was the judge of weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses; and, if there were facts and circumstances in evidence which justified jury in disbelieving plaintiff, it was their right and province to do so, and the appellate court cannot interfere.

2. Evidence ⇨589—Jury cannot find contrary to evidence arbitrarily.

Where plaintiff made a prima facie case, defendant cannot rely to sustain verdict for him entirely on the proposition that the verdict must stand, merely because the jury chose to disbelieve plaintiff; a jury must have some reason other than arbitrary choice to find contrary to evidence.

3. Brokers ⇨88(1)—Case for jury in view of evidence making prima facie case and tending to impeach.

In action for commission on loans and abstracts made by defendant, case held for jury under evidence making a prima facie case for plaintiff and evidence tending to impeach him as a witness.

4. Trial ⇨236(1) — Instruction jury might consider witness' "character" as bearing on credibility not erroneous.

In action for commission on loans and abstracts made by defendant, instruction jury were judges of credibility of witnesses and weight to be given their testimony, and that in determining weight of testimony of a witness the jury might consider his character for truth, veracity, or morality, if shown by evidence, held not erroneous, because not using "reputation" instead of "character."

5. New trial ⇨104(1)—Refusal for cumulative newly discovered evidence proper.

Where alleged newly discovered evidence was merely cumulative, it was not error to refuse to grant new trial on its account.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1003—Court cannot interfere with verdict as against weight of evidence.

The Court of Appeals cannot interfere with a verdict merely because it thinks it contrary to the weight of the evidence.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Texas County;
L. B. Woodside, Judge.

Suit by I. Harry Crain against D. P. McKinley. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Barton & Impey, of Houston, for appellant.
Lamar, Lamar & Lamar, of Houston, for respondent.

BRADLEY, J. Plaintiff sued in a justice of the peace court to recover $158.40, claimed to be due him from defendant as commission on some loans and abstracts made by defendant. Plaintiff recovered in the justice court, but on appeal to the circuit court defendant prevailed, and plaintiff appealed.

Defendant was a loan agent, and seems also to have been doing some abstract business. Plaintiff was engaged in the real estate business. Plaintiff claimed that he had an agreement with defendant by which he was to have 50 per cent. of the commission on any loan he procured for defendant, and 20 per cent. of any abstract fee procured for defendant. He claimed that he procured and caused certain loan applicants to go to defendant, to whom defendant made loans, and that of the commission received by defendant on these loans he (plaintiff) was entitled under his agreement to $151.50. Under the agreement concerning abstracts plaintiff claimed $18.40. He credited his account with $11.50 for abstract work for himself, leaving a balance alleged to be due of $158.40.

Plaintiff testified positively to his alleged agreement and to each item in his account, and was corroborated by other witnesses. Defendant was not present at the trial, and there was no evidence offered on his behalf, except some evidence tending to impeach plaintiff. Defendant had lived in Texas county about 10 years, except for a few months prior to the trial. T. J. Hale, who had held the office of probate judge, testified that the general reputation of defendant for morality in that community was not good. W. W. Day, in the creamery business, testified that plaintiff's general reputation in that community for truth, veracity, and morality had not been good as far as he had heard. Jack McCaskill testified that he had lived in Houston for 16 years, and that he had been acquainted with plaintiff 4 or 5 years.

"Q. Are you acquainted with his (plaintiff's) general reputation here in Houston among the people that know him as to truth and veracity and morality? A. I don't know as I could say as to the truth absolutely, but as to the rest of it I think I am acquainted with it. Q. What is it, good or bad? A. I wouldn't consider it good. I don't think I ever heard the question of his truthfulness discussed, but the rest of it I have heard plenty said about it."

Taylor Wilson testified that he did not know much about plaintiff's general reputation for morality, but that the people said it wasn't extra good; that he never heard plaintiff's reputation for truth questioned. Plaintiff on cross-examination admitted:

"I have been convicted of a felony in this court. I was never convicted of crime until I came to Texas county. Since I came here I have been convicted about twice, here and in Dent county."

Plaintiff made no objection to the character of questions eliciting evidence as to general reputation for truth and morality, nor did he make any objections as to the answers given. At the close of the case the court of its own motion gave this instruction:

"The jury are the judges of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight and value they will give to their testimony. In determining the weight you will give to the testimony of a witness you may take into consideration the character of such witness for truth and veracity, or morality, if shown by the evidence."

With his motion for a new trial plaintiff filed the affidavit of one Henry Britton, in which affidavit affiant stated that the defendant, McKinley, told affiant:

"That he (McKinley) owed plaintiff one hundred and fifty odd dollars, that plaintiff was about to sue him, and he would have to get some money from the bank, and it would be necessary for him to have some help, and asked affiant whether he ever helped persons under such conditions, and that so far as affiant knows neither plaintiff nor his attorney knew anything about the conversation aforesaid until Friday, the 25th day of April, 1918."

The trial was on April 23d. Plaintiff sought a new trial on the ground, among others, of newly discovered evidence, and this affidavit contains the evidence referred to. Plaintiff and his attorneys who represented him in the circuit court filed affidavits with the motion as to their diligence and failure to discover this evidence. There was also filed a counter affidavit of the attorney who represented plaintiff in the justice court. The counter affidavit stated that the affiant was attorney for plaintiff in the justice court, "and as such attorney filed such suit, and was attorney for plaintiff some time thereafter, and while such attorney for plaintiff learned of and knew what Henry Britton would testify in said cause, and thereafter Crain wrote affiant, and said he was afraid for affiant to try said cause on account of J. L. McKinley being on defendant's bond, and therefore he (the affiant) said nothing to him (plaintiff) about Britton's testimony. The bond referred to is defendant's appeal bond.

[1, 2] Plaintiff makes three assignments in effect as follows: That there is no evidence to support the verdict; that the court erred in giving the instruction; that the court should have granted a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. Plaintiff could not have recovered unless the jury believed him. While his witnesses corroborated him in many particulars, yet there was no evidence upon which he could have recovered, except that his evidence be believed, and the jury evidently did not believe him. The jury was the judge of the weight of the evidence and credibility of the witnesses, and if there were facts and circumstances in evidence which justified the jury in disbelieving plaintiff, that was their right and province, and an appellate court has no right to interfere. Plaintiff made a prima facie case, and, except for the impeaching evidence, the court no doubt would have directed a verdict. Defendant cannot rely entirely upon the proposition that the jury's verdict must stand merely because it chose to disbelieve plaintiff. A jury must have some reason other than mere arbitrary choice to find contrary to the evidence. It was so held in Reichenbach v. Ellerbe, 115 Mo. 588, 22 S. W. 573, but it seems that the Supreme Court held otherwise in Gannon v. Gas Light Co., 145 Mo. 502, 46 S. W. 968, 47 S. W. 907, 43 L. R. A. 505. But in Guthrie v. Holmes, 272 Mo. 215, 198 S. W. 854, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 1123, the Supreme Court held that a jury could not arbitrarily disregard facts which completely shattered a prima facie case based on a presumption of fact. We recently had occasion to consider this question to some extent in Kazee v. Insurance Co., 217 S. W. 339.

[3] An elaborate discussion of the law relative to this question may be found in the dissenting opinion of Judge Marshal in Gannon v. Gas Light Co., supra, and the doctrine announced therein seems to be the rule now in this state. But no case has gone to the extent of holding that, where there is impeaching evidence of the witnesses by whom the prima facie case is established, it is not then the sole province of the jury to believe or disbelieve as they may choose. Except for the evidence tending to impeach plaintiff, he would have been entitled to a directed verdict, but under the facts here the case was certainly for the jury, and not the court. This disposes of plaintiff's contention that there was no evidence to support the verdict.

[4-6] We do not think that any error was committed in giving the instruction complained of. It is contended that the use of the words "character" and "morality" in the instruction constitutes reversible error. The word "reputation" perhaps should have been used instead of "character," but we do not think that plaintiff was in anywise prejudiced. His general reputation for morality might be considered as affecting his credibility. We do not think that plaintiff has any ground to complain. He made no objections to the evidence as to his reputation for morality, and requested no instruction. He had a right to present instructions, but did not do so. Nor do we think that the court abused its discretion, and committed reversible error in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The alleged newly discovered evidence was merely cumulative, and, such being the case, it was not error to refuse to grant the new trial. Remfry v. Insurance Co., 196 S. W. 775. Finding that this new evidence was merely cumulative, and that the court did not abuse its discretion, it is not necessary to go into the question as to whether plaintiff was or was not bound by the knowledge of his first attorney in this cause. We have no right to interfere with a verdict merely because we may think it contrary to the weight of the evidence. If an appellate court exercised such function, then the verdict of a jury would be no more than a recommendation. The judgment is affirmed.

STURGIS, P. J., and FARRINGTON, J., concur.

STEPHENS v. CURTNER. (No. 2616.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 5, 1920.)

1. Infants \S 84—Next friend may receive payment of judgment.

Rev. St. 1909, §§ 1744, 1745, relating to the appointment of a next friend for minor plaintiffs, contemplates that payment of the judgment in such suit should be to the next friend.

2. Infants \S 81—Failure to give bond does not affect next friend's right to receive payment of judgment.

Since the giving of a bond by the next friend of an infant is left to the discretion of the court or officer making the appointment, the fact that no bond is given because none is required will not affect the right of the next friend to receive payment of judgment debt.

3. Infants \S 84—A compromise of judgment debt with infant plaintiffs held invalid.

Where defendant in a suit by infant plaintiffs settled the judgment by paying to the infants only a small part of what was due, such settlement, disapproved by the infant's next friend, was invalid.

4. Compromise and settlement \S 6(1)—Payment of part of an undisputed debt does not discharge the whole debt.

The payment of a part only of an undisputed debt cannot be held to discharge the whole, although such was the agreement of the parties.

5. Replevin \S 5—Property taken under process cannot be replevied.

It is a valid defense in a replevin suit to show that the property in question has been seized under process, execution, or attachment against plaintiff's property.

6. Replevin \S 31—Affidavit that "property was not seized under valid process" held insufficient.

Under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 2637, 7759, requiring a replevin affidavit to allege that the property has not been seized under process, where property is to be taken in advance of the replevin judgment, the plaintiff, seeking to recover property levied on under execution in a suit by infants, could not evade such provision by alleging that the property was not seized under any "valid process or execution."

7. Replevin \S 5—Officer held not liable for failure to release levy.

Where no payment is made to the officer levying an execution, and the claim is made, but disputed, that the payment has been made to the execution plaintiff, such officer should not be held liable in replevin on his refusal to release the levy.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pemiscot County; Sterling H. McCarty, Judge.

Replevin by J. W. Stephens against Wilce Curtner. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Mayes & Gossom, of Caruthersville, for appellant.

M. O. Morris, Sam J. Corbett, and Ward & Reeves, all of Caruthersville, for respondent.

STURGIS, P. J. This is a suit in replevin for a quantity of whisky. This property was owned by plaintiff, and was seized and taken from his possession by the defendant, a constable, under and by virtue of executions issued by a justice of the peace. There were four several judgments, the validity of which are not questioned, rendered against this plaintiff in a justice of the peace court in favor of four minor negro boys, each being a plaintiff in one of such suits. In the proceedings in the justice court resulting in these judgments the plaintiffs being minors, the justice appointed M. O. Morris, as next friend of each such plaintiff under the provisions of section 7435, R. S. 1909, and the suits were conducted in the names of such minors by M. O. Morris as next friend. Judgments in each of such suits were obtained in the justice court and in due time four several executions were issued and placed in the hands of the defendant constable for collection. Under such executions the constable levied on and seized the whisky in question. Thereupon this plaintiff, the execution defendant, instituted this suit in replevin in the circuit court, and on giving bond the replevin writ issued, and under it plaintiff regained from the constable the whisky on which the constable had levied the executions mentioned.

The plaintiff's claim is that, after the constable had the executions against him in his hands for collection, he effected a settlement with the several execution plaintiffs, whereby each of such plaintiffs gave him a receipt in full for the amount due on the respective judgments and executions; that this plaintiff then paid the costs in each case, and demanded that the executions be returned satisfied. The next friend of such minor execution plaintiffs was not consulted in reference to the alleged settlements, and refused to sanction such settlement made by his wards, and instructed the constable to proceed to enforce the executions. The constable therefore refused to release the property levied on, and this suit in replevin was instituted. The judgment in the trial court was for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The position of plaintiff is that he had a right to settle the judgment debts directly with the minor plaintiffs on terms satisfactory to them, without consulting the next friend of such minors, who had been appointed such and conducted the suit for them; that, having made settlement with such execution plaintiffs and obtained receipts against the judgment debts, the executions became functus officio, and the constable no longer had a right to hold his property thereunder; that under such facts replevin is a proper remedy against this constable to regain the property.

[1-4] There are several reasons, we think, why plaintiff cannot recover in this action. The matter most discussed in the briefs and argument is the right of a judgment defendant, in a suit wherein the plaintiff is a minor and sues by next friend, to settle the judgment by paying the amount thereof directly to the minor plaintiff instead of to his next friend. That, however, is not the concrete case here presented. Had this plaintiff paid the judgments in full to the minor execution plaintiffs, a more difficult question would be presented. The provisions of our statutes with reference to appointment of a next friend for minor plaintiffs, providing for the giving of a bond by such friend conditioned to account to such infant for the money and property received in such suit, clearly contemplates that payment of the judgment should be to the next friend. Sections 1744, 1745, R. S. 1909; Aley v. Railroad, 211 Mo. 460, 476, 111 S. W. 102. As the giving of a bond is left to the discretion of the court or officer making the appointment of a next friend, the fact that none is given because none is required would not affect the right of the next friend to receive the payment of the judgment debt. In the present case, however, the judgment defendant in the suits by the minor plaintiffs did not pay the full amount of the judgment debts to such plaintiffs. He undertook to settle same in full by paying only a small part of what was due. This he could not do. Even before final judgment, when the matter is yet in dispute, a court could hardly hold as valid and binding a contract of compromise settlement, made by the infant plaintiff without the consent of the next friend having control of the litigation. Clearly such compromise settlement would not be binding after final judgment in favor of the infants, for then there is no disputed claim to settle. Even in the case of an adult the payment of a part only of an undisputed debt cannot be held to discharge the whole though such was the agreement of the parties. The payment of a part only of what one is bound in law to pay does not discharge the residue, though paid under such agreement. Chamberlain v. Smith, 110 Mo. App. 657, 660, 85 S. W. 645; Willis v. Gam-mill, 67 Mo. 790; Price v. Cannon, 3 Mo. 453; Winter v. Railroad, 73 Mo. App. 173, 193; Moore v. Bank, 22 Mo. App. 684, 696; Swaggard v. Hancock, 25 Mo. App. 596, 606; Harrison v. Iron Works, 96 Mo. App. 348, 70 S. W. 261; Hawthorn Lumber Co. v. Lee Jordan Lumber Co., 167 Mo. App. 201, 151 S. W. 199; Scott v. Parkview Realty Co., 241 Mo. 112, 145 S. W. 48. In this case plaintiff claims that he made a settlement in full of the final judgment in favor of Louis Cobb for $9.60 by payment of $1.50, and a judgment in favor of Fred Alexander for $24 by payment of $5. The other judgments were settled in like proportions. Such payments did not satisfy the executions and the next friend of the minor plaintiff was right in directing the constable not to release the property levied on thereunder. The executions and judgments were not discharged and the defendant constable rightly refused to release the property.

[5, 6] Another barrier to plaintiff's recovery in replevin is that the property in question had been seized under execution against the plaintiff. It is a valid defense in a replevin suit to show that the property in question has been seized under process, execution, or attachment against plaintiff's property. Knoche v. Perry, 90 Mo. App. 463; Moriund v. Johnson, 140 Mo. App. 345, 352, 124 S. W. 80; Bosse v. Thomas, 3 Mo. App. 472, 478. Where the property is to be taken in advance of the judgment in replevin, as it was here, the plaintiff must allege under oath that such property "has not been seized under any process, execution or attachment against the property of the plaintiff." Section 7759 and 2637, R. S. 1909. Plaintiff sought to evade this provision by alleging in his replevin affidavit that the property was not seized under any valid process or execution against his property. We need not decide whether a defendant in execution may maintain replevin where the judgment in which the execution is issued is void or the execution itself is void on its face, for which there is some authority (34 Cyc. 1369), as that is not the case presented. The case of Railroad v. Lowder, 138 Mo. 533, 39 S. W. 799, 60 Am. St. Rep. 565, goes no further than to hold that in case of a void judgment the execution defendant has a remedy of replevin against the purchaser at the execution sale. See, also, Ostmann v. Frey, 148 Mo. App. 284, 128 S. W. 257. There is no pretense that these judgments in favor of the minor plaintiffs or the executions thereon were void. The most that plaintiff claims is that he made settlement with the minor plaintiffs and paid them what they agreed to accept in full settlement. This, as we have seen, was not binding on plaintiffs or on their next friend, and the executions were not in fact satisfied. Under such facts replevin would not lie.

[7] Whether or not an execution defendant, who has paid to the officer having such execution the full amount due thereon, can maintain replevin against such officer, refusing to release the levy, might be a serious question. But where no payment is made to such officer, and the claim is made, but disputed, that payment has been made to the execution plaintiff, then such officer ought not to be held liable in replevin. Mowrer v. Helfertine, 80 Mo. 23; Arnel v. Lendrum, 47 Iowa, 535; Kelso v. Youngren, 86 Minn. 177, 90 N. W. 316. The clause protecting property seized under any process from an action in replevin should not be weakened by inserting the word "valid" after the word any. Karr v. Stahl, 75 Kan. 387, 89 Pac. 669.

The judgment as rendered is favorable enough to the plaintiff, and is affirmed.

NORMAN v. KEY. (No. 2690.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 5, 1920.)

1. Justices of the peace §101—Attachment affidavit used in aid of defective statement.

Attachment affidavit in an action in a justice court may be used in aid of a defective statement.

2. Justices of the peace §91(2)—Statement seeking to recover cotton as rent held sufficient.

A statement in justice court: "Arthur Key to Leslie Norman, Dr. To one-fourth of cotton grown by Key on land of Norman, in the year of 1918, as rent for said land, $250.00"—held a sufficient statement when aided by an attachment affidavit.

3. Justices of the peace §91(1)—Statement need be only definite enough to inform of nature of action.

A statement in a justice court need only be definite enough to inform defendant of the nature of plaintiff's demand and act as a basis for a pleading of res judicata.

4. Landlord and tenant §53(2)—No formal attornment to purchaser of land or renewal of rental contract necessary.

No formal attornment of tenant to purchaser of land or renewal of the rental contract is required, since the covenant to pay rent runs with the land, and an assignment of the reversion carries the right to the assignee to sue for the rent, in view of Rev. St. 1909, § 7899.

5. Landlord and tenant §322—One-fourth of cotton raised "at the gin" required delivery by tenant at market place.

A tenant agreeing to pay as rent one-fourth of the cotton raised thereon at the gin thereby agreed to deliver the cotton to the market place, "at the gin" being place where cotton was sold.

6. Landlord and tenant §326(5,6)—Tenant failing to deliver crop as rent may be sued for money value.

Where tenant is to pay landlord a part of crop as rent, the relation of landlord and tenant exists so as to authorize a suit for the money value of the portion of the crop due the landlord in case the tenant sells or converts same to his own use, and this is true although the landlord and tenant may be tenants in common of the crop raised, and the landlord might enforce, under proper circumstances, his right to his portion of the crop in kind, in view of Rev. St. 1909, § 7896.

7. Parties §6(2)—Beneficial owner of land may sue for rent.

Where land was sold and was conveyed to a third person instead of the purchaser, the purchaser could sue tenant for rent, being the real party in interest.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pemiscot County; Sterling H. McCarty, Judge.

Action by Leslie Norman against Arthur Key. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Shepard & Oliver, of Caruthersville, for appellant.

Ward & Reeves, of Caruthersville, for respondent.

STURGIS, P. J. The whole controversy in this case in the trial court was whether the rent on a part of a certain 40 acres of land in Pemiscot county which was cultivated by defendant in the year 1918 should go and be paid to plaintiff or to W. A. Key, the father of defendant. The defendant acknowledged owing the rent and said that it made no money difference to him whether he paid plaintiff or his father. Naturally enough, however, he defended this suit in the interest of his father. The controversy arose in this way: Plaintiff's father, W. A. Key, owned 130 acres of land in Pemiscot county which he sold to plaintiff in the early spring of 1918. The legal title to 50 acres of this land was in said W. A. Key, but he had only the equitable title to the other 80 acres, having purchased the same, but had not received a deed or paid all the purchase money. When W. A. Key sold this land to plaintiff, Norman, he made the deed to plaintiff for the 50 acres, but for convenience W. A. Key's vendor of the 80 acres made the deed direct to plaintiff. W. A. Key had taken possession of the land prior to selling to plaintiff, and had rented a portion of one 40 to his son, this defendant, to cultivate for the season of 1918, though at that time no crops had been planted. W. A. Key claims, or rather the defendant makes such claim for him, that when he sold the land to plaintiff he reserved and was to have the rent on this one 40 for the season of 1918. Plaintiff denies this and says no reservation of rent on any of the land was made by W. A. Key, the vendor. This was the matter threshed out at the trial below, and, while no reservation of rent was made in the deeds conveying the land to plaintiff, the court permitted oral evidence on behalf of defendant that such was the real agreement of the parties. Plaintiff's evidence is that, when he purchased this land, not only was he to have the rent for 1918, but that he and the vendor, W. A. Key, went to the tenants, including this defendant, and informed them of plaintiff's purchase of the land, that he was to have the rent on same, and that defendant consented to the arrangement. Defendant's evidence, including W. A. Key as a witness, was to the contrary, and that W. A. Key reserved and was to have the rent on this particular forty acres. We need not review the conflicting evidence, as defendant concedes here that the jury's finding on this controverted fact in plaintiff's favor is binding on this court. We only desire to point out that this was the controverted issue—the merits of the case—and that the jury found for plaintiff that he is entitled to the rent, and not defendant's father. The judgment was for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

[1-3] The case originated in a justice court, and defendant's first point here is that the statement filed in the justice court is wholly insufficient, states no cause of action whatever, and will not support the judgment. This point is raised here for the first time. The statement reads:

"Arthur Key to Leslie Norman, Dr. To one-fourth of cotton grown by Key on land of Norman, in the year of 1918, as rent for said land, $250.00."

The suit was by attachment, and the affidavit for attachment states that defendant "is justly indebted to this affiant in the sum of $250 for the annual rent of 15 acres of cotton which said defendant had been raising on the land of this affiant during the year 1918 on the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, 17—17—11, and that said sum of $250 is now due and payable." The statement itself clearly means that plaintiff claims that defendant owes him $250, the value of one-fourth of the cotton grown by defendant on land of the plaintiff, Norman, in the year 1918 as rent for said land. The affidavit in attachment is still more explicit in describing the land and stating that the amount claimed is for the rent on land owned by plaintiff and which defendant planted in cotton. The attachment affidavit may be used in aid of the defective statement (Holman v. Kerr, 44 Mo. App. 481), if indeed it needs any aid, and we are not holding that it does. Under the informal method of pleading allowed in justice courts we have no hesitation in holding this sufficient. A statement in a justice court need only be definite enough to inform the defendant of the nature of plaintiff's demand and act as a basis for a plea of res judicata. Guarantee Fixture Co. v. Baseball Co., 152 Mo. App. 601, 604, 133 S. W. 849; Rundleman v. Boiler Works, 178 Mo. App. 642, 161 S. W. 609. The defendant had in fact no trouble in ascertaining and trying out the real question involved, and raises this point for the first time after this appeal. We overrule this assignment of error.

[4] The defendant bases several assignments of error on the ground that the relation of landlord and tenant never existed between plaintiff and defendant. This contention is based on the fact that defendant rented this land from his father, the former owner, that plaintiff became the owner thereafter, never was in actual possession of the land, and no rental contract was ever made between them. In this defendant is mistaken. The plaintiff's evidence, which the jury believed, is to the effect that when W. A. Key sold this land to plaintiff they together went to defendant, informed him of the fact and that the rent went to plaintiff, and defendant acquiesced in this agreement. No formal attornment of the tenant to the purchaser of land or renewal of the rental contract is required, since the covenant to pay rent runs with the land, and an assignment of the reversion carries the right to the assignee to sue for the rent. McDonald v. May, 96 Mo. App. 236, 242, 69 S. W. 1059; Bradford v. Tilly, 65 Mo. App. 181. Such also is our statute, section 7899, R. S. 1909. When, therefore, the lessor of this land, W. A. Key, sold and conveyed or caused to be conveyed this land to plaintiff, the relation of landlord and tenant, so far at least as gave plaintiff the right to sue for the rent is concerned, did exist between plaintiff and defendant. The cases cited by defendant, Edmonson v. Kite, 43 Mo. 176, McLaughlin v. Dunn, 45 Mo. App. 645, and Peck v. Dunnevant, 148 Mo. App. 69, 127 S. W. 678, holding that an action for rent or for use and occupation will not lie unless the relation of landlord and tenant is shown to exist, are cases where the defendant was not a tenant at all, but a trespasser or the like. Here the defendant acknowledges his tenancy of this land and that he owes the rent, and the only question is whether the rent was reserved by and is due the original owner and lessor or passed with the land to this plaintiff as purchaser and owner at the time the rent was due. That question has been settled in plaintiff's favor.

[5, 6] The evidence shows that in renting this land the defendant agreed to pay as rent one-fourth of the cotton raised thereon at the gin. "At the gin" was the place where cotton was sold, and this meant that the tenant was to deliver the cotton to the market place where sold. Usually the market price of the cotton was then paid to the tenant for the landlord or deposited in a bank for him. In this case the tenant sold the cotton, collected the money, and refused to pay it over to plaintiff. After this suit was commenced he says that he paid it to his father. Defendant suggests, if we understand his point, that, as the rent was payable in kind, such fact made plaintiff and defendant tenants in common of the cotton, and that plaintiff could not sue for and recover a money judgment as for cash rent. Our statute (section 7896) recognizes the right of the landlord to sue for the rent due even by attachment "whether the same be payable in money or other thing"—that is, part of the crop raised. In Caruthers v. Williams, 53 Mo. App. 181, and 58 Mo. App. 100, the court held that—

"If the tenant by negligence or other fault fails or refuses to harvest and deliver the crop, he fails to render the rent agreed."

This was said in a suit by attachment for rent. The case of Cramer v. Nelson, 128 Mo. App. 393, 107 S. W. 450, cited by defendant, is a suit for rent of a farm, said rent being "one-half of all grain in the crib," in which plaintiff prayed judgment for $750, the value of 1,500 bushels of corn which the tenant failed to deliver to the landlord. It seems clear, therefore, that, where the tenant is to pay the landlord a part of the crop as rent, the relation of landlord and tenant exists so as to authorize a suit for the money value of the portion of the crop due the landlord in case the tenant sells or converts same, to his own use; and this is true although the landlord and tenant may be tenants in common of the crop raised and the landlord might enforce, under proper circumstances, his right to his portion of the crop in kind. Johnson v. Hoffman, 53 Mo. 508; Black v. Scott, 104 Mo. App. 37, 78 S. W. 301; Kamerrick v. Castleman, 23 Mo. App. 481, 492.

[7] It also appears that when plaintiff purchased this land he caused same to be conveyed to one Elisha Johnson instead of to himself. Plaintiff's explanation of this is that he and his wife were not living together and their relations were not amicable. The evidence all clearly showed that plaintiff bought and paid for the land, and that Johnson merely held it for him and had no real interest in same. He was making no claim for the rent and could not do so except for plaintiff's benefit. Defendant urges that Johnson was the only proper party to sue if the rent followed the ownership of the land. Plaintiff, however, is the beneficial owner of the land, is the real party at interest, and, we think, should be allowed to recover. No authorities are cited by defendant on this point, and we think it unnecessary to brief it ourselves.

Criticism of some of the instructions given is made, but what we have said answers such criticism for the most part, and we will not notice same in detail. Defendant had his day in court, lost the case on the merits, and we find no reason for remanding the case for new trial. The judgment is affirmed.

MAJORS v. OZARK POWER & WATER CO. (No. 2612.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 5, 1920.)

1. Evidence ⇨7 — Judicial notice taken that electric wire insulation will not withstand shock of tree falling on it.

Judicial knowledge is taken of the fact that the insulation on electric wires is a covering of fiber and material that will not withstand such tremendous shocks as that caused to the wire by the falling on it of a tree 18 inches in diameter and 50 feet high.

2. Negligence ⇨136(5)—Jury case defined.

A case should not be submitted to a jury where under the testimony the cause of the accident is merely conjectural, and there must be some evidence of a causal connection between the act complained of and the injury.

3. Electricity ⇨16(7)—Lack of insulation held not proximate cause of death.

Lack of insulation held not proximate cause of death of one coming in contact with electric power wire, knocked down by the felling across it of a 50-foot tree, with its base 40 feet away in a yard.

4. Negligence ⇨58—Proximate cause of injury defined.

If the injury as occasioned was not one which could have reasonably been anticipated as a sequence of the alleged negligent act, then the alleged negligent act was not in law the proximate cause of the injury, and no recovery can be had therefor.

5. Appeal and error ⇨212—Appellant without standing where saving no objection or exception to direction of verdict.

In death case, where, after the court gave directed instruction for defendant, without more plaintiff took a nonsuit, and there was no objection or exception saved to such action, the appellate court could not interfere with the judgment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; Grant Emerson, Judge.

Action by Nora M. Majors against the Ozark Power & Water Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. S. Mayhew and J. Olin Biggs, both of Monett, for appellant.

A. E. Spencer, of Joplin, for respondent.

FARRINGTON, J. The appellant brings her appeal from a judgment adverse to her rendered in the circuit court of Jasper county. The case made by her is that her husband was a common laborer, living in Peirce City, Mo., and in the month of January or February, 1919, was engaged by Henry Mohlering to cut some large trees in the yard of the home of one Webber. Plaintiff's husband was killed while engaged in this work in the following manner: He, with several other men, including Mohlering and Mohlering's brother, had cut one tree in Webber's yard, and after that cut down a tree which under the evidence was 18 inches in diameter and 50 feet high. They undertook to throw this tree in a certain direction, but, owing to the fact it fell sooner than they anticipated and struck some other limbs, its top reached out into the street, where it struck some high-powered electric current wires, owned and maintained there by the defendant. These wires were not insulated. There is evidence that there had been insulation on some of the wires in the past, but it had rotted off, and afforded no protection at the time of the injury. The top of this tree, when it struck the wires, crushed them to the ground, breaking one and holding the other two down to the ground. The wires prior to the time the tree fell upon them were maintained on poles out in the street about 40 feet from this tree, and from 20 to 30 feet up over the street or roadway. When the tree crushed down these wires a singing noise was made by the wires, and Mohlering, who was in charge and the employer of plaintiff's husband, went into Webber's house to telephone the company to cut off their electric current. Plaintiff's husband was at the stump of the tree, and while Mohlering was in the house telephoning he (Majors) walked up toward the top of the tree, through the limbs, and when he had gotten at a place some 6 or 7 feet from where the wires were crushed down, he either stumbled or received a shock of electricity that caused him to lunge forward toward the wires. One of his hands, according to one of plaintiff's witnesses, struck the broken wire. Another witness for plaintiff testified that his hand went forward and rested under one of the wires that was not broken. At any rate, he was gotten out by the workmen, and died almost immediately.

The charge of negligence in the petition is that the defendant carelessly permitted its wires, which were strung on poles and were charged with electricity, to become bare by reason of the fact that the insulation on the wires had rotted off from long and constant use, and permitted said wires to remain in that condition for a long time prior to the date of the injury, and that it knew, or should have known by the exercise of ordinary care and caution, that the wires were bare and uninsulated, and were therefore dangerous and deadly to human life to any one coming in contact therewith. The answer was a general denial and a plea of contributory negligence.

At the end of plaintiff's evidence the defendant offered an instruction to the court, directing the jury to find the issues for the defendant, which the court gave. The record before us shows as follows:

"Thereupon the court instructs the jury that under the law and the evidence the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this cause. Whereupon the plaintiff takes a nonsuit, with leave to move to set the same aside."

The court afterwards overruled plaintiff's motion to set aside the nonsuit, to which latter action of the court the plaintiff objected and excepted.

It is the contention of appellant that the defendant is answerable for this injury under these circumstances, because of the fact that it had failed to properly insulate these wires.

Without going into the question of whether plaintiff's husband was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, in leaving his place by the stump of the fallen tree and going up into the branches of the tree, where he came in contact with the wires, as we have set out, knowing that they were high-powered wires, were mashed down under the tree, we think that the action of the court in giving the instruction was proper, because plaintiff's evidence had failed to make out a case of negligence against the defendant.

[1] As a first proposition, we believe it would be nothing more than wild conjecture to hold that the failure to insulate the wires was the cause of plaintiff's husband meeting his death, with the weight and crash of a tree 50 feet high, with a diameter at its stump of 18 inches, falling upon and crushing to the ground these wires. To say that subjecting a properly and newly insulated wire to such a crash and force would have kept this wire in such condition as to have prevented the electricity from escaping as it did is purely conjectural. We take judicial knowledge that the insulation on electric wires is a covering of fiber and material that will not withstand such tremendous shocks as that caused to this wire by the tree falling upon it, and if the defendant is to be held for the death of this man the evidence must be sufficient to warrant a finding that the failure to insulate caused his death.

[2] The law is well settled that a case should not be submitted to a jury where under the testimony the cause of the accident is merely conjectural. 29 Cyc. 631. There must be some evidence of a causal connection between the act complained of as negligence and the injury. Battles v. Railway Co., 178 Mo. App. loc. cit. 614, 161 S. W. 614, and cases cited therein.

[3, 4] We, therefore, hold in this case, with these wires subjected to the force of this falling tree, that it would be a mere conjecture to say that it was defendant's failure to insulate this wire that caused plaintiff's husband's death. On the other hand, the law is well established in this state, as declared in the very recent case of State ex rel. v. Ellison, 271 Mo. 463, loc. cit. 474, 196 S. W. 1088, that if the injury, as occasioned, was not one which could have reasonably been anticipated as a sequence of the alleged negligent act, then the alleged negligent act was not in law the proximate cause of the injury, and no recovery can be had therefor. Here we have the defendant company placing its wires from 20 to 30 feet high on poles out in a street. We do not think that it could reasonably be anticipated that some one would cut down a shade tree, apparently strong and vigorous, in an adjoining yard from 40 to 50 feet away from these wires.

The last case cited quotes with approval from American Brewing Association v. Talbot, 141 Mo. loc. cit. 683, 42 S. W. 682, 64 Am. St. Rep. 538, where it is held:

"Numerous authorities hold that it is not negligence not to take precautionary measures to prevent an injury which, if taken, would have prevented it, when the injury could not reasonably have been anticipated and would not, unless under exceptional circumstances, have happened."

It is certainly an exceptional occurrence for trees to be cut 40 or 50 feet from the street so as to fall across wires strung therein.

In Thompson on Negligence (2d Ed.) vol. 1, § 58, quoting from Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 139, the rule is stated:

"The act of a third person, intervening and contributing a condition necessary to the injurious effect of the original negligence, will not excuse the first wrongdoer, if such act ought to have been foreseen. The original negligence still remains a culpable and direct cause of injury. The test is to be found in the probable injurious consequences which were to be anticipated—not in the number of subsequent events and agencies which might arise. And this principle will apply to a case where a catastrophe has been brought about by any intervening agency, having no connection with the act of the original actor, whether such agency be the act of a third person or a catastrophe of nature. Thus an ordinance of a borough regulating the speed of electric cars was violated, and in consequence of the violation the car was at a given point upon the track of the defendant, where a tree fell as the car was passing under it, injuried the plaintiff. If the ordinance had been complied with, the car would have been on an other point on the track at the time when the tree fell. The violation of the ordinance was not the proximate cause of the injury, since it could not be foreseen that the tree would fall, or that it would fall at any particular point of time; and hence, so far as human foresight could go, the violation of the ordinance might have prevented, as well as produced, the catastrophe."

Our attention is called to the case of Harrison v. K. C. Electric Light Co., 195 Mo. 606, 93 S. W. 951, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 293, where the company was held on the showing that it knew that its electric line was grounded, and, without discovering where it was, it turned on this powerful and deadly current, which negligent act, coupled with the act of the deceased's son, caused the injury.

Again, in the case of Williams v. Springfield Gas & Electric Co., 274 Mo. 1, 202 S. W. 1, the Supreme Court, in reversing a judgment of this court (187 S. W. 556), held that the company was liable, because they must anticipate that boys will climb up in trees; that, held to a knowledge of this, companies or persons dealing with electricity must guard against injuring those who exercise this prehistoric and probably inherited trait. It would be going far, however, to hold that reasonable and prudent people, exercising the highest degree of care, must anticipate that shade trees located in yards along the streets will be chopped down so as to fall across the wires. Luehrmann v. Laclede Gas Light Co., 127 Mo. App. 213, 104 S. W. 1128; Brubaker v. K. C. Elec. Light Co., 130 Mo. App. 439, 110 S. W. 12.

For these reasons, we hold that plaintiff failed to make out a case of negligence against the defendant, and that the action of the trial court in giving the peremptory instruction was proper.

[5] There is another reason, which is purely technical, that forbids any interference of the judgment in this case by this court, and that is shown by the record which we have heretofore set out. After the court gave the directed instruction to the jury, without more the plaintiff took a nonsuit. There was no objection nor exception saved to such action. This, under all the decisions of our appellate courts, is a vital omission in the preparation for an appeal. See Lewis v. Mining Co., 199 Mo. 463, 97 S. W. 938; Arnold v. Insurance Co., 167 Mo. App. 154, 151 S. W. 190; Montel v. Railroad, 130 Mo. App. 149, 108 S. W. 1073; Carter v. O'Neill, 102 Mo. App. 391, 76 S. W. 717; McClure v. Campbell, 148 Mo. 96, 49 S. W. 881.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

MUNDAY v. BRITTON. (No. 2638.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 5, 1920.)

1. Trover and conversion §32(3)—Allegation as to possession necessary.

In action for conversion, plaintiff must allege that he was in possession or entitled to possession of the property at the time of the alleged conversion.

2. Justices of the peace §174(5)—Defective pleading can be amended on appeal to circuit court.

In action for conversion, where statement filed in the justice court was defective for failure to allege that plaintiff was in possession or entitled to possession at the time of the alleged conversion, plaintiff could amend pleading by supplying such omission on appeal to the circuit court.

3. Chattel mortgages §114—Feed bill a lien on animals only if possession was necessary to protect mortgages.

Feed bill paid by mortgagee to get possession of mortgaged animals from third person hired by mortgagor to care for them was not a lien on animals where they were not depreciating in value so as to justify mortgagee in declaring a default, but, if they were depreciating in value to such an extent that possession by mortgagee would have been necessary to protect his rights, the amount so paid would become a part of secured debt or be of equal dignity therewith and be a lien on the property.

4. Chattel mortgages §161 — Mortgagor did not "dispose of" animals by hiring third person to take care of them.

Mortgagor by hiring a person to keep and care for mortgaged animals did not "dispose of" them within mortgage providing that mortgagor shall not "dispose of" them and entitling mortgagee to declare debt due and take possession if mortgagor disposes thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Dispose of.]

5. Chattel mortgages §161—Meaning of "dispose of" in chattel mortgages stated.

In mortgage on animals, providing that mortgagor shall not "dispose of" them, the word "dispose" has a larger meaning than selling; selling being only one of the methods of disposing of property.

6. Chattel mortgages §166—Mortgagee taking possession on default must foreclose within reasonable time.

The right to take possession given mortgagee on default by mortgagor is given him merely to enable him to foreclose mortgage, which he must do in good faith within a reasonable time.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Texas County;
L. B. Woodside, Judge.

Action by R. P. Munday against Henry Britton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lamar, Lamar & Lamar, of Houston, for appellant.

W. L. Hiett, of Houston, for respondent.

STURGIS, P. J. This suit originated in a justice of the peace court in Texas county, and is for conversion of two mares and a mule colt. The defendant justifies his action in taking possession of said animals and his subsequent appropriation of same to his own use by reason of the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage thereon and his purchase thereunder. The plaintiff is the original owner and mortgagor of the two mares; the mule colt having been born between the giving of the mortgage and its foreclosure.

The principal facts are that the plaintiff induced the defendant to sign as joint maker a note for $20 payable to a bank at Houston, Mo., and gave him a chattel mortgage on these animals for his protection. The note and mortgage are dated March 10, 1916, and were due and payable 60 days thereafter. The chattel mortgage contains the usual conditions as to the mortgaged property remaining in possession of the mortgagor till default in payment unless the mortgaged property unreasonably depreciates in value or the mortgagor sells or disposes of the same. A day or two after giving this mortgage the plaintiff left Texas county, placing the mortgaged property in the care and custody of one Dave Holland under an agreement that Holland was to feed and care for same at $12 per month. The defendant's mortgage was not recorded until some two weeks later, but Holland had knowledge of same. In a little more than a month after the mortgage was given, and about the same length of time after Holland's possession under the agreement as to feeding and caring for the animals for plaintiff, the defendant demanded and took possession of the animals on the ground that same had greatly depreciated in value, the secured note not yet being due. To get such possession the defendant paid Holland the accrued feed bill then amounting to $14.

The plaintiff paid the secured note before it became due. The plaintiff was yet absent, and it is not shown that he then knew of defendant's action in having taken possession of the property and paying the feed bill thereon. It appears that a nephew of plaintiff attended to paying off the note, and the nephew, being without authority or funds with which to do so, and claiming that defendant's action in taking possession of the mortgaged property before the secured debt was due was unwarranted, declined to reimburse defendant for the $14 feed bill which he had paid in order to obtain such possession.

It appears, therefore, that at the time the secured note became due it was fully paid by plaintiff, although the defendant as mortgagee had taken and was in possession of the mortgaged property on the ground that his liability on such note was endangered by a depreciation in value of such property. The only claim that defendant then had was that he should be reimbursed for the feed bill owed by plaintiff to Holland which he had paid on taking possession of the mortgaged property. No foreclosure proceeding had been commenced, and this condition of affairs continued for some four months when defendant advertised the property and sold it, ostensibly at least under the terms of the mortgage, and himself became the purchaser. Later the plaintiff brought this suit for conversion, and on trial in the circuit court without a jury the court found for plaintiff, assessing the value of the property at $90, crediting thereon the amount of the feed bill paid by defendant, and rendered judgment for plaintiff for $76. The defendant appeals.

[1, 2] A question of pleading is raised which must be disposed of first. In plaintiff's statement filed in the justice court he alleges that he was the owner of the property, and that defendant unlawfully took possession of the same and converted it to his own use, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $250. After appeal to the circuit court objection was made that the statement was fatally defective in that there was no allegation that plaintiff was in possession or entitled to possession at the time of the alleged conversion. The court thereupon permitted plaintiff to amend by adding such allegation. While the omitted allegation is essential to state a cause of action in conversion (Schwald v. Brunjes, 139 Mo. App. 516, 123 S. W. 472, and Bank v. Land Co., 152 Mo. 145, 156, 53 S. W. 902), we need not decide whether this rather technical rule applies to the informal pleadings allowed in justice courts. Here the pleading was amended, and the question is whether such an essential allegation may be added by amendment after the case reaches the circuit court. This question was settled in the affirmative by the Supreme Court in Dowdy v. Wamble, 110 Mo. 280, 19 S. W. 480, certified to that court by the St. Louis Court of Appeals. It was there held that on appeals from justices of the peace the law "permits amendments on appeal, even where essential facts were thereby first brought into the case." That was a replevin case, and there is no reason by the same rule should not apply to a suit in conversion. It is there held, and has been repeatedly so held since, that a plaintiff's statement in a justice court which is fundamentally insufficient and lacking in some essential averment necessary to state a cause of action may be made sufficient by amendment after the case reaches the circuit court. Union Brewing Co. v. Ehlhardt, 189 Mo. App. 129, 120 S. W. 1193; Daniel v. Atkins, 66 Mo. App. 342; Rocheport Bank v. Doak, 75 Mo. App. 332; Rechnitzer v. Vogel-sang, 117 Mo. App. 148, 93 S. W. 326.

[3] Looking to the merits of the case, we find that the question to which the evidence was mostly directed was whether the mortgaged property had materially depreciated in value so as to justify defendant's action in declaring a default on that ground prior to the secured note becoming due. The court found against defendant on this point and that such property had not so depreciated. That such finding is supported by substantial evidence and is binding on this appeal is conceded. Under the finding, therefore, that defendant wrongfully took this property into his possession before the secured debt was due, we cannot sustain defendant's claim to have a right to hold the property and later foreclose the mortgage, merely to reimburse himself for the prior payment of the feed bill. Had defendant been compelled to pay this feed bill at a time and for a purpose necessary to protect his rights under the mortgage, then we would grant that the amount so paid would become a part of, or of equal dignity with, the secured debt, and therefore be a lien on the property. 11 C. J. 562. But, as there stated, where the mortgagee wrongfully takes possession of the mortgaged property before the secured debt is due, he cannot charge the mortgagor with the expense of keeping it. And for the same reason he could not charge against the property a prior feed bill owed by the mortgagor which he paid solely to accomplish a wrongful taking of this property. The mortgagee is not entitled to such protection in doing a wrongful act.

It is not necessary, therefore, for us to determine whether or not the person to whom defendant paid the feed bill had an agister's lien on this property superior to the defendant's mortgage. Defendant concedes that an agister's lien is not superior to a mortgage lien where the mortgage is recorded within a reasonable time: Birmingham v. Carr, 196 Mo. App. 411, 197 S. W. 711. But, says defendant, this mortgage was not recorded till 15 days after being given, and meantime the agister made the contract and incurred expense in feeding these horses. Again we might say that defendant is seeking to be protected for his own wrong, for it was his fault that he did not file the mortgage within a reasonable time. Be that as it may, the defendant is a volunteer in paying this feed bill, since his taking this property when he did is found to be wrongful, and he was not paying a debt the payment of which was necessary to protect his rights.

ing of this property before the secured debt was due on the ground of a violation of the provision of the mortgage forbidding any sale or disposal of the mortgaged property by the mortgagor. It is claimed that the mortgagor's leaving his property in the actual custody of Holland to keep and feed in the mortgagor's absence was a disposal of same within the meaning of the mortgage. Holland said that the agreement was that the mortgagor "was to give me $12 per month to take that team and feed them until grass, and I was to pasture them." The court declared the law to be that the words "dispose of" as used in the mortgage meant a transfer of the property from the owner to another person by which such owner passed it out of his power or possession by either gift or bargain, and that a mere hiring of same to some other person to take care of such property for a limited time was not a disposal of same within the meaning of the mortgage. We agree that the word "dispose" has a larger meaning than "sell," and that selling is only one of the methods of disposing of property. The affirmative part of the court's definition may not be altogether accurate, but the negative part is correct under the facts, and that is all we are concerned with. For the mortgagor to place the property in the hands of Holland to keep and care for same at so much per month, the agreement to terminate at will, is not a violation of the disposal clause of the mortgage warranting its foreclosure before the secured note is due.

[6] In this view of the case it is not necessary to discuss the effect of defendant's retaining this property in his possession without taking any steps to foreclose for nearly five months after taking possession. The only right as to taking possession conferred by the mortgage on the mortgagee is to enable him to foreclose such mortgage, and this the law requires to be done in good faith within a reasonable time. 11 C. J. 590; Miller v. Biggs, 183 S. W. 713.

FARRINGTON and BRADLEY, JJ., concur.

ELLIOTT v. HENSLEY.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 11, 1920.)

1. Property \S 10—Constructive possession follows the senior of two patents as to land covered by both.

As to land covered by two patents, and not in actual possession of any one, constructive possession is in the holder of the title under the senior patent.

2. Adverse possession \S 101—Adjacent tracts patented on same day by separate patents are separate tracts with respect to constructive possession.

Adjacent tracts patented by separate patents, though on the same day and to the same person, not having been inclosed, are to be treated as separate tracts as regards effect of actual possession of a part of one of them only, by one having a later patent covering parts of all of them, so that such actual possession will be constructively extended only to such part of the tract within which is the actual possession as is covered by the later patent, and not to any of the other tracts.

3. Adverse possession \S 101—Actual possession with title cannot give title to adjoining lands with only color of title.

Actual possession of land to which the possessor has good title cannot give him title by adverse possession to an adjoining tract patented to another, though he obtains a later patent to his own land and the adjoining land, but actual possession within the adjoining land is necessary.

4. Adverse possession \S 67—Possession before acquisition of color of title, being afterwards continued, sufficient.

One's possession is sufficient to give title by adverse possession under color of title, though taken before he obtained color of title; it being thereafter maintained for a sufficient length of time.

5. Adverse possession \S 31—Trifling extension onto wild land of possessor's clearing held insufficient.

One's actual possession within a tract to which he has only color of title is insufficient to give him title thereto by adverse possession, being but a trifling extension of the clearing on his own adjoining land, and so insufficient, in view of the land being wild and uninclosed, to give notice thereof.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Leslie County.

Action by Henry M. Hensley against Gertrude Elliott. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

B. B. Golden, of Barbourville, and Lewis & Lewis, of Hyden, for appellant.

Cleon K. Calvert, of Hyden, and E. O. O'Rear and J. C. Jones, both of Frankfort, for appellee.

CARROLL, C. J. In August, 1840, there was issued to Felix J. Gilbert a patent for 50 acres of land in Leslie county. On July 8, 1870, W. H. De Groot obtained four patents, Nos. 43195, 43196, 43197, and 43198, for 200 acres each; the land embraced in these patents being in one body, the southern end of which projected into the senior patent of Gilbert, and to the extent that the land patented to De Groot lapped over the patent issued to Gilbert it is conceded that the De Groot patents were void. In 1876 Robinson became the owner of the land for which patent issued to Gilbert, and in March, 1885, he obtained a patent for 100 acres; the lines of this patent embracing practically all of the Gilbert patent, a large part of the De Groot patents, 43197 and 43198, north of the Gilbert patent, and also a portion of the De Groot patents 43195 and 43196.

Gertrude Elliott, at the time this suit was brought, was the owner by connected paper title of the four patents issued to De Groot, but neither she nor any of her vendors had ever been in the actual possession of any of the land embraced in these patents, all of which was wild, uncultivated, and uninclosed, except a few acres on the southern boundary adjoining the Gilbert land. In 1910 Henry M. Hensley, the appellee, who connects himself in a regular way, through purchases extending back to Robinson with the Robinson patent, as well as the patent to Gilbert that had been purchased by Robinson, brought this suit against Gertrude Elliott, the appellant, averring that he was the owner and entitled to the possession of that part of the De Groot patents that were covered by the junior Robinson patent.

For answer to this suit Gertrude Elliott averred that the Robinson patent, under which Hensley claimed, was junior to the De Groot patents, and therefore to the extent that it lapped over these patents was void. She further set up her title to these De Groot patents, but admitted that to the extent they lapped over Felix J. Gilbert's prior patent the De Groot patents were void.

After the evidence had been taken by depositions, the case was submitted to the court, and there was a judgment in favor of Hensley, awarding to him the ownership and possession of the land embraced within the four De Groot patents that was covered by the lines of the patent issued to Robinson. It also appears that, after Robinson became the owner of the Gilbert patent in 1876, and before he obtained the patent issued to himself in 1885, he had built a house and made a clearing with cultivation on the Gilbert land. A part of this clearing and cultivation undoubtedly extended into the De Groot patent 43198, and Hensley contends that it also extended into the De Groot patent 43197.

As the patent issued to Robinson in 1885 covered that part of the Gilbert patent on which the house was situated and the clearing made, and also that part of the De Groot patent that had been cultivated and cleared, the court was evidently of the opinion that this cultivation and clearing, together with the adverse holding, placed Robinson and his vendees, down to and including Hensley, not only in the actual possession of the De Groot patent 43198, into which the clearing extended, but also in possession of the other three De Groot patents, although no part of either had ever been taken into actual possession by either Robinson or those claiming under him by clearing, cultivation, or otherwise.

The court was evidently influenced to make this decision upon the ground that these four contiguous and coterminous De Groot patents, which were issued on the same day to the same person, constituted one connected body of land, and, this being so, the actual adverse holding by Robinson and his vendees of any part of the land within either of these patents, and also within the lines of his patent, placed the adverse holders in the actual adverse possession of all the De Groot patents that were within the boundary of the patent issued to Robinson, as there had never been, as we have said, any actual possession of any of the De Groot patents by any person claiming under them.

On this appeal by Gertrude Elliott, it is contended, first, that each of these De Groot patents should be treated as a separate, distinct body of land from each of the other De Groot patents, and therefore the entry and adverse holding by Hensley, and those under whom he claims, of a part of one of these patents, would only place him in the possession of that one in which there was an entry and actual possession, and therefore it is said that, if Hensley is entitled to any of the De Groot patents, the recovery in his behalf should be confined to the land covered by patent 43198, as this was the only patent in which there was an adverse entry and holding. Her second contention is that there was no such entry or holding on the part of Robinson or his vendees as would entitle Hensley to recover any of these De Groot patents on the ground of adverse possession.

[1, 2] In considering the case, we will take up first the question whether these De Groot patents should be treated, in the application of the doctrine of adverse possession, as one body of land or four separate and distinct tracts. In 1885, when Robinson obtained his patent, embracing, as we have said, parts of the four De Groot patents, these De Groot senior patents, although not in the actual possession of any person, were in the constructive possession of De Groot, except to the extent of the clearing in 43198; and this constructive possession, there being no actual possession, adverse or otherwise, extended, except as to this clearing, to all of the land embraced within the lines of the four patents. This constructive possession followed as a necessary consequence the title to this land, which was in De Groot by virtue of the patents issued to him, and this title and constructive possession he could be divested of only by an actual, open, notorious, and visible entry and possession by an adverse claimant for the statutory period. As was said in Whitley County Land Co. v. Powers' Heirs, 146 Ky. 801, 144 S. W. 2:

"It is as well settled as any principle in the land laws of the state can be that two persons cannot at the same time be in constructive possession of the same body of land, and that in a contest between constructive title owners the oldest title must prevail. This principle is aptly stated in Jones v. McCauley, 2 Duv. 14, where the court said: 'There can be no constructive possession of the same land by conflicting claimants. In the absence of any actual possession, if there be any constructive possession, it must necessarily be in the holder of the best title, unless he had renounced it. And his constructive possession can never be ousted by any constructive possession claimed under the inferior title; nothing short of renunciation or actual disseisin can evict him.'"

Looking now to the claim of adverse possession asserted by Hensley and those under whom he claims, we find that this claim had its origin in the patent obtained by Robinson in 1885, and it is the contention of Hensley that, as he and those under whom he claims entered at least upon and took actual possession of a part of the De Groot patent 43198, this open, visible, and notorious entry and possession, which was maintained for the requisite length of time, placed him in possession of all the De Groot patents within the lines of the Robinson junior patent, and we have been furnished with some authority supporting this view. Overton's Heirs v. Davisson, 1 Grat. (Va.) 211, 42 Am. Dec. 544; Sharp v. Shenandoah Furnace Co., 100 Va. 27, 40 S. E. 103; Virginia & West Virginia Coal Co. v. Charles (D. C.) 251 Fed. 152; Rich v. Braxton, 158 U. S. 375, 15 Sup. Ct. 1006, 39 L. Ed. 1022. It should be said, however, that the land involved in the Rich v. Braxton case was located in Virginia, and the Supreme Court followed the ruling of the Virginia court in the Overton case, as did the federal court in the Charles case.

We do not think, however, that these cases are in accord with the weight of authority or the decisions of this court, and we are not disposed to follow them. Here we have a case in which four separate and distinct patents were issued for four separate and distinct, but adjacent, tracts of land. There had never been, on the part of the patentee or those claiming under him, any inclosure or actual possession of any part of the land covered by these patents. At the time Hensley set up his claim of right to it under the Robinson junior patent, all of this land was in the same wild, uncultivated, uninclosed condition that it was when the patents were issued, except the small clearing in patent 43198, adjoining the Gilbert land. It had never been converted into one body of land by fenced inclosure, and the mere fact that the same person happened to obtain the four patents at the same time did not have the effect of converting the land covered by them into one body, in the sense that an adverse claimant, by making an actual entry within one of the patents, might assert claim to the others or any part of them.

It would be extending far beyond reasonable or just bounds the doctrine of adverse possession to permit an intruder to perfect his claim of adverse possession to several adjoining, uninclosed, vacant tracts of land, each conveyed to the rightful owner by separate title, on the ground that he had taken actual physical possession of one of the tracts. It has been the policy of this court to limit the acquiring of title by adverse possession to states of case in which the adverse holding was sufficient to put the rightful owner on notice of its nature and extent, and if the owner of these De Groot patents should have found an intruder in the actual possession of a part of one of them, it would not bring home to him any notice whatever that the intruder had asserted or would assert a hostile claim to the other adjoining patents outside of the one on which he had settled. In 1 R. C. L. p. 729, the principle we have announced is thus stated:

"The doctrine that the actual possession of a part of the premises will be constructively extended to all the land described in the 'color of title' deed or patent related only to an entire thing; that is, the constructive possession can only extend to the whole of that which is partially occupied. It does not extend to other and distinct parcels, even though they are contiguous, and were conveyed to the claimant by the same person and at one time. The reason for this exception to the rules stated in the preceding paragraphs is that, in the absence of an actual adverse possession, the law constructively places the possession of land in the owner of the legal title, and the actual possession of one tract of land is not a sufficiently open and notorious possession of an adjoining tract, which is not occupied, to give the owner notice of the adverse claim thereto."

To the same effect are 2 Corpus Juris, p. 238; Elliott v. Cumberland Coal Co., 109 Tenn. 745, 71 S. W. 749; Carstophen v. Holt, 96 Ga. 703, 23 S. E. 904; Hornblower v. Blanton, 103 Me. 375, 69 Atl. 568, 125 Am. St. Rep. 300; Turner v. Stephenson, 72 Mich. 409, 40 N. W. 735, 2 L. R. A. 277.

If, however, the land covered by these De Groot patents had been inclosed by a fence, this act of inclosure would have converted it into one connected body of land; and thereafter, if Robinson, under a color of title patent, had made an entry on any part of this inclosed boundary, taking actual, open, notorious, and visible possession of same, and maintaining it without interruption for 15 years, this adverse entry and holding would have placed him in the actual possession of so much of the inclosed and fenced boundary as was embraced within the exterior lines of his color of title patent, because when the owner of contiguous tracts of land, that he has acquired by separate deeds or patents, converts them by fenced inclosure into one body, the interior lines of the patents or deeds under which he holds the land so inclosed will be obliterated, and actual possession within the fenced inclosure would put him on notice that the entrant was asserting a hostile title that might affect all of the inclosed land. On this point it was said in Parsons v. Dills, 159 Ky. 471, 167 S. W. 415, that:

"Appellants further contend that the proof of adverse possession is altogether insufficient. This contention is based on the assumption that, where a deed conveys several tracts by separate descriptions and not by one complete boundary, possession of one of the tracts for the statutory period is not a possession of the other tracts embraced in the deed. For this position there is respectable authority. 1 R. C. L. Adverse Possession, § 45; Hornblower v. Blanton, 103 Me. 375, 125 Am. St. Rep. 300; Carson v. Bennett, 18 N. C. 546, 30 A. D. 143; Loftus v. Cobb, 46 N. C. 406, 62 A. D. 173. However, in this state, where because of peculiar conditions the plea of adverse possession is regarded with more favor, that rule does not prevail. The deed, though invalid, is evidence of the extent of possession. Where, therefore, the tracts, though separately described, are conveyed by the same person, and embraced in the same deed, and are contiguous to each other, adverse possession of one of the tracts for the statutory period will extend to the whole. The owner or tenant holding under him may also move from one tract to another described in the particular deed, and the different periods of possession, just so they be continuous and aggregate 15 years, will constitute adverse possession of all the tracts described in the deed. Or the other hand, possession of one tract described in one deed is not of itself sufficient to constitute possession of another tract described in another deed as against a superior title holder."

We are therefore of the opinion that the adverse holding of Hensley and those under whom he claims must be confined to such of the De Groot patents as he made an actual entry in and took actual adverse possession of.

[3] The remaining question is: Has there been such actual possession of any of these De Groot patents as would give Hensley the right to hold them, or any of them, by adverse possession to the extent of the lines of the Robinson patent? The answer to this question depends largely upon the evidence; but, before considering it, it may be well to briefly restate a few pertinent facts relating to this feature of the case. It appears, as we have said, that Robinson, when he purchased the Gilbert tract in 1876, obtained a good title to it, and, having settled on it soon after his purchase, he proceeded to build on it a house and some outbuildings, and make a clearing for cultivation, which clearing and cultivation certainly extended into the De Groot patent 43198, and this adverse holding and possession within this De Groot patent continued without interruption to the date when this suit was brought by Hensley. So that, when Robinson in 1885 obtained his patent, which embraced, as we have said, practically all of the Gilbert land to which he had previously secured a good title, as well as parts of all the De Groot patents, this color of title patent did not, in and of itself, have the effect of putting Robinson in the possession of any part of the De Groot senior patents, because, under the very terms of section 4704 of the Kentucky Statutes:

"Every entry, survey, or patent made or issued under this chapter shall be void, so far as it embraces lands previously entered, surveyed or patented."

Therefore it was indispensably necessary, in order to put Robinson in the adverse possession of any of the De Groot patents to the extent of his color of title patent, that he should make an actual entry, accompanied by physical as well as open, visible, and notorious acts of adverse possession on the De Groot patents and within the lines of his color of title deed. The circumstance that Robinson, at the time and previous to obtaining his color of title patent, was in the actual possession of the Gilbert land, to which he had good title, did not have the effect of putting him in possession of any part of the De Groot patents embraced within the lines of his color of title deed, as nothing short of actual entry and possession within the De Groot patents would be sufficient to place him in the adverse possession of the De Groot land.

This question has been definitely and finally settled time and again by this court in the cases of Whitley County Land Co. v. Powers' Heirs, 146 Ky. 801, 144 S. W. 2, Burt & Brabb Lumber Co. v. Sackett, 147 Ky. 232, 144 S. W. 34, Brewer v. War Fork Land Co., 172 Ky. 598, 189 S. W. 717, War Fork Land Co. v. Marcum, 180 Ky. 353, 202 S. W. 668, Bowling v. Breathitt Coal, Iron & Lumber Co., 134 Ky. 249, 120 S. W. 317, and many others. In the Bowling Case, Bowling asserted claim by adverse possession to 100 acres of land to which he had a color of title deed, but no actual possession, upon the ground that he had lived for many years on a tract of land that he owned adjoining this 100; but the court, in rejecting the claim of Bowling said:

"So the question comes to this: Can a man who is living on a tract of which he has title, and which is outside of the plaintiff's claim, obtain adverse possession of land within the plaintiff's older patent simply by taking a deed to it and continuing to live outside of the lap?"

After quoting from Trimble v. Smith and many other cases, the court further said:

"If, in a case like this, a man could, while living on land which he admittedly owned, gain title within an elder patent, which adjoined him, by simply marking off a boundary and taking a deed from some one to it, where there was nothing on the land to put the owner on notice of his adverse claim to it, there would be no security for land titles, and the entire doctrine that the settlement of the junior patentee, when without the lap, will give him no possession within the senior patent, would have to be abandoned. The plaintiff, having the title to the land, was in the constructive possession of it. The defendant could not defeat this constructive possession by merely living on an adjoining tract of land, not included in the plaintiff's patent, and claiming land within that patent."

Again in the case of Brewer v. War Fork Land Co. we said:

"A person who has under a good title constructive possession of a boundary of land is not required to take notice of subsequent deeds or patents that may be acquired by strangers to his title, or to look to the records for the purpose of ascertaining if any person has subsequently secured a deed or a patent covering the land embraced by his senior patent. He need only look to the land itself. So long as the land itself is free from actual intrusion, his title and constructive possession will remain undisturbed and unaffected. These principles have been announced by this court in a long line of decisions, beginning with Trimble v. Smith, 4 Bibb, 257, decided in 1815, and ending with Cumberland Coal Co. v. Croley, 172 Ky. 222, decided in 1916."

But, notwithstanding the plain declarations in the cases cited that a person who has good title to a tract of land on which he actually resides cannot assert title by adverse possession to an adjoining tract that he claims under a color of title deed or patent, without having made any actual entry and taking actual possession thereof, attorneys are continually, but unavailingly, attempting to ignore the principle so firmly established.

[4] Turning, now, to the evidence relied on to show an actual entry and actual adverse possession in the De Groot patents, we find well proven the actual physical possession by Hensley and those under whom he claims of the Gilbert tract, to which he and those under whom he claims has, as we have said, good title, and there is also evidence conducing to show that Hensley and those under whom he claims asserted ownership to all the land within the lines of the Robinson patent; but, when it comes to showing an actual adverse possession within the lines of the De Groot patents, there is no evidence sufficient to establish any adverse entry or actual holding in any of these patents, except 43198, and the entry and cultivation within the lines of this patent appear to have been made after Robinson purchased the Gilbert land in 1876, and before he obtained his patent in 1885, but the clearing and cultivation within this patent have continued without interruption from the time they were first made.

It will be observed that the entry of Robinson in this De Groot patent was made before he obtained his color of title patent, and if he had not obtained this patent his right to hold any part of the De Groot land under an actual entry would have been confined to the lines of his clearing and cultivation. But, when he obtained the color of title patent, this clearing and cultivation placed him in the possession of the De Groot patent, in which the entry was made to the line of his color of title patent. This principle has been often announced by this court in cases holding that:

"Where one claims under color of title and is in actual possession of a part of the land within his boundary, the law, by construction, carries his possession to the full extent of his boundary; but, where he claims title by adverse possession only, he acquires no title to any land except that which is in his actual possession." Slaven v. Dority, 142 Ky. 640, 134 S. W. 1166; Richie v. Owsley, 137 Ky. 63, 121 S. W. 1015; White v. McNabb, 140 Ky. 828, 131 S. W. 1021; Harrison v. McDaniel, 2 Dana, 348.

Nor is it indispensable to put an adverse claimant under a color of title deed or patent in possession to the lines of his deed or patent that he should make an entry and take actual possession after he obtains it. It will be sufficient if it appears, as in this case, that the adverse claimant before he obtained his color of title patent made an actual entry and took actual possession of the vacant land of another within the lines of the color of title patent thereafter obtained, if it further appears that his actual adverse possession, made before he obtained his color of title patent, was continued without interruption up to the time the color of title patent was issued, and thereafter maintained for a sufficient length of time. So that we do not attach importance to the fact that the entry made by Robinson in the De Groot patent 43198 was made before he obtained his patent, because, after obtaining his patent, he continued in the actual physical possession of that part of this De Groot patent which he had been in the actual physical possession of before his patent issued, and his actual physical possession within this patent was of such nature and extent, and so open, visible, and notorious as to put the owner of the De Groot patent upon notice that an intruder had entered and was in the actual possession of a part of it.

[5] It is further claimed on behalf of Hensley that there was such entry and possession by those under whom he claims of the De Groot patent 43197 as to put him in the actual possession of this patent to the extent of the Robinson patent. It is shown by Blakeman, the surveyor, who was the only witness, except Dixon, who testified on the point, that the clearing made on the Gilbert land extended only very slightly into patent 43197, and was not sufficient either in nature or extent, considering the wild and uninclosed character of the country, to put the owner of the De Groot patent upon notice that any entry or possession had been taken within this patent. He said the clearing which extended within patent 43197 was "merely a pin point, so to speak"; it did not embrace one-fiftieth part of an acre; it would be hard for a person owning the adjoining boundary to discover the encroachment upon his land; he could not do it without a surveyor at all, and it would take the most careful surveying to discover any encroachment, or to determine whether the clearing was inside or outside of the Gilbert patent.

R. L. Dixon made a survey of this land for Hensley, and it is claimed in briefs of counsel for Hensley that his evidence shows that there was a considerable clearing within patent 43197; but an examination of his evidence does not support counsel. This evidence is not sufficient to show any right on the part of Hensley to claim by adverse possession any part of patent 43197, as it is too well settled to require even citation of authority that, when a hostile claimant undertakes to assert title by adverse possession to land in the constructive or actual possession of another, the nature and extent of his possession must be so open, visible, and notorious, considering the location, surroundings, and character of the land, as to give notice to a person of ordinary prudence that a hostile intrusion has been made on his premises.

We did not, of course, undertake to lay down any rule respecting the nature or extent of the adverse holding that will be sufficient to give to the real owner the requisite notice. This, as we have said, must depend largely on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. But, applying the principle announced to the facts of this case, it is perfectly plain that the small clearing, such as Hensley and those under whom he claims made in patent 43197, considering the wild, uncultivated condition of the country, and the fact that this clearing was merely an extension of the large clearing rightfully made on the Gilbert land, did not even approach the requisite of an entry demanded by the law of adverse possession.

Wherefore so much of the judgment as awarded Hensley any part of the De Groot patents, 43135-43137, is reversed. The judgment is affirmed as to patent 43198, and on a return of the case judgment will be entered in conformity with this opinion.

RODGERS v. LARRIMORE & PERKINS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 11, 1920.)

1. Contracts §10(1)—Must be mutuality of obligation.

One of the essential elements of an enforceable contract is mutuality of the obligation, and where it is left to one of the parties to choose whether he will proceed or abandon it, the contract is not binding upon either.

2. Pleading §248(4)—Allowing abandonment of cause of action by amendment not abuse of discretion.

Where assignee of purchaser in contract of sale of crop of tobacco sued on an alleged written contract, which was not binding because not mutual, court did not abuse its discretion in allowing an amendment to the effect that the writing was merely a memoranda of an oral contract, thus abandoning the cause of action set up in original pleading, in view of Civ. Code Prac. § 134.

3. Contracts §303(1)—Performance excused only where rendered impossible by act of God, other party, or operation of law.

Every person undertaking the performance of obligations under a contract must perform the same, unless performance is rendered impossible by act of God, by the other party, or by operation of law.

4. Sales §172—Levy of attachment did not relieve seller from obligation to deliver.

A seller in a contract of sale of tobacco was not relieved of his obligation to deliver to the purchasers or their assignees because a garnishment was served upon him, which created a lien upon the interest of one of the purchasers, where prior to sale to third parties the attorney for the attaching plaintiff notified him that a motion to discharge the attachment had been filed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Trimble County.

Action by Larrimore & Perkins against J. L. Rodgers. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene Mosley, of Bedford, and Charles Carroll, of Louisville, for appellant.

Edwards, Ogden & Peak, of Louisville, for appellees.

QUIN, J. This action was instituted in the lower court by appellees for alleged breach of the following contract:

"Milton, Ky. Nov. 28, 1916. We have this day sold to R. A. Perkinson & Smith my entire crop of tobacco grown in the year 1916, which tobacco, or any part thereof, I have not sold or contracted to sell to another consisting of about 18,000 pounds, at the following prices: About 18,000 pounds of bright leaf, red leaf, lugs, trashes, flying tips, green or worm-eaten at nine cents per pound delivered at his factory in HHds. Louisville, Wts by April 1, 1917, in good handling order free of any material damage, also to be well classed when stripped, and neatly tied in hands free of stalks and suckers.

"J. L. Rodgers."

By successive assignments appellees became the beneficiaries of this contract. Having taken appellant's deposition and ascertained the exact weight of the tobacco and the price realized on the sale thereof to other persons, the petition was amended to conform to the proof. A demurrer was sustained to the petition as amended. In a further amendment the cause of action was based upon a verbal contract between the original parties, substantially the same as that set out in the writing sued on. It was alleged that the contract referred to in the petition was a memorandum of said sale delivered to the purchasers by appellant, a duplicate of which, signed by Perkinson & Smith, was delivered to appellant. A demurrer to the pleading as thus amended was overruled, and this is one of the two errors urged for reversal. In one paragraph of the answer it was alleged that appellant was prevented from delivering the tobacco to the purchasers or their assignees because of a garnishment that had been served upon him, which created a lien upon Smith's interest in the tobacco, and that Perkinson & Smith having, upon request, failed to release said lien, they violated their contract, thus releasing appellant. The court sustained a demurrer to said paragraph, and this is the other error complained of. Upon the remaining issues raised by the pleadings a trial was had, resulting in a verdict in appellees' favor for $722.87.

[1, 2] It is contended the writing sued on was void because unilateral. One of the essential elements of an enforceable contract is mutuality of the obligation. Where it is left to one of the parties to an agreement to choose whether he will proceed or abandon it the contract is not binding upon either. Berry v. Frisbie, etc., 120 Ky. 337, 86 S. W. 558, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 724. Therefore the lower court properly sustained the demurrer to the petition, but, as amended, it was not demurrable. It is alleged in the last amendment that the parties entered into an agreement by the terms of which appellant agreed to sell and deliver his tobacco for the price stated, to be paid for according to Louisville weights, that Perkinson & Smith agreed and bound themselves to receive and pay for said tobacco, and this contract was evidenced by the memorandum of sale, thus we have all the essentials of a binding contract. Appellees were privileged if they so desired to abandon the cause of action set up in the original pleading. The courts of this state have been liberal in permitting the filing of amendments in the furtherance of justice. Civ. Code Prac. § 134. It was no violation of the court's discretion to allow the amendment in question to be filed. It is permissible, for example, in a suit upon an express contract, where only an implied contract is proven, to amend the pleadings to conform to the proof. Smith v. Robinson, 185 Ky. 76, 214 S. W. 776.

In Georgetown Water Co., etc., v. Smith, etc., 97 S. W. 1119, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 253, we held that the lower court properly allowed an amended petition to be filed, setting out the real contract under which the defendant was operating; plaintiff in the original petition having relied upon a former contract no longer in force.

[3, 4] The second proposition raised by counsel for appellant is unique. No authority is cited in support of same; we doubt if any can be found. The effect of their contention is that appellees' failure to release the attachment was an authorization to appellant to dispose of his tobacco to others. In other words, the levy of the attachment or garnishment released him from the obligations of his contract. The general rule is that a person undertaking the performance of certain obligations must perform same, unless the performance thereof is rendered impossible by act of God, by the other party, or by operation of law. An illustration of release under the third of the instances given is found in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Crowe, 156 Ky. 27, 160 S. W. 759, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 848, holding that where an act contracted for is rendered unlawful by the enactment of a statute before the expiration of the time for performance, the obligation is thereby discharged; but no court has held, so far as we have been able to find, that the mere levy of an attachment relieved a party from the obligations of his contract. While appellant is contending here that he was released from the contract with Perkinson & Smith, he did not hesitate to dispose of his tobacco to other persons. Nor do we have far to go to find the reason—the price of tobacco had advanced in the meantime. It appears further that the first consignment of the tobacco to the other parties was made February 12, 1917. On the evening of that same day appellant admits he received from the attorney for the attaching plaintiff a letter, notifying him that a motion to discharge the attachment had been filed in the clerk's office, and that he was at liberty to deliver the tobacco to Perkinson & Smith or their assignees. Notwithstanding this notice, he proceeded to dispose of his tobacco elsewhere. The motion to discharge the attachment was not acted upon until some time later, but this in no wise affected the parties. The institution and pendency of the attachment suit was no justification to appellants to sell the tobacco to other persons. He had bound himself by contract to deliver this tobacco to appellees, this was admitted on the trial, and, having violated this contract, appellees were entitled to recover for the breach thereof. The lower court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the paragraph of the answer referred to.

The judgment appealed from must be, and is, affirmed.

SEARCY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 8, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §417(2), 1169(1) — Statements to officer out of presence of defendant held incompetent, but not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for murder, testimony of a police officer that deceased had attempted to get a warrant for the arrest of defendant was incompetent, because the statements of deceased were made to the officer out of the presence and hearing of defendant, but not so prejudicial to defendant as to warrant reversal of conviction.

2. Criminal law §656(4)—Statement of court that there was evidence of certain fact when it was only hearsay, held erroneous.

In a prosecution for murder, where testimony that defendant had been ordered out of decedent's house was hearsay, and was admitted only to contradict a witness, the action of the court in stating to the jury, on objection to argument by the commonwealth's attorney that defendant had been ordered out of the house, that such was the case, held erroneous as calculated to mislead the jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Criminal Division.

Sam Searcy was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed.

Brent C. Overstreet and Homer C. McLennen, both of Louisville, for appellant.

Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SAMPSON, J. Appellant, Sam Searcy, shot and killed Henry Barger in the city of Louisville in May, 1918. An indictment charging Searcy with the willful murder of Barger was returned by the Jefferson county grand jury and a trial was had, resulting in a hung jury. Another trial was had on February 19, 1919, and the defendant found guilty and his punishment fixed at confinement in the state penitentiary for life. He prosecutes this appeal.

In his motion and grounds for a new trial he complains that the trial court admitted incompetent evidence offered by the commonwealth concerning the application of the deceased, Barger, to a police officer for a warrant for appellant, Searcy, and others, the said application and conversation concerning same being made out of the presence and hearing of Searcy, and also because the court allowed the commonwealth to introduce evidence showing that Mrs. Babcock, daughter of deceased, had not placed flowers upon the grave of her father. All this evidence was objected to by defendant, Searcy, but his objection was overruled by the court, and the evidence allowed to go to the jury. Complaint is also made by appellant of the failure of the trial court to allow him to introduce evidence of threats by deceased against other persons for the purpose of showing animus in deceased's mind at the time of and shortly before the tragedy, but the chief complaint of appellant is of improper argument of the attorney for the commonwealth in concluding the case.

Barger lived with his family on Seventh street, in Louisville, and his wife conducted a boarding house, at which appellant, Searcy, his brother, and some other persons boarded and were lodged. Barger himself had no regular occupation about Louisville, but stayed a large part of the time in Indiana, only occasionally coming home to spend a few days with the family. Searcy had employment at a mill or factory in the city of Louisville and went to work about 6 o'clock in the morning. On Thursday, before the killing happened on Monday morning, Barger came home, and going upstairs to the family room, he saw his married daughter, Mrs. Babcock, and appellant, Searcy, sitting on a bed. Mrs. Barger was out of the house attending to some shopping. Barger became enraged at Searcy and Mrs. Babcock, because they were sitting on the bed together, and began to make complaint and to privately threaten both of them with death. According to the evidence, the appellant was shortly thereafter informed that Barger had threatened his life, and on Sunday he approached Barger and asked him if he had made such threats, whereupon Barger denied having used such language. They talked the matter over, however, and composed their differences and the whole matter was dropped; Barger and Searcy returning to the house together. Later that evening Searcy and his brother and one of the Barger boys went into the city and remained until 10 or 11 o'clock that night. When they came in, Mrs. Barger and some of the children were down stairs in the dining room or kitchen, and when asked why they did not go to bed, gave the information that Barger was upstairs and had threatened to kill them all, and to kill Searcy also. At the time Searcy received this information he was on his way to bed, and he and his brother shortly thereafter retired; but Searcy deposes that he did not sleep but very little that night, because he was in fear of Barger. He says, about the time he went to bed, he placed a pistol on the davenport near by, so that he could defend himself. Barger's room was next to where Searcy slept, but he did not see Barger that night. Next morning early Searcy arose and went down stairs and ate his breakfast; he then went back upstairs for the purpose of getting his cap and some medicine to put on his face. In going from the stairs to Searcy's room he had to pass the room of Barger. After Searcy had obtained his cap and was leaving his room, passing the door of Barger, he says Barger suddenly appeared in the door with an open knife raised in a striking position, saying, "Now," and at the same time striking at Searcy with the knife, who at the same instant fired several shots into the body of Barger, killing him almost instantly. No one saw the shooting, but two of the young Barger boys were sleeping on a couch or bed in the upper hallway, and were awakened by the sound of the gun. Being drowsy and more or less alarmed, they did not know exactly what had happened, and reported to the family down stairs that their father had committed suicide. This story was told by the family to the police officers, who appeared on the scene very shortly afterwards. Searcy was arrested and charged with the crime, and very soon thereafter told the same story in substance that he testified to on the witness stand.

On the trial Officer Loran was called as a witness for the commonwealth and was asked, among other things:

"Q. What time did Mr. Barger go there on that occasion? A. On Sunday he came to me about 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

"Q. I will get you to state to the jury whether or not he endeavored on that occasion to get a warrant against three men. A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I will get you to state to the jury whether or not one of the men he was trying to get a warrant against at that time was this defendant, Searcy. A. Yes, sir."

[1] This happened on Sunday, before the killing on Monday morning about 6 o'clock, and this testimony was all objected to by appellant on the ground that, unexplained, it raised in the minds of the jury a belief that Searcy had threatened violence to Barger, or had committed some offense against him or his family. It is also objected to because the statements were made to the officer out of the presence and hearing of appellant. While we regard this evidence as incompetent, it is not so prejudicial as would warrant this court in reversing the judgment; but as there must be another trial for other reasons, the evidence given by Officer Loran as to what was said to him by deceased on the Sunday before the killing will be excluded.

On the trial Martha Barger, sister of deceased, was called as a witness for the commonwealth, and was asked:

"Q. I will ask you if, on the day or the night that your brother was killed, his wife told you that her husband, Henry Barger, had ordered Sam Searcy to leave his home. A. She told me that he did.

"Q. I will ask you if she further told you the reason he ordered him to leave his home was because he had gone home and found Searcy and his daughter, Mrs. Babcock, in the bed? A. Yes; she did."

In his closing argument Mr. Huffaker, commonwealth's attorney, referring to Searcy, exclaimed:

"He said he was afraid of this dead man; that he had been told of his threats. If you were afraid of him, why did you go back there that night? It was his home; it was his castle; he had a right there, and you had none there, when he had ordered you out."

To this assertion counsel for appellant objected, saying:

"There is no proof he was ever ordered out of the place."

Mr. Huffaker responded:

"There was proof from old Martha Barger he had ordered him out.

"By the Court: That is correct.

"By Mr. Huffaker: Very strong proof he was ordered away from there."

[2] To all of this appellant, Searcy, objected and excepted at the time. As will be observed from reading the testimony of Martha Barger, she did not testify that her brother, Henry Barger, had ordered Searcy from his home; but Martha Barger only testified that the wife of Henry Barger had told her Henry Barger had ordered Searcy from his house. What she stated was the merest hearsay, and was allowed only for the purpose of contradicting the wife of Barger, who had testified that she had not made such statements. The court had properly admonished the jury that the evidence of Martha Barger on that subject could be received and considered only for the purpose of contradicting the witness Mrs. Barger, if in their judgment it did so do. However, when the question was raised by the commonwealth's attorney at the conclusion of the case, and the attorney had asserted that Martha Barger had testified that Henry Barger had ordered Searcy away from the house, the court promptly sustained the commonwealth attorney, and made the statement to the jury in substance that the declaration of the attorney in his argument was correct, when in truth and fact it was not so. Such a statement was calculated to mislead and deceive the jury, and was highly prejudicial to the rights of appellant, Searcy; his theory being that as a boarder at the Barger home he was entitled to go and come at pleasure, since he had composed all differences with Henry Barger and had paid his board in advance for some weeks. There was no evidence whatever to support the declaration that Barger had ordered Searcy away from his home, and the commonwealth's attorney improperly charged Searcy with remaining at the home after he had been ordered to leave. This was bad enough; but when the trial judge, in the presence and hearing of the jury and over the protest of counsel for appellant, declared that the evidence did show that Barger had ordered Searcy away from his home, it upset entirely the whole theory of the defense, and no doubt was largely responsible for the verdict by the jury.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

Judgment reversed.

LEVY v. DOERHOEFER'S EX'R.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 8, 1920.)

1. Bills and notes \S 375—Gaming \S 19(1) —Note for gambling debt void even in the hands of bona fide purchaser.

A note given for a gambling debt is, under Ky. St. \S 1955, 1956, void in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice; the adoption of the Negotiable Instruments Act, providing for protection of bona fide purchasers, not modifying the gaming statutes.

2. Appeal and error \S 837(11) — Deposition considered by appellate court where exceptions were not made or passed on in lower court.

Under Civ. Code Prac. \S 589, where exceptions to the depositions of witnesses in a case referred to a commissioner were not passed on by the chancellor, or, if passed on, no exception was taken to his rulings, such deposition cannot be disregarded by the appellate court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Action by Frederick Levy against the Fidelity & Columbia Trust Company, as executor of Louis P. Doerhoefer. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Selligman & Selligman, of Louisville, for appellant.

Walter E. Huffaker, of Louisville, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. The controversy in this case is as to the right of the appellant, Frederick Levy, to recover of the appellee, Fidelity & Columbia Trust Company, executor of the will of Louis P. Doerhoefer, deceased, the amount of a note of $1,663.05, with 6 per cent. interest from its maturity, October 18, 1916, executed by Louis P. Doerhoefer July 18, 1916, to one Samuel Dinkelspiel, and payable to his order, who, acting on the advice of the appellant, Levy, July 25, 1916, indorsed the note to the Liberty Insurance Bank of Louisville, which accepted and discounted it at the request of Levy and upon his written guaranty that he would see it paid at maturity.

As the note was not paid at maturity by the maker or indorser, it was then paid by Levy in compliance with his guaranty and delivered to him by the Liberty Insurance Bank, containing the indorsement of Dinkelspiel, the payee. The death of Louis P. Doerhoefer having occurred in the meantime, this action was brought in the court below by the appellee, Fidelity & Columbia Trust Company, executor of his will, for a settlement of his estate, to which the known creditors of the testator were made parties defendant. By an order of the court there was an early reference of the cause to the master commissioner for the ascertainment and a report of the assets and liabilities of the estate, with authority to take proof regarding any controverted debt.

Among the claims presented against the estate was the note in question which appellant filed with the commissioner verified by the affidavits respecting such claims required by the statute. At the time of, or shortly after, filing the note with the commissioner, the appellant filed in the court below his answer to the petition of the appellee, executor, which was made a cross-petition against the latter, wherein was alleged the due execution of the note by Louis P. Doerhoefer to Samuel Dinkelspiel; appellant's ownership thereof by assignment from Dinkelspiel; its subsequent maturity and nonpayment by the maker; and the fact that it had been filed with the commissioner for its allowance by the latter as a debt against Doerhoefer's estate. By the prayer of the answer and cross-petition judgment was asked against appellee as executor of Doerhoefer for the amount of the note, and interest from its maturity.

To this answer and cross-petition of the appellant appellee filed a responsive pleading, styled an answer and reply, which denied appellant's ownership of the note or its assignment to him by Dinkelspiel, the payee, for value, and, in substance, pleaded the following facts as a bar to the recovery on the note sought by appellant, viz.: That the note was executed by Doerhoefer to Dinkelspiel in settlement and payment of the aggregate amount of various sums all lost by the former and won of him by the latter in divers unlawful gaming transactions between them, which, as further alleged, made the consideration an illegal one and rendered the note void ab initio; furthermore, that these facts and the consequent vice in the note were fully known to the appellant when and before it was assigned him or came into his possession; hence he did not become, and is not, a purchaser or holder thereof in good faith or for value. All affirmative matter of appellee's answer and reply was controverted by appellant's rejoinder. Following such completion of the issues and the taking of all proof offered by the parties, the commissioner in and by his report filed in the circuit court held the note void and refused to allow it as a valid demand against Doerhoefer's estate. Appellant filed in the circuit court an exception to so much of the commissioner's report as rejected the note, but on the hearing that court overruled the exception, confirmed the report, and dismissed the appellant's cross-petition. From the judgment manifesting these rulings, the latter has appealed.

[1] From what has been said of the contents of the appellant's pleadings, it will be observed that his claim of ownership of the note in suit is made to rest on its assignment to him by the payee, Dinkelspiel, and not upon the fact of his (appellant's) payment of it after it was discounted by the Liberty Insurance Bank for Dinkelspiel at appellant's request; for the discounting of the note by the bank, admittedly at appellant's request and upon his guaranty of its payment at maturity, as well as the time and manner of his payment of it and its delivery to him by the bank, was first developed by the evidence produced to the commissioner in his behalf. However, in view of his alleged ownership of the note, it is not material in which of the ways mentioned he acquired it. And if in fact the note was executed by Doerhoefer to Dinkelspiel in consideration or settlement of moneys lost by the former and won of him by the latter in gambling transactions in which they engaged, it is not material to the decision of the case whether the appellant at the time of purchasing or otherwise acquiring the note was or not ignorant that such was its true consideration. Therefore the important question presented for decision by the appeal is: Was the note given to evidence an indebtedness of the maker to the payee arising out of a gambling transaction or transactions? If so, the appellant, though shown by proof to be a purchaser for value and holder in good faith of the note, will not be allowed to recover the amount thereof of the estate of the deceased maker, in the absence of a further showing by proof that he was induced to purchase the note, or accept an assignment of it, by reason of the assurance of the maker that it was a legal obligation and would be paid by him, of which there is no evidence whatever to be found in this record. Kentucky Statutes, § 1955, provides:

"Every contract, conveyance, transfer, or assurance, for the consideration, in whole or in part, of money, property, or other thing won, lost or bet in any game, sport, pastime, wager, or for the consideration of money, property, or other thing lent or advanced for the purpose of gaming, or lent or advanced at the time of any betting, gaming, or wagering to a person then actually engaged in betting, gaming, or wagering, shall be void."

By section 1956 it is provided that recovery by suit at any time within 5 years may be had by the loser, or his creditor, of the winner, or his transferee having notice of the consideration, of any money to the amount, or property of the value therein stated, that may have been lost in gaming at one time or within 24 hours; and that such recovery may also be had against the winner, although the payment, transfer, or delivery was made to his indorsee, assignee, or transferee.

Another section of the statute makes it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine, for any person or persons to engage in any hazard or game of chance on which money or other property is bet, won, or lost; and yet others declare it a felony, punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, to set up and operate games for betting, bookmaking on racing, houses or contrivances for gaming, all conducing to show the law's abhorrence of gambling and that it is the public policy of the state to do all in its power to suppress the evil. It will be observed that the language of section 1955, supra, is exceedingly broad and forceful in its condemnation of all contracts resting upon a consideration arising out of a betting, gaming, or wagering transaction; for by it all such contracts are declared absolutely void. It extends no protection to the innocent purchaser or holder in good faith of a note given for a gambling consideration. In such a case the note will be declared void. Such has been the construction given the statute by numerous decisions of this court. In Bohon's Assignees v. Brown, 101 Ky. 354, 41 S. W. 275, 38 L. R. A. 503, 72 Am. St. Rep. 420, quoting from Cochran v. German Ins. Bank, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 196, decided by the superior court, we said:

"A bill or note based upon a gambling consideration is absolutely void, and the drawer or maker is not bound to even an innocent holder."

And in the case of Farmers' & Drovers' Bank v. Unser, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 966, the court said:

"The whole current of authority is that the obligor may insist upon the illegality of the contract or consideration, notwithstanding the note is in the hands of an innocent holder for value, in all those cases in which he can point to an express declaration of the Legislature that such illegality makes the contract void."

In Alexander & Co. v. Hazelrigg, 123 Ky. 677, 97 S. W. 353, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 1212, the opinion discusses at length the question under consideration and reviews numerous authorities bearing on it; and we therein held that, when a statute in express terms declared contracts growing out of wagering or gambling transactions, which are prohibited by statute, absolutely void, no recovery can be had upon a note evidencing such a contract, even where the action is brought by an innocent holder of the note. The contention was made in the case supra that Kentucky Statutes, § 1955, in so far as it declares contracts growing out of wagering or gambling transaction void, has been repealed by the Negotiable Instruments Act of 1904 (Laws 1904, c. 102), providing for the protection of innocent holders of negotiable instruments. In rejecting that contention we said:

"It has been the policy of this state to suppress gaming, and the statutes making gaming contracts void are founded upon what the Legislature has for many years deemed to be sound public policy. It is inconceivable that the General Assembly, in the passage of the act of 1904, for the protection of innocent holders of negotiable instruments, intended to or did repeal section 1955, Ky. St. 1903, which declares all gaming contracts void. In our opinion the disappointment now and then of an innocent holder of a negotiable instrument would not be as hurtful and injurious to the best interests of the state as the removal of the ban from gaming contracts."

See Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 197; Sondheim v. Gilbert, 117 Ind. 71, 18 N. E. 657, 5 L. R. A. 432, 10 Am. St. Rep. 23.

In the later case of Holzbog v. Bakrow, 156 Ky. 161, 160 S. W. 792, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1023, the doctrine that, where a note is given for a gambling consideration, its infirmity may be shown against a bona fide holder, was again approved, but with this qualification authorized by the facts of that case, viz.: That the maker of such a note who induces another to purchase it of the payee, assuring him that it is valid and will be paid, cannot set up the illegality of the consideration against the assignee, who had no notice thereof, as in that case the doctrine of estoppel will be applied to prevent such defense. Wooldridge v. Cates, 2 J. J. Marsh. 22; 16 Cyc. 783.

But, however great his ignorance of the illegality of the consideration for which the note here sued on was given, the appellant, as assignee thereof, cannot rely on such estoppel, as he has neither alleged nor attempted to prove that he was induced to purchase the note or accept an assignment of it by anything said or done by the maker. So, if the finding of the commissioner that the consideration for the note was a gambling debt or debts owing by the maker to the payee is supported by the evidence as set forth in his report, the action of the chancellor in overruling appellant's exception to such finding was amply authorized. And in looking to the evidence we find it all to the effect that the note was given in settlement of an indebtedness of Louis P. Doerhoefer to Samuel Dinkelspiel growing out of gambling transactions between them.

[2] It is true that the greater part of this evidence was furnished by the testimony of Huffaker, the attorney of Doerhoefer, and later of appellee, his executor, and by Brown, a servant of Doerhoefer, the competency of which is now complained of by appellant. But we do not find that exceptions were filed by appellant to this evidence with the commissioner or to his report on that ground after it was filed in court; and, if filed, it is manifest from the record that they were not passed on by the chancellor. It is a well-recognized rule of practice and procedure that, when exceptions filed to the depositions of witnesses are not passed on in the circuit court, or, if passed on, no exception was taken to the ruling of that court thereon, upon appeal the Court of Appeals will regard such exceptions as having been waived, and treat the case as if no question had been made as to the competency of the witness or witnesses, or as to the admissibility of his or their testimony. Civil Code, § 589; Hatfield, Adm'r, v. Hatfield, 166 Ky. 761, 179 S. W. 832; Lewis v. Wright, 3 Bush, 311; Corn v. Sims, etc., 8 Metc. 398; Bronston v. Bronston, 141 Ky. 639, 133 S. W. 584; Patterson v. Hansel, 4 Bush, 654; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Graves, 78 Ky. 74.

We are therefore prevented by the rule supra from passing on the competency of the evidence in question, which is not only uncontradicted, but strengthened by the testimony of the appellant himself admitting his intimacy with Dinkelspiel, the fact that the latter was his tenant when the note was executed, and his knowledge that he conducted in the building rented of him gambling transactions, such as bookmaking on horse racing and the like. Dinkelspiel was not introduced as witness.

On the whole case we find no reason for disagreeing with the report of the commissioner, or the action of the circuit court in confirming the same and dismissing the cross-petition of appellant. Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

DISTRICT BOARD OF TUBERCULOSIS SANITARIUM TRUSTEES FOR FAY- ETTE COUNTY V. BRADLEY, Mayor, et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 8, 1920.)

1. Constitutional law ¶35—Provisions mandatory.

All provisions of the Constitution are mandatory.

2. Constitutional law ¶47—Wisdom of Constitution not subject of judicial inquiry.

The wisdom of a provision of the Constitution is a matter with which the courts and other departments of the government have no concern.

3. Statutes ¶109—Title may be general, and provisions having natural connection with subject and not foreign thereto, satisfies Constitution.

The Legislature may make for an enactment such a general title as it chooses, in which case any provision having a natural connection with the subject expressed in title, and not foreign to it, satisfies Const. § 51.

4. Statutes ¶109—Title may be made as restrictive as Legislature chooses, and act violates Constitution if provisions are outside restriction, though proper under broader title.

The Legislature may make the title as restrictive as it chooses, and so far as the act contains provisions outside the limits thus marked out, it violates Const. § 51, though such provisions might properly have been included under a broader title.

5. Statutes ¶110½(4) — Section requiring city to levy tax for tuberculosis sanitarium not within title.

The title to Sess. Acts 1918, c. 65, is not sufficiently broad to give notice that the chapter contained Ky. St. Supp. 1918, § 2061a15, or extended the powers of a bureau to be created in the board of health beyond those had by the state tuberculosis commissioners, nor that it embraced a scheme for the creation of districts for the erection and maintenance of sanitariums and added to the powers of the trustees of such sanitariums the power to require cities of the second class to levy and collect the taxes at the behest of the trustees for the benefit of the sanitariums, and the act is void under Const. § 51, to that extent.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Action by the District Board of Tuberculosis Sanitarium Trustees for Fayette County against T. O. Bradley, Mayor of the City of Lexington, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Allen & Duncan, of Lexington, for appellant.

W. H. Townsend, Hogan L. Yancey, Henry B. Miller, and Jas. A. Wilmore, all of Lexington, for appellees.

HURT, J. This action involves the right of the district board of tuberculosis sanitarium trustees of Fayette county to require the mayor and commissioners of the city of Lexington, a city of the second class, to levy upon the taxable property within that city a tax and collect the same, for the benefit of the tuberculosis district which is composed of Fayette county. The right to do so is based upon the provisions of section 2061a15, vol. 3, Ky. Stats. Pursuant to such provisions the district board of tuberculosis sanitarium trustees of Fayette county made a demand of the mayor and commissioners of the city of Lexington to levy, for its benefit, a tax upon the property of the inhabitants of the city for the year 1920, sufficient, when collected, to produce the sum of $27,032.79. The mayor and commissioners refused to levy or collect the tax required. The district board of tuberculosis sanitarium trustees thereupon instituted proceedings against the mayor and commissioners to secure a writ of mandamus which would require them to levy and collect the tax. The mayor and commissioners resisted the motion for the writ upon the ground that the act of the General Assembly which authorized the demand for the levy of the tax and required them to make such levy and collect such tax was unconstitutional and void. The court sustained the contentions of the mayor and commissioners and denied the writ, and from the judgment the sanitarium trustees have appealed.

Several different grounds are relied upon as reasons for the invalidity of the statute, which authorizes the trustees of the sanitarium district to require the levy of the tax, and the mayor and commissioners of the city to make the levy and collect the tax, among which is that the statute was not enacted in conformity with the requirements of section 51 of the Constitution, and this objection to the validity of the statute will be first considered.

Section 51, supra, is in part as follows:

"No law enacted by the General Assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title. * * *

The authority to require the tax levy, if such authority exists, is wholly by virtue of section 2061a15, Ky. Stats. vol. 3, and is a part of subsection 9 of section 4 of chapter 65, Session Acts 1918. That part of the act of 1918 which constitutes section 2061a15, supra, is as follows:

"Provided, however, that in a district where-in there is a county or counties containing a city or cities of the second class the district board of trustees shall annually estimate and prior to December 31st lay before the general council or board of commissioners of such city or cities the need of such district for the site, erection and maintenance, or for improvements, additions and maintenance, or for improvements, additions and maintenance, or for the maintenance of the tuberculosis sanitarium for the next succeeding year.

"In order to raise such portion of this money as the board holds to be equitable proportion for the city or cities for the purpose or purposes above set out, such general council or board of commissioners shall at the next succeeding levy cause to be levied and collected a tax of not less than two cents and not more than eight cents on each one hundred dollars of property assessed for taxation for city purposes, and said levy shall be included in the annual appropriation ordinance for that year. * * *

The above-quoted statute is a portion of chapter 65 of the Session Acts of the General Assembly of 1918, and that enactment has a title which is as follows:

"An act relating to public health, repealing, amending and re-enacting sections 2054, 2059, 2060 and 2061 of the Kentucky Statutes, Carroll's Edition of 1915, relating to the state board of health, creating bureaus within said board to perform the functions of the existing state tuberculosis commission, the hotel inspector, the pure food and drug division of the agricultural experiment station, and for other purposes, creating county and district departments of health and providing and limiting appropriations of the state board of health and further defining its powers and duties."

[1, 2] All provisions of the Constitution are mandatory, and the duty imposed upon the courts is to construe and enforce them in accordance with their meaning and purpose. The wisdom of a provision of the Constitution is a matter with which the courts, nor any other department of the government, has any concern. Their wisdom, propriety, and desirability were tried out before the sovereign tribunal of the people, when the great plebiscite for that purpose resulted in their adoption as the supreme law of the land which cannot be contravened by the legislative, judicial, nor executive departments of the government, and any act or thing which is undertaken to be performed contrary to its provisions is void. Hence any act of the General Assembly which relates to more than one subject, or the title of which does not express the subject about which the legislation is attempted, is void. In construing the section of the Constitution, supra, to determine its applicability to any particular legislative act, the courts have looked to the purpose of its adoption and the evil sought to be remedied by it as guides and assistants to its interpretation. The courts have uniformly assigned as the reasons for its adoption that log-rolling legislation might be prevented, and to protect the legislators from surprise and fraud by provisions in legislative measures, the title to which give no notice of their contents, and might therefore be overlooked, or carelessly adopted, and, further, to apprise the public of proposed legislation so that the usual publication of the proceedings of the legislative bodies would give notice, to such persons as might read them, of the contents of the proposed legislative measures, in order that objectionable provisions might be opposed in a hearing for that purpose. These reasons will be found assigned for the adoption of the constitutional provision in a number of cases, among which is Commonwealth v. Bassett, 171 Ky. 385, 188 S. W. 459; Smith v. Commonwealth, 175 Ky. 291, 194 S. W. 367; Bosworth, Auditor, v. State University, 166 Ky. 436, 179 S. W. 403, L. R. A. 1917B, 808; Board of Trustees, etc., v. Tate, 155 Ky. 296, 159 S. W. 777; South v. Fish, 181 Ky. 849, 205 S. W. 329; Exall v. Holland, 166 Ky. 315, 179 S. W. 241.

[3] The Legislature in the enactment of a measure may make for it such a title as it chooses, and, as said in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 212, the title of an act is "the conclusive index of the legislative intent as to what shall have operation," and the Constitution has so ordained it. The title may be general, and in such a state of case any provision of the statute having a natural connection with the subject expressed in the title, and not foreign to it, satisfies the requirements of the Constitution. Johnson v. Higgins, 3 Metc. 566; McReynolds v. Smallhouse, 8 Bush, 447; Com. v. Starr, 160 Ky. 260, 169 S. W. 743; Johnson v. City of Fulton, 121 Ky. 194, 89 S. W. 672, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 569; Burnside v. Lincoln County Court, 86 Ky. 423, 6 S. W. 276, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 635; Conley v. Com., 98 Ky. 125, 32 S. W. 285, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 678.

[4] The Legislature may, however, make the title to an act as restrictive as it chooses, and in that state of case, as said in 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 589:

"Where the language employed in the title is such as would lead a reasonable man to suppose that the Legislature intended to restrict the scope of the act within certain limits specified in the title, such act is unconstitutional, so far as concern any provisions outside the limits thus marked out, even though such provisions might properly have been included in the act under a broader title."

Instances in which this court has held legislation to be unconstitutional, on account of the restricted nature of the subject expressed in the title, excluding matters which would have been germane to a broader title, will be found in the cases of Board of Trustees v. Tate, 155 Ky. 296, 159 S. W. 777; Henderson Bridge Co. v. Alves, 122 Ky. 46, 90 S. W. 995, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 994; Thompson v. Commonwealth, 159 Ky. 8, 166 S. W. 623; Board of Penitentiary Commissioners v. Spencer, 159 Ky. 255, 166 S. W. 1017; Burton v. Monticello Burnside Turnpike Co., 162 Ky. 787, 173 S. W. 144; Bosworth, Auditor, v. State University, 166 Ky. 436, 179 S. W. 403, L. R. A. 1917B, 808; Exall v. Holland, 166 Ky. 315, 179 S. W. 241; Ogden v. Cronan, Sheriff, 171 Ky. 254, 188 S. W. 357; Houston v. Boltz, 169 Ky. 640, 185 S. W. 76; South v. Fish, supra.

In Wiemer v. Commissioners, etc., 124 Ky. 377, 99 S. W. 242, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 523, it was said:

"The General Assembly may, by the terms used in the title, restrict the scope of the act to as narrow a plane as they choose; and it follows that, if the title be too narrow and restrictive to embrace any part of the body of the act, to that extent the statute will be unconstitutional, although the different parts of the body are sufficiently cognate as not to be inimical to the inhibition of the Constitution against placing more than one subject in an act."

It was in the same case held that the relationship of the body of the act to the title should be so "natural and obvious that the ordinary mind will readily perceive it." These rules of construction of section 51, supra, have been referred to and approved in Ogden v. Cronan, supra, and South v. Fish, supra. With the above approved rules of construction and the reasons for the adoption of the section 51, supra, in mind, the concrete question for determination presented by the instant case is, Does the title to the act of 1918 express the subject of the legislation embraced in section 2061a15, Ky. Stats. vol. 3, which is a provision of the act of 1918?

[5] It will be observed that the particular subject of legislation to be made by the act of 1918, as declared or expressed in the title, by reason of the language made use of, is somewhat obscure and doubtful, but this court, in South v. Fish, supra, in which the validity of subsection 20 of the amendment to section 2061 of the act was considered, determined, that the proper reading of the title to the act of 1918 was as follows:

"An act relating to public health, by repealing, amending and re-enacting sections 2054, 2059, 2060 and 2061 of the Kentucky Statutes, Carroll's Edition of 1915, relating to the state board of health," etc.

In another place, in the same opinion, it was said:

"By reading the title to this act one would naturally suppose that it related only to sections 2054, 2059, 2060, and 2061 of the Kentucky Statutes, and created the three bureaus therein specified."

Whether a proper reading of the title would make necessary the insertion of the preposition "by" or the conjunction "and" or the insertion of both, preceding the words "creating bureaus within said board to perform the functions of the existing state tuberculosis commission," etc., either would convey substantially the same meaning to one reading the title, and that would be that the act contained legislation which created a bureau within the board of health to perform the functions of the then existing state tuberculosis commission and would exclude the idea that a bureau would be created to perform the functions of any district board of trustees of a tuberculosis sanitarium, unless, at least, the district board performed functions as an agency of the state commission. A reference to sections 2054, 2059, 2060, and 2061, Ky. Stats., Carroll's Edition of 1915, which the title of the act of 1918 in part expressed as the purpose of the act to repeal, amend, and re-enact, readily demonstrates that neither of these sections treated of a tuberculosis sanitarium district, nor the duties nor functions of the state tuberculosis commission or commissioners, nor to taxation for the erection or maintenance of a tuberculosis sanitarium, and hence a reference to them by one who might read or see a publication of the proposed legislation by its title would receive no intimation that the legislation proposed under the title would or did contain any provisions providing for the creation of tuberculosis sanitarium districts or imposing taxes upon a city of the second class for the erection or maintenance of a tuberculosis district. Hence if the legislation contained in the act of 1918, touching the subject of creation of tuberculosis sanitarium districts and the imposition of taxes for the erection and maintenance of sanitariums, is anywhere expressed in the title, it is that portion of the title which is couched in the following language:

"Creating bureaus within said board to perform the functions of the existing state tuberculosis commission."

While, if it is conceded that the title of the act thus expresses that the act contains legislation which will create a bureau within the board of health to perform the functions of the then existing state tuberculosis commission, one naturally and logically reading the title would understand that the legislation in the act purposed to create a bureau in the board of health for the purpose, and to transfer to it the powers and duties and functions which the state tuberculosis commission then had, but he could not conclude that the act contained legislation extending the powers of the bureau beyond those then had by the state tuberculosis commissioners, nor that it also embraced a scheme for the creation of districts for the erection and maintenance of tuberculosis sanitariums, and adding to the powers of the trustees of such sanitariums, including the power to require cities of the second class to levy and collect taxes at the behest of the trustees and for the benefit of the sanitariums. The state board of tuberculosis commissioners was not created nor dealt with by sections 2054, 2059, 2060, or 2061, of the Kentucky Statutes of 1915, but was created and all its functions defined by section 4711b and its subsections of Kentucky Statutes of 1915, and was an act of the General Assembly of the session of 1912. There is no intimation in the title to the act of 1918, nor in the provisions of the act, of any purpose to repeal section 4711b, supra, nor any of its subsections, and if such act or any part of it is repealed, it is by implication. If one reading the title to the act of 1918 should have examined section 4711b, supra, and its subsections, to have determined what functions that the act of 1918 was proposing from its title to invest in the bureau to be created by it, he would have learned that the board of tuberculosis commissioners was a corporate body, the duties of which chiefly consisted in investigating the cause and prevalence of tuberculosis and encouraging the efforts for its eradication and the publication of information in regard to it, but without duties or powers touching the creation of tuberculosis sanitarium districts, or the levying of taxes for their erection or maintenance. He would have found that the duty and authority to levy taxes for the erection and maintenance of tuberculosis sanitariums was vested entirely in the fiscal courts of the counties, except in the instances where two or more counties were embraced in a district the fiscal court of each county should appropriate its equitable portion of the burden of the maintenance of the sanitarium to be ascertained under regulations to be prescribed by the tuberculosis commission. The creation of tuberculosis sanitarium districts was vested in the fiscal courts of the counties, or in the people of a proposed district to be expressed by their votes at an election to be held for that purpose. The only functions which the board of tuberculosis commissioners which is necessarily the same board as is referred to as the state tuberculosis commission, had with reference to the creation and conduct of a tuberculosis sanitarium district, were, that after the district was created it should nominate persons to be trustees thereof, and from the nominations the judge of the county court should appoint the trustees. The board of tuberculosis commissioners also had the right to select the site for a sanitarium in a district, and to recommend plans and specifications for the sanitarium, which it seems the fiscal courts were not obliged to accept, and it was also vested with authority to visit the sanitarium and prefer charges of misconduct or inefficiency against the trustees and employees thereof before the authorities which appointed them. The governing authority of the sanitarium was vested in its trustees, and these were without authority to require the fiscal courts to appropriate the sums it should designate for its needs, and the fiscal courts had discretion in fixing the appropriation to the needs of the institution. Hence it will be observed that the board of tuberculosis commissioners were without authority, as well as the sanitarium district trustees, to apportion any portion of the needs of a sanitarium to a city of the second class within the district, and to require its authorities to levy or collect a tax for either the site, construction, or maintenance of a sanitarium. The act of 1918, however, without any expression in its title of the subject of creating or maintaining tuberculosis sanitarium districts, or the powers or duties of the trustees of such a district to estimate the needs for maintenance or otherwise, and to certify same to the fiscal courts or commissioners of a second class city, but by the use of the language in the title which expressly limited the purpose of the act with reference to tuberculosis to legislation creating a bureau within the board of health to perform the duties of the then existing state tuberculosis commission, there was incorporated into the act, with other legislation with which we now have no concern, the section 2061a15 which authorized the district board of tuberculosis sanitarium trustees, where the district contained a city of the second class, in December of each year to estimate the needs of the district for the ensuing year for the site, erection, improvements, and maintenance of the sanitarium, and to fix the equitable portion which such city should appropriate for such purposes, and to lay same before the commissioners of the city who were required to levy a tax sufficient to produce the sum demanded and to collect and pay same to the sanitarium. No reasonable interpretation of the title of the act of 1918 could be made that would include such legislation within the subject there expressed. The title of the act thus limiting its scope to legislation affecting the public health by repealing, amending, and re-enacting sections 2054, 2059, 2060, and 2061, supra, a reasonable man would suppose by reading the title that so far as the amendatory legislation of those sections was intended it would be legislation touching such matters as were reasonably and naturally connected with the subjects dealt with in those sections. The title, so far as the subject of tuberculosis was expressed, limited the scope of the act to the creation of a bureau to which the functions of the state tuberculosis commission would be assigned. Section 2061, supra, to which the legislation in controversy here was enacted as an amendment, did not deal with the subject of tuberculosis, nor sanitarium districts, nor their creation, management, nor maintenance in any respect. Hence the powers conferred upon the trustees of the sanitarium district and the duties of the commissioners of second class cities with reference to the maintenance of sanitariums by the levying of taxes for that purpose, as set out in section 2061a15, Ky. Stats. vol. 3, was beyond the limits marked out by the title to the act of 1918, and the subject of same was not expressed in the title, although such legislation might have been included in the act under a broader title without violating the constitutional provision embraced in section 51 of that instrument, touching the requirement that a law enacted by the General Assembly can relate to only one subject, and that must be expressed in the title. It is unnecessary to consider any other objection to the validity of any of the provisions of the act.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. et al. v. WILLIAMS et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 11, 1920.
Petition for Modification of Opinion Sustained June 8, 1920.)

1. Eminent domain \S 293(4) — To recover compensation for destruction of passway by railroad embankment landowners need not prove title to passway in themselves.

In a proceeding to recover compensation for land appropriated by a railroad company for a right of way and for obstruction of a passway, a peremptory instruction in favor of the railroad company as to damages for the destruction of the passway was properly overruled, since it was not necessary for the landowners to show title in themselves to the passway in order to entitle them to prove that it had been obstructed by the railroad company as an element of damage.

2. Eminent domain \S 293(4)—Destruction of passway in appropriating land for railroad need not be pleaded in proceedings for compensation.

In a proceeding by landowners for compensation for appropriation of land and destruction of a passway by the construction of a railroad embankment, that no claim for damages for the destruction of such passway was made in the pleadings did not require a peremptory instruction in favor of the railroad company; the passway being a mere incident to the enjoyment of the premises, and its destruction being provable under a general averment or incidental damages.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Letcher County.

Proceedings by Hiram Williams and another against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and another, to recover damages for appropriation of land. Judgment for the former, and the railroad companies appeal. Affirmed.

Benjamin D. Warfield, of Louisville, and Morgan & Harvie, of Whitesburg, for appellants.

David Hays, of Whitesburg, and Wm. G. Deering, of Louisville, for appellees.

SAMPSON, J. In February, 1919, this case, under a somewhat different style, was before this court on a prayer for specific performance of an option contract for a right of way, and an opinion was delivered which contains a complete statement of the facts as well as the law applicable to this case, in large part. See Lexington & E. R. Co. v. Williams, 183 Ky. 343, 209 S. W. 59.

On the same pleadings the case on its return to the lower court was tried before a jury on a plea for damages, made by Williams and his wife against the two railroad companies, for taking and appropriating 1.4 acres of their land as right of way for damages incidental thereto. The jury returned a verdict in favor of Williams and his wife for the sum of $2,800 direct damages. The railroad companies are prosecuting this appeal and ask a reversal upon three grounds:

(1) Appellees were allowed to recover damages for the obstruction of a private passway, which was not located entirely upon their own lands, but partly upon their lands and partly upon the lands of another, while "the obstruction complained of," if there was an obstruction, was near the end of the passway and on the lands of a third person.

(2) The verdict is grossly excessive.

(3) The court gave to the jury erroneous instructions. It will be seen, however, that the chief, if not the only, error complained of by appellant is the failure of the trial court to admonish the jury at the conclusion of all the testimony not to consider evidence offered by appellees as to loss suffered by them by reason of the obstruction of the private passway.

This litigation started almost ten years ago. In 1910 the railroad companies obtained from one of the appellees, Hiram Williams, a written option of a right to appropriate a strip of land 100 feet wide through his farm, for the purpose of building a railroad. Mrs. Williams did not sign this contract, although she was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the farm. The railroad companies started construction work, to which Williams objected, and was threatening to eject the workmen, when the railroad companies instituted an action praying an injunction against Williams, staying him from interfering with their construction work. There was an injunction granted, but it was shortly thereafter dissolved on motion of Williams; in the meantime the railroad companies had instituted another action against Williams for specific performance of his option contract, and this latter action is the one in which the opinion supra was rendered. While these two actions were pending, Mrs. Williams instituted another action in her separate name, claiming to be the exclusive owner of the tract of land and seeking damages against the railroad companies for trespassing upon her property and appropriating a portion thereof. By special demurrer the question of defect of parties plaintiff was raised, and the court required Mrs. Williams to make her husband a party, which was done. In this action Mrs. Williams and her husband averred that the railroad companies had appropriated a strip of their land as a right of way and had entered thereon and constructed a railroad, which construction had in part filled up the channel of the Kentucky river, which ran immediately in front of their residence, thereby flooding their farm at intervals and washing away their lands; and, further, that the embankment of the recently constructed railroad obstructed and rendered of no practical use a certain passway used by plaintiffs in going to and from their home and farm across the river to their other lands, as well as to the public highway leading to the county seat. The railroad companies admitted that the Williams were the owners of the land in question, but they denied the trespass, as well as all damages resulting therefrom, and relied upon their right under the option given by Hiram Williams as a justification for entering upon the lands. At the trial the railroad companies offered to confess judgment for $50 for appropriating the 1.4 acres of land taken and used by them as a right of way, and $1,200 for damages to the adjacent property, or a total of $1,250, and tendered said sum to the plaintiffs for the taking of said property and for all damages incident thereto. This the appellees rejected.

[1, 2] Appellees alleged ownership in themselves of the lands in controversy and this was admitted by the railroad companies. Appellees also alleged that they had used and enjoyed a passway from their home and farm across the river to their other lands and to the highway, and this was not controverted. In the taking of proof, appellees started in to establish their title, but appellants, to save time, admitted that the plaintiffs were the owners of the lands, and this was noted of record. The first witness introduced, after telling about the obstruction of the channel of the river by the embankment of the railroad, told also of the obstruction of the passway by the railroad embankment. No objection was made to this evidence by appellants. Other witnesses gave similar evidence without objection, but at the conclusion of all the evidence the appellants moved for a peremptory instruction in their favor as to the damages for "the alleged destruction of the passway in controversy" upon two grounds: (1) Because the appellees had not shown that they owned the passway; (2) because the pleading did not make any claim for damages upon that ground. This motion was overruled by the court, and we think properly so, because in the first place it was not necessary for appellees to have alleged or shown title in themselves to the passway in order to entitle them to prove that it had been obstructed by the railroad companies as an element of damages. Whether they had a deed to it or not made little difference, if they had the right to use it. Furthermore, it was not necessary to set forth in the pleadings that damages would be claimed for the obstruction of a passway used in connection with the lands, because that is a mere incident to the enjoyment of the premises, and evidence of the obstruction or destruction of the passway was admissible under a general averment of incidental damages to the land from the taking of the strip for right of way. The second ground relied upon by appellants for peremptory instructions was equally without merit. The pleadings do sustain the claim for appellees to damages on account of the passway even by specific averment, but had there been no such averment appellees could have shown that they suffered damages by reason of the obstruction of the passway which was appurtenant to their freehold.

The other two grounds urged for reversal are rested upon the one we have just disposed of, and, the first one being without merit, the other two are rendered unavailing, for it is practically admitted by appellants that the damages are not excessive if the obstruction to the right of way could have properly been considered; and, further, that the instructions are not erroneous if the evidence concerning the obstruction of the passway was properly admitted. The right of appellees to recover not only for taking of the 1.4 acres of land as a right of way but for all damages to the remainder of the farm, which directly flowed from such taking, was fully recognized and established by the opinion on the first appeal.

Judgment is affirmed.

OWENS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 15, 1920.)

1. Constitutional law §206(1), 221, 267—Restrictions by Fourteenth Amendment on qualification of jurors only inhibits disqualification on account of race or color.

The Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution contemplates no other restriction upon the power of the state to prescribe the qualifications of jurors, except to inhibit a disqualification on account of race or color.

2. Criminal law §1134(3)—Court of Appeals cannot review action of court in refusing to set aside indictment.

Under Cr. Code Prac. § 281, no exception can be taken by the commonwealth to action of the circuit court in setting aside an indictment, or by the defendant to his refusal to do so; the power conferred by such statute upon the circuit court being beyond the revisory control of the Court of Appeals.

3. Constitutional law §221—Statute making final decision upon challenges to panel, etc., not discriminatory against race.

Cr. Code Prac. § 281, making the action of circuit court upon challenges to the panel and for cause upon motions to set aside an indictment final and not reviewable, is not unconstitutional as being discriminatory against persons of any race or color.

4. Criminal law §1004—Right of appeal not inherent.

Right of appeal is not a natural or inherent right, and the Legislature may declare under what conditions the right, when conferred, may be exercised.

5. Intoxicating liquors §238(4)—Whether defendant had liquors in possession for sale held for jury.

In a prosecution for having intoxicating liquors in possession for the purpose of sale, evidence held sufficient to make defendant's intent a question for the jury.

6. Criminal law §376—Reputation of accused admissible only where defendant offers proof thereof.

Testimony as to the reputation of accused is admissible only where accused has offered proof of his good reputation, or where he has offered himself as a witness.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hardin County.

William Owens was convicted of having intoxicating liquors in his possession for the purpose of sale, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. L. James, of Elizabethtown, for appellant.

Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

CLAY, C. William Owens was indicted for the offense of having intoxicating liquors in his possession for the purpose of sale. The indictment also charged that he had theretofore been indicted, tried, and convicted for a violation of the local option law. The jury found him guilty, and fixed his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for one year. He appeals.

It appears that two indictments were returned against the defendant, one in March, 1918, and the other in June, 1919. The defendant moved to quash the first indictment on the ground that he was a negro, that the grand jury which indicted him was composed of white persons only, and that the jury commissioners excluded from the list, from which the members of the grand jury were drawn, all persons of African descent because of their race and color, thus denying him the equal protection of the law, etc. On this motion evidence was heard and the motion was overruled. The defendant then demurred to the indictment, and the demurrer was sustained. On motion of the county attorney the case was referred to a subsequent grand jury, which returned the second indictment under which defendant was convicted. The defendant then moved that this indictment be quashed on the ground that he and members of his race had been discriminated against because persons of African descent had been excluded from service on the grand jury solely because of their race and color. The cause being submitted on the motion, the motion was overruled.

[1-4] Defendant insists that the court erred in overruling the motion without giving him an opportunity to present evidence sus taining the grounds relied on, and in support of this position we are referred to the case of Carter v. Texas, 177 U. S. 442, 20 Sup. Ct. 687, 44 L. Ed. 839. Precisely the same question was raised in the case of Miller v. Commonwealth, 127 Ky. 391, 105 S. W. 899, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 249, where the court held that section 281 of the Criminal Code deprived it of the power to review the alleged error. In discussing the question the court said:

"This court, recognizing the binding force of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which forbids any state to 'deny to any person within the United States the equal protection of the laws,' as far back as the year 1880, declared the then existing statute prescribing the qualifications of jurors unconstitutional in so far as it excluded from the jury service persons of the negro race (Commonwealth v. Johnson, 78 Ky. 509; Commonwealth v. Wright, 79 Ky. 22, 42 Am. Rep. 203; Haggard v. Commonwealth, 79 Ky. 366), and shortly thereafter the statute was so amended by the Legislature as to conform to the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution. It is not declared by the Fourteenth Amendment, nor has any court, federal or state, ever held, that a negro cannot lawfully be indicted and tried unless the jury is composed in part of persons of his own race, or that a white person cannot lawfully be indicted and tried unless the jury is composed in part of persons of his own race. The Fourteenth Amendment contemplates no other restriction upon the power of the state to prescribe the qualifications of the jurors, except to inhibit a disqualification on account of race or color. Strauder v. West Va., 100 U. S. 303, 25 L. Ed. 664; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370, 26 L. Ed. 567; Gibson v. Mississippi, 162 U. S. 579, 16 Sup. Ct. 907, 40 L. Ed. 1075; Carter v. Texas, 177 U. S. 443, 20 Sup. Ct. 687, 44 L. Ed. 839; Tarrance v. Florida, 188 U. S. 519, 23 Sup. Ct. 402, 47 L. Ed. 572. Upon the face of the record it may well be doubted whether the steps taken by appellant to sustain his plea in abatement and motion to quash the indictment so conformed to the practice obtaining in the courts of this state as to make it appear that he was prejudiced in any substantial right by the refusal of the circuit court to quash the indictment. But, without resting our decision of the question involved on that ground, there is another and sufficient reason why this court cannot exercise revisory power as to the alleged error complained of. It is forbidden by section 281 of the Kentucky Criminal Code of Practice, which provides: 'The decision of the court upon challenges to the panel, and for cause, upon motions to set aside an indictment and upon motions for a new trial, shall not be subject to exception.' Section 158 contains three grounds upon which the circuit court may set aside an indictment, the first being, 'A substantial error in the summoning or formation of the grand jury,' but no exception can be taken by the commonwealth to the action of the circuit court in setting aside an indictment, or by the defendant to its refusal to do so. The power conferred upon the circuit court by the mandatory provisions of section 281 is broad and beyond the revisory control of this court. Commonwealth v. Si- mons, 100 Ky. 164, 37 S. W. 949, 18 Ky. Law Rep. 648. Section 281 was enacted after the repeal of the former statute disqualifying persons of the colored race for jury service. It does not in the meaning or effect discriminate against persons of any race or color, and its enactment, according to numerous decisions of this court, was clearly within the bounds of legislative discretion. The right of appeal is not a natural or inherent right. Indeed, in the state of Kentucky an appeal in a criminal or penal case was not allowed prior to the year 1853, but the right was then conferred by statute, and has ever since existed by legislative sanction, subject to certain conditions and limitations imposed by the same power. If competent to confer or withhold the right of appeal, the Legislature may declare under what conditions the right, when conferred, may be exercised, and the courts of the state, in administering the law, must obey the legislative will by observing the restrictions imposed. In other words, in matters appealable, the revisory power of this court is restricted by the conditions and limitations imposed by statute."

The views above expressed have been uniformly adhered to, and we have frequently written that section 281 of the Criminal Code applies with equal force to all persons, regardless of their race, color, or circumstances in life, and that the action of the trial court upon challenges to the panel, and for cause, or upon motion to set aside an indictment, however erroneous or prejudicial it may be, cannot be reviewed on appeal. Harris v. Commonwealth, 163 Ky. 781, 174 S. W. 476; Frasure v. Commonwealth, 180 Ky. 274, 202 S. W. 653; Smith v. Commonwealth, 154 Ky. 613, 157 S. W. 1089; Leadingham v. Commonwealth, 182 Ky. 291, 206 S. W. 483; Slaughter v. Commonwealth, 152 Ky. 128, 153 S. W. 46. It necessarily follows that we are without jurisdiction to determine whether the trial court erred in overruling the motion to set aside the indictment.

[5] It is next insisted that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the charge that the defendant had intoxicating liquor in his possession for the purpose of sale. H. L. Blakey, who had been hired to get people to violate the local option law, testified that during the last week of January, 1917, he went to defendant's home and purchased a pint of whisky from him, paying him a dollar for it. He also purchased whisky from him on several other occasions. Robert McCullum, who was also employed to get persons to violate the local option law, testified that on one occasion he went to defendant's house with Blakey. The defendant went into the house and returned with a pint of whisky, which he sold to Blakey. Since this evidence showed that defendant had whisky in his home and was engaged in selling it, it was sufficient to make it a question for the jury whether he had the whisky in his possession for the purpose of selling it.

[6] The last error assigned presents a more serious question. Several prominent citizens of the county were permitted to testify that the defendant had the reputation of being a bootlegger. There are only two ways by which the reputation of the accused may be put in issue: (1) Where he has offered proof of his good reputation; (2) where he has offered himself as a witness. Gregory's Criminal Law, § 1096; Combs v. Commonwealth, 160 Ky. 386, 169 S. W. 879; Romes v. Commonwealth, 164 Ky. 388, 175 S. W. 669. Here, however, the accused did not offer proof of his good reputation, or go on the witness stand, but evidence that his reputation was that of a bootlegger was permitted to go to the jury as substantive evidence of his guilt, and the authorities all agree that this cannot be done. 4 Chamberlayne on Evidence, § 3275; 8 R. C. L. § 208, p. 212. We are also of the opinion that the admission of this evidence was prejudicial error, in view of the character of evidence by which the defendant's conviction was secured.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

WORLD GRANITE CO. v. MORRIS BROS.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. June 5, 1920.)

Courts \rightarrow 80(1)—Defendant in equity suit demanding jury trial in answer not to be deprived thereof by rule of court.

Chancery court could not deprive a defendant who has demanded a jury trial in his answer of the right to such trial given him by Shannon's Code, § 6283, in view of sections 5739, 5740, 6282, 6284, though defendant had not complied with rule of court requiring defendant to demand a jury by a motion in court after joinder of issue, such statute being mandatory, and such rule of court being in conflict therewith.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Shelby County; F. H. Heiskell, Chancellor.

Bill by the World Granite Company against Morris Bros. Decree for complainant, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

L. T. M. Canada, of Memphis, for appellants.

Banks & Harrelson, of Memphis, for appellee.

McKINNEY, J. The original bill in this cause was filed by the World Granite Company to recover from Morris Bros., a partnership, an account amounting to $1,420.

Defendants answered the bill, denying that they were indebted to the complainant in any sum, and in said answer demanded a jury to try the issues.

When the cause came on for hearing, the defendants insisted on having same tried by a jury, but the chancellor was of the opinion that they were not entitled to a jury, and, over their objection, heard the cause without a jury.

The defendants declined to offer any proof, and upon the evidence introduced by the complainant the chancellor entered a decree in its favor for the amount sued for. The defendants have appealed from said decree, and have assigned as error the action of the chancellor in denying them a trial by a jury.

The pertinent provisions of our statutes (Shannon's Code) in regard to jury trials in chancery causes are as follows:

"Sec. 6282. Either party to a suit in chancery is entitled, upon application, to a jury to try and determine any material fact in dispute, and all the issues of fact in any case shall be submitted to one jury.

"Sec. 6283. If the demand is made in the pleadings, the cause shall be tried at the first term before a jury summoned instantan, in the same way that jury causes are tried at law.

"Sec. 6284. If the demand is only made after the cause is ready for hearing, the trial will be before a jury summoned instantan upon the like evidence as a suit at law, together with such parts of the bill, answers, depositions, and other proceedings in the cause, as the court may order."

"Sec. 5739. The chancellors of this state, or a majority of them, may make such rules as they may deem beneficial and proper to regulate the practice of the chancery courts, not inconsistent with the provisions of this Code; and the rules thus agreed upon shall be obligatory on all the chancery courts.

"Sec. 5740. In the absence of any such action by the chancellors as a body, each chancellor may make rules and regulations of practice for the purpose of expediting business in his own chancery division."

The rules of the chancery court of Shelby county provide that, even where a jury is demanded in the pleadings, such demand will be treated as waived, unless the party demanding the jury make a motion in court, after the cause is at issue, for an order to have the cause placed on the jury calendar. The defendants did not comply with this rule, and we presume that it was for this reason that the chancellor declined to submit the issues to a jury.

The rules further provide that no cause shall be placed on the jury calendar until an order has been entered directing it.

It is insisted by the defendants that such a rule is inconsistent with the statute, and, they having demanded a jury in their answer, it was the duty of the clerk to enter the cause upon the trial docket, and that the chancellor has no right to make any rule that would deprive them of the right given them by the statute.

The statute in question is mandatory, and provides that where a jury is demanded in the pleadings the cause shall be tried before a jury.

In Harris v. Bogle, 115 Tenn. 701, 92 S. W. 850, this court had under consideration a chancery rule which provided that—

"Application for a jury must be made by petition in open court upon the first day of the trial term."

The court said:

"It is observed that the sections last quoted [5739 and 5740] forbid the making of any rules which are inconsistent with the provisions of the Code.

"The rule above quoted has no application to the case contemplated in Code, § 6283. If there be any conflict it must be with the provisions of section 6284. This provides for the making of an application 'after the cause is ready for hearing.' That section does not, in terms, give the right to demand a jury at any time after the cause is ready for hearing. This omission left the matter open to regulation by rule of the court under the sections of the Code above quoted upon that subject."

Where the demand for a jury is made in the pleadings, section 6283, in express terms, gives the right to a jury trial. The omission referred to above in section 6284 does not occur in section 6283; therefore the chancellors were without power to change said statute by rule, and the rule in question does conflict with the statute.

The Code provides that the cause shall be tried by a jury where the demand is made in the pleadings. The rule of the court provides, in effect, that notwithstanding this plain mandate of the statute, such jury trial shall not be had unless certain other things are done. In discussing the rule under consideration in Harris v. Bogle, supra, this court said:

"This we think a reasonable regulation, preventing surprise to the adverse party and affording opportunity to obtain a jury."

These reasons are potent in a cause like the one being considered in that case, but such reasons would not apply in a cause like the present one for the adverse party was given notice upon the filing of the answer, and as soon as the cause was at issue, that the defendants desired to have the cause heard by a jury, and hence the complainant could not be surprised.

It is likewise apparent that this means of demanding a jury is just as effective as appearing in open court, as provided by the rule, and moving for an order to have the cause heard by a jury, and the opportunity for summoning the jury is certainly afforded where the demand is made in the pleadings as much so as where the demand is made in open court.

Counsel for the complainant, in their brief, have not presented any reason or shown any necessity for such a rule as the one we are here considering, and none occurs to us. Nor has it been pointed out how such a rule could be upheld without contravening the provisions of the Code.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the defendant was entitled to have the issues tried by a jury.

As soon as the cause was at issue, a demand for a jury having been made in the pleadings, the clerk should have entered the cause upon the trial docket.

For the error in declining to submit the cause to a jury, the cause will be reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

BOYD v. McCARTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. May 29, 1920.)

1. Landlord and tenant §223(6)—Lessees, knowing premises dilapidated, took them at their own risk.

Where a florist and his successor, at time of lease and transfer, knew leased premises were dilapidated, and lease contained no covenant by landlord to make repairs, florist and successor took premises at their own risk, and there was no implied covenant by landlord that they were fit for the purposes for which rented, so that florist could not as against landlord's demand for rent recoup for damages when bricks fell from the house to the greenhouse.

2. Landlord and tenant §172(3)—Failure to repair not a constructive eviction.

Failure of landlord to repair leased premises was not a constructive eviction of the lessees, where the dilapidated condition of the premises was not the result of any wrongful act of the landlord, who was not under obligation, express or implied, to repair.

3. Landlord and tenant §152(2)—Subsequent promise of landlord to repair void as without consideration.

Where the lessees of a brick house and greenhouse gave notes for the rent, the subsequent promise of the landlord's son, as her agent, to make repairs, was without consideration, and imposed no obligation on the landlord.

4. Landlord and tenant §192(1)—Threat of condemnation does not affect rights of parties.

Since the destruction of leased property by municipal action does not relieve the tenant from the obligations of his lease, mere threat of condemnation does not affect the contract rights of the parties.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Shelby County; F. H. Heiskell, Chancellor.

Suit by Mrs. L. R. Boyd against H. W. McCarty and another. From decree for defendants, complainant appeals. Decree reversed, and decree rendered for complainant.

J. H. Watson, of Memphis, for appellant.

R. Lee Bartels, of Memphis, for appellees.

GREEN, J. The complainant entered into a contract with Pierson & McCarty Company on January 25, 1910, whereby complainant leased to Pierson & McCarty Company for a term of ten years from March 9, 1910, certain property in Memphis described as "the two-story brick house and lot on west side of Dunlap street, 105 feet fronting on Dunlap street, and running back to Ragland avenue, near north gate of Elmwood Cemetery." This property was rented for greenhouse purposes. The rent was $3,600, evidenced by 120 notes for $30 each, payable monthly. In addition to the notes the lessees were to pay certain taxes on the property during the term. There is no other provision of the lease material to this inquiry.

Pierson & McCarty Company seems to have been a trade-name under which S. G. Hexter was doing business as a florist. He conducted this business at this place up until the year 1916, when he transferred his lease to defendant McCarty, who continued the same kind of business on these premises.

The rent notes were paid by Hexter and McCarty until March, 1917. They have made no payments since. This bill was filed to recover the amount of the unpaid notes, and also certain taxes which it is alleged the defendants failed to pay according to contract.

The defendants answered and interposed a certain claim for damages by way of recoupment, and the chancellor rendered a decree in defendant's favor, from which the complainant has appealed.

The proof shows that the house on this property was in a dilapidated condition when the lease was made. It does not appear, however, to have been in such condition as that it amounted to a nuisance to anybody prior to 1915. At that time the city authorities condemned the house as unsafe and ordered it to be torn down, but this order was never enforced.

Defendants' claim for damages arises in this way: The greater portion of the lot not occupied by the house was covered with greenhouses. Defendants allege and introduce proof tending to show that in March, 1917, bricks and shingles from the old house blew down on the greenhouse and broke the glass, and the flowers and plants in the greenhouse were thereby exposed and damaged by the cold. This damage in March, 1917, is estimated to have been about $80. In December, 1917, the glass on the greenhouse was again broken in the same way during a severe spell of weather, and defendants claimed that the contents of the greenhouse was damaged to the extent of about $1,300. After the last accident McCarty vacated the premises.

The defendants ceased to pay rent notes after the loss in March, 1917, and called upon complainant to repair the old house and make it safe. There is a letter in the record from the son of complainant, who is alleged to have been her agent in response to this demand of defendants for repairs, in which he agreed that the necessary repairs would be made. Defendants also testify to other assurances from complainant's son that he would have such repairs made.

Under these circumstances the chancellor was of opinion that defendants were entitled to recoup their damages against the complainant's demand for unpaid rent. In this we think his honor was in error.

The lease contract contains no covenant on the part of the landlord to make any repairs to the premises demised. The defendant Hexter was familiar with the condition of the property when he leased it, and defendant McCarty was familiar with the condition of the property when he took a transfer of the original lease to himself. There was no fraud whatever on the part of the lessor.

[1] We think under such circumstances the tenant takes the premises as he finds them at his own risk, and there is no implied covenant to be ascribed to the landlord that they are fit for the purposes for which they are rented. It therefore follows that the landlord is not responsible to his tenant under such circumstances for damages occasioned by the landlord's failure to repair them.

Principles governing this case have been set out by the court in Schmalzried v. White, 97 Tenn. 36, 36 S. W. 393, 32 L. R. A. 782, where, speaking of the landlord, the court said:

"It does not make him an insurer to the tenant. On the contrary, in the ordinary contracts of letting, it does not imply any warranty on the part of the landlord that the leased premises are in a safe and habitable condition, since the tenant ordinarily has it in his power to inspect the premises and so accept them at his own risk. Buswell on Law of Per. Inj., 82.

"In Edwards v. N. Y. & H. R. R. R., 98 N. Y. 246, it is said: 'It is a universal rule, to which no exception can be found in any case now regarded as authority, that, upon the demise of real estate, there is no implied warranty that the property is fit for occupation or suitable for the use or purpose for which it is hired.'

"In Jaffe v. Hartean, 56 N. Y. 398 (S. C., 15 A. R. 438), it was held that 'a lessor of buildings, in the absence of fraud or any agreement to that effect, is not liable to the lessee or others lawfully upon the premises for their condition, or that they are tenantable and may be safely and conveniently used for the purposes for which they are apparently intended.'

"In Francis v. Cockrell, L. R. 5 Q. B. 501, Kelley, C. B., said that there was no implied warranty by the lessor that the demised real estate 'shall be reasonably fit, or fit at all, for the purpose for which it is let'; and in Keates v. Cadogan, 10 C. B. 591, the rule is stated to be that 'no action lies by a tenant against a landlord on account of the condition of the premises leased, in the absence of an express warranty or active deceit.'

Schmalzried v. White, supra.

[2] It is urged that the failure on the part of the complainant to repair these premises amounted to a constructive eviction of the defendants. This could not, however, be true unless the duty of making repairs rested upon the lessor.

"The mere fact, however, that the premises become untenable if such condition is not the result of any wrongful act of commission or omission on the part of the landlord cannot be the basis of an eviction." 16 R. C. L. p. 636.

"Eviction necessarily being the result of an intended, willful, wrongful act, it must be a willful omission of duty or a commission of a wrongful act where there is no duty not complied with, and no wrongful act committed by the landlord toward the tenant, no eviction occurs." Barrett v. Boddie, 158 Ill. 479, 42 N. E. 143, 49 Am. St. Rep. 172.

[3] It is insisted that the complainant became legally obligated to make repairs by reason of the promise of her son and agent heretofore referred to. We think, however, this promise was absolutely without consideration. The agreement of the defendants to remain and to pay the rent notes furnish no consideration for this promise to repair, even if the authority of the agent in this respect be conceded. The lessees were bound to pay the rent notes anyhow, and the agreement relied on was nudum pactum. Such is the weight of authority. Gregor v. Cady, 82 Me. 131, 19 Atl. 108, 17 Am. St. Rep. 466; Eblin v. Miller, 78 Ky. 371; Proctor v. Keith, 12 B. Mon. (Ky.) 252.

Defendants rely on Ehinger v. Bahl, 208 Pa. 250, 57 Atl. 572, and Beakes v. Holzman, 47 Misc. Rep. 384, 94 N. Y. Supp. 33, announcing a contrary rule. We think these cases can be distinguished on their facts. If not, we regard the authorities first cited as better reasoned.

[4] Defendants refer us to cases which hold that, when the property leased is condemned by municipal authorities, the cost of tearing it down or repairing it, as between landlord and tenant, must be borne by the former. We do not think these cases are pertinent. It has been expressly decided in this state that the destruction of leased property by municipal action does not relieve the tenant from the obligations of his lease. Banks v. White, 33 Tenn. (1 Sneed) 613. Mere threat of condemnation, therefore, would not affect the contract rights of the parties.

Willcox v. Hines, 100 Tenn. 524, 45 S. W. 781, 68 Am. St. Rep. 761, and Hines v. Willcox, 96 Tenn. 148, 33 S. W. 914, 34 L. R. A. 824, 832, 54 Am. St. Rep. 823, are obviously not relevant. These cases relate to defects of which the tenants are ignorant.

The decree of the chancellor must accordingly be reversed, and a decree rendered here for the complainant. If the parties can agree on the amount thereof, such a decree may be prepared and entered. The defendants will pay the costs.

Ex parte COWARD. (No. 3335.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

1. Injunction ~~231~~ — Commitment for contempt not disturbed because of irregularity in order, where properly amended.

Though the original verbal order adjudging relator in contempt for violating an injunction directing imprisonment and fine was bad because oral and imposing a penalty in excess of that allowed, yet, where the judge amended his order reducing the fine and jail sentence to authorized limits, the commitment will not be disturbed because of the invalidity of the original order.

2. Injunction ~~148(1)~~ — Statutory requirement of bond applies to divorce suit.

Notwithstanding Rev. St. 1911, arts. 4638, 4639, the statute making the giving of a bond a condition precedent to the issuance of an injunction applies to a divorce suit.

Petition by R. A. Coward for writ of habeas corpus. Writ granted, and relator discharged.

Leonard Brown and W. H. Russell, both of San Antonio, for plaintiff.

PHILLIPS, C. J. The relator as the defendant in a divorce proceeding was temporarily enjoined by the Special District Judge of one of the District Courts of Bexar County from molesting his wife and interfering with her control of certain property. For disobeying the injunction he was by the Special District Judge held in contempt, and by verbal order a fine of $500.00 assessed against him and a sentence of 60 days in jail imposed. No commitment was issued on this verbal order. The sheriff acted, it appears, wholly upon the mere oral direction of the Judge.

The injunction writ had issued without the giving of any bond by the plaintiff in the suit. Apparently, no bond was required of the plaintiff.

The relator having applied here for a writ of habeas corpus following his being adjudged in contempt, the Special District Judge, before action here on the application and while the District Court was still in session, amended his order in the contempt proceeding, entering a written judgment as of the date of the original order, adjudging the relator in contempt and reducing the penalty imposed to a fine of $100.00 and 3 days imprisonment in jail; a certified copy of the judgment as amended being duly delivered to the sheriff as a commitment.

[1] The Special District Judge had no authority to assess against the relator for disobedience of the injunction any such fine or impose any such jail sentence, as was originally ordered. Nor did he have any authority to direct the imprisonment of the relator by his verbal order. Since, however, he amended his judgment or order, reducing the fine and jail sentence to the limits he was authorized under the statute to impose and there was placed in the hands of the sheriff as a commitment a certified copy of the amended order before the writ of habeas corpus was issued by this court, we would not direct the relator's discharge because of the invalidity of these original proceedings.

[2] Under the statute the giving of a bond is made a condition precedent to the issuance of an injunction. This requirement applies to divorce suits brought by the wife, notwithstanding Articles 4638 and 4639. Wright v. Wright, 3 Tex. 168. The Judge was therefore without power to grant the injunction without requiring a bond from the plaintiff, and the injunction was accordingly void. Williams v. Huff, Dallam, 554; Diehl v. Friester, 87 Ohio St. 473; Lawton v. Richardson, 115 Mich. 12, 72 N. W. 988.

The injunction being void, the contempt orders were equally so.

The relator is discharged.

CITY OF FT. WORTH v. CURETON, Atty. Gen. (No. 3351.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ~~958~~ — Amendment to Ft. Worth charter, allowing an additional tax for school purposes, did not decrease general taxing power.

The amendment to the Ft. Worth charter, adopted June 17, 1919, pursuant to Const. art. 11, § 5, as amended, which allowed additional taxes for general school purposes, etc., did not diminish the city's general taxing power fixed by the charter at $1.75 per $100, which, however, included the school tax limited to 50 cents per $100, and, hence, a bond issue cannot be rejected on the ground that the taxing power was so reduced.

2. Municipal corporations ~~918(1)~~ — Under Ft. Worth charter only qualified voters paying property taxes may vote at bond election.

Under the referendum provisions of the Ft. Worth charter, only qualified electors paying property taxes may vote at an election to issue bonds, and the bond issue cannot be attacked on the ground that the electors were restricted to such persons.

Original petition by the City of Ft. Worth for a writ of mandamus against O. M. Cureton, Attorney General. Writ granted.

T. J. Powell, D. W. Odell, and R. M. Rowland, all of Ft. Worth, for plaintiff.

Hon. C. M. Cureton, Atty. Gen., and W. P. Dumas, Asst. Atty. Gen., for defendant.

PHILLIPS, C. J. The Attorney General having refused to approve a bond issue of the City of Fort Worth in the amount of $1,890,- 000—$400,000 of the bonds being for water works purposes, the City prays for a mandamus to compel his approval of the issue.

The bonds and the tax necessary to provide for their payment, principal and interest, were duly voted at an election held April 8, 1919, for the purpose. The objections to them made by the Attorney General are based upon his construction of certain provisions in the City's charter. If that construction is erroneous, it is conceded that the bonds should have his approval.

The charter of the City granted by the Legislature in 1900 gave it the power to levy for general purposes a tax not exceeding $1.75 on the $100 valuation, "inclusive of the school tax that may be levied by the board of trustees of public schools, as provided in this Act."

By the other provisions of the charter, the board of trustees of the Fort Worth Independent School District, created by the same Act, was authorized to require of the City a tax levy for school purposes of not exceeding 50 cents on the $100 valuation.

Accordingly, the City's maximum tax rate for all general purposes under the original charter, was $1.25 on the $100 valuation.

[1] The charter also authorized a special tax for water works purposes of 25 cents on the $100 valuation, not to be levied, however, except upon the approval of "the qualified voters" of the City at an election ordered according to the referendum provisions of the charter. Under those provisions governing bond elections, only qualified property tax paying voters are entitled to vote; and in the election held with respect to these bonds, only such voters were allowed to vote.

The charter was amended, June 17, 1919, at an election held under Amended Section 5 of Article 11 of the Constitution, so as to authorize for general school purposes and for medical inspection in the schools an additional tax of 21 cents and 2 cents on the $100 valuation, respectively. The effect of these two amendments was to enlarge the City's taxing power for all school purposes to the extent of 23 cents, affording it a maximum rate for such purposes of 73 cents on the $100 valuation.

The principal question in the case is whether the grant by these amendments of the additional taxing power for school purposes of 23 cents on the $100 valuation, has reduced in the same proportion the City's general taxing power of $1.25 on the $100 valuation as originally conferred by the charter. As to the 2 cent tax for medical inspection in the schools, the Attorney General does not contend that the City's general taxing power has been impaired, but we will treat the question as affected by the authorization under the amendments of both the additional 21 cents general school tax and the 2 cent tax.

If notwithstanding these amendments the City still has a general taxing power of $1.25 on the $100 valuation, the tax voted as provision for the payment of the $1,490,000 of the bonds is a valid tax, since, with other taxes required and currently levied for other general charges and indebtedness of the City as shown by the record, it does not exceed that amount.

The proposition advanced by the Attorney General is, that the grant by the charter of a taxing power for general purposes of $1.75 on the $100 valuation was to be inclusive of any tax for general school purposes which might be thereafter authorized.

This in our opinion is not the true construction of the charter provision. It is, contrary to its manifest intention, and opposed to its literal language, as well. The charter, as all other laws, looked to the future. Its object was to make definite provision for the general taxation needs of the City, and like provision for the City's schools and water works. Otherwise it would have failed as a charter and been undeserving of the name, in furnishing no dependable measure of vital powers necessary for the City's subsistence. The taxing powers for schools and water works, it defined with exactness. It is not to be supposed that the purpose was to leave the taxing power for general purposes only vague and indeterminate. A chief concern of all city charters is to make, within constitutional limitations, adequate provision for the public needs confided to the care of municipal government. Taxing powers granted, if they are to prove a capable means to that end, must be stable powers. A principal object of such charters is to make them so by defining their limits with precision. A taxing power with its limits made variable by the law conferring it according merely to the possible future authorization of other unascertained and unknown taxes, and therefore without any assurance as to the extent to which it might be exercised for any given period, is but an empty power. Such a power would be vain because altogether unreliable in there being no certainty as to its continued existence, and its being impossible for that reason to make provision for the public necessity in dependence upon it.

This charter should be construed, therefore, if its language reasonably admits of it, as consistent with an intention to fix the measure of the City's taxing power for general purposes as definitely and certainly as that of any other taxing power granted by the charter. To subserve those purposes was as vital to the City as the making of proper provision for its public schools. The public interest centered in them as well as in the schools, and rested no less upon the continuance of the City's power in their regard. Without a proper taxing power exercisable for their account, the City would have been impotent to perform the essential duties of a municipal government. It was important, not only that such a power be conferred, but that as conferred it subsist not impaired. Full recognition of this ought to be attributed to the makers of the law which comprised the charter. Laws are to be interpreted in the light of the purposes they are intended to accomplish.

The taxing power conferred by the charter for general purposes of $1.75 on the $100 valuation was, in the exact language of the provision, to be inclusive of "the school tax that may be levied by the board of trustees of public schools, as provided in this Act." It was not to be inclusive, in addition to the school tax authorized by the Act, of all possible school taxes, then unknown and hence wholly uncertain, which might be authorized by future changes in the Constitution and laws. The only school tax authorized "as provided in the Act" was a maximum tax of 50 cents on the $100 valuation. The taxing power for general purposes of $1.75 on the $100 valuation was therefore to be subject to diminution to the extent of the then authorized 50 cent school tax, but no further. This is plainly the meaning of the charter provision. The construction urged by the Attorney General would leave the City's general taxing power undetermined by definite law, and in the precarious position of being measured wholly by future authorized school taxes. In our view, it is measured by the charter, as it ought to be. Its limits are defined by the declaration that its maximum amount shall be $1.75 on the $100 valuation, less the authorized school tax of 50 cents, or, in other words, $1.25 on the $100 valuation.

[2] The objection made to the $400,000 water works bonds is that they, with their necessary special tax, were voted at an election where only qualified property tax paying voters, instead of simply qualified voters, were allowed to participate. We do not regard the objection as tenable. It was necessary that the special tax for these bonds have the approval of the qualified voters of the City at an election ordered according to the referendum provisions of the charter. Under the referendum provision of the charter governing bond elections, as this one was, only qualified voters paying taxes on property in the city may vote in such an election. Necessarily, at a bond election ordered according to that provision, only such voters were entitled to vote.

The mandamus is granted.

PRUETT v. CATTLEMEN'S TRUST CO. et al.
(No. 115-2975.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 16, 1920.)

Corporations §99(1)—issuance of stock for note violative of Constitution and statutes.

Where a bank took a note for a subscription to its stock, which it issued in the subscriber's name, retaining possession until note should be paid, apportioning dividends to subscriber from date of making certificate, recognizing subscriber's proxy as valid, and sending him notices as a stockholder, the transaction was violative of Const. art. 12, § 6, and Rev. St. 1911, art. 1146.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Eighth Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by C. E. Pruett against the Cattle-men's Trust Company and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which reversed and rendered judgment for the named defendant (184 S. W. 716), and plaintiff brings error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and judgment of the trial court affirmed on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

Lea, McGrady & Thomason, of El Paso, C. C. Belcher, of Del Rio, and C. R. Sutton, of Marfa, for plaintiff in error.

A. H. Kirby, of Abilene, for defendants in error.

SADLER, J. For a full statement showing the questions involved in this case, see the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals. 184 S. W. 716.

In the trial court, Pruett sought a cancellation of the notes in question on two theories: (a) Fraud in the inception of the transaction; and (b) the invalidity of the notes under the provisions of article 1146 of the Revised Statutes, and of article 12, section 6 of the Constitution. On the trial, the issue of fraud and its waiver was submitted to the jury by special issues. The issue as to the validity of the notes under the statute and Constitution was determined by the court. The jury verdict was favorable to the contention of Pruett. The court construed the transaction as being lawful under the statute and Constitution; in other words, that plaintiff could not avail himself of that defense. Judgment was rendered, on the findings of the jury, for the plaintiff, canceling the notes. The defendants appealed, attacking the findings of the jury on the question of fraud and its waiver, and the judgment of the court thereon. Plaintiff filed a cross-assignment to the conclusion of the court in depriving him of his defense, under the view that the notes were given by him and accepted by the Cattle-men's Trust Company, in payment for the stock issued.

On appeal, the Court of Civil Appeals held against the findings of the jury on the question of the waiver of fraud in the inception of the subscription contract, but on the cross-assignment of Pruett denied relief, and reversed and rendered judgment for the defendants in the court below. We think the judgment of the trial court, although proceeding upon an incorrect theory of the law, correctly determined the rights of the parties and should be affirmed. The Court of Civil Appeals, in discussing this question, says:

"The question presented by appellee in his cross-assignment has recently been very fully considered and passed upon by the Ft. Worth Court of Appeals, and we think correctly so, in the case of the Cattlemen's Trust Company of Ft. Worth v. Turner, 182 S. W. 438, not yet officially published. In that case the facts are the same as in this, and we think we need not restate them here. In that case the court holds that the transaction had between the trust company and Turner does not contravene the provisions in our Constitution and laws."

On writ of error, the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second District in Cattlemen's Trust Co. v. Turner was reversed, and it was there held that the stock was issued in consideration of the notes, and that the transaction was violative of the Constitution and statutes of this state. Turner v. Cattlemen's Trust Co., 215 S. W. 831, not yet [officially] reported.

We think the decision there decisive of the question involved here, and that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, on the authority of that case, should be reversed, and the judgment of the trial court affirmed, and so recommend.

MONTGOMERY, P. J., did not sit in this case.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case. The question of Pruett's not being entitled to relief against the transaction as prohibited by the Constitution because of his equal participation in it, is not made in this case.

HOUSTON OIL CO. OF TEXAS v. OLIVE STERNENBERG & CO. (No. 169-3178.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B. June 9, 1920.)

1. Adverse possession §103—Possession of part of overlap held sufficient to give constructive possession of whole.

Where there was an overlap of 48 acres and a field of 60 or 60 acres, cultivated and occupied by the junior patentee, who resided on the junior patent, occupied about 15 acres of the overlap, the remainder being on the junior patent, such possession of part of the overlap being in good faith, was sufficient to give constructive title to all the overlap, notwithstanding the claim that such possession did not extend beyond actual possession, because merely incidental to possession of the residence of the junior patentee on the junior patent.

2. Adverse possession §106(4)—Possessor, though technically a trespasser at first, may secure title by limitation.

Owner under a grant which conflicted with and extended over on an earlier grant from the state was technically a trespasser, but when he opened a field thereon and continuously cultivated it and used it for the purpose for which it was adapted for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations, he lost the character of trespasser and became owner.

3. Appeal and error §1004(2)—Finding approved by Court of Civil Appeals conclusive on Supreme Court.

On a claim of title by adverse possession, where the facts necessary to constitute limitation were found by the trial court and approved by the Court of Civil Appeals, the Supreme Court was precluded from passing upon the question; it being purely one of fact.

4. Vendor and purchaser §239(6)—Limitation title prevails over paper title secured when land was vacant.

Where a person has in fact held land long enough to give him title by limitation, it is good against a claimant under a paper title, although at the time of the purchase the land is vacant and there is no trace of the prior adverse possession.

5. Adverse possession §103—Owner of subsequent conflicting state grant held to acquire title by limitation as against holders of prior grant not in actual possession.

Where there was a conflict between surveys of two grants by the state and holders of junior grant were in actual possession of the part of the land in conflict, cultivating and using it, claiming to the extent of the boundaries of their recorded deed, and there was not shown any actual possession or use of any part of the prior grant by the owners of that title and the possession by the owners of the subsequent grant was exclusive, open, adverse, and notorious, it matured into a legal title by the limitations statute.

6. Adverse possession §84—Good faith possession vests possessor with title.

Every owner of land is presumed to know its boundaries, take notice when they are invaded, and when such invasion arises by reason of field notes and monument of title, issued to the adverse claimant's grantor and not from the intent of such claimant to acquire lands belonging to another by limitation, 10 years' possession and use vests such claimant with complete legal title.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Eighth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Olive Sternenberg & Co. against the Houston Oil Company of Texas. A judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (200 S. W. 232), and the defendant brings error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals affirmed.

H. O. Head, of Sherman, and Kennerly, Williams, Lee & Hill, and Fred L. Williams, all of Houston, for plaintiff in error.

Blount & Strong, of Nacogdoches, for defendant in error.

(222 S.W.)

KITTRELL, J. On December 20, 1847, the state issued patent No. 406 to Lewis Bouillet to 320 acres of land located in Hardin county, being a body of land 1,344 varas square.

At an earlier date—but exactly when the record does not reveal—the state had issued a patent to F. P. Elliott to a league survey lying east of where the Bouillet 320-acre survey was located, and it was evidently intended that the east line of the Bouillet and the west line of the Elliott should be coincident, but the former as located, or at least as patented, lapped over on the Elliott about 600 varas. On December 14, 1859, Bouillet, for a recited consideration of $1,500, sold the 320 acres to M. Bracken, who at once moved on the same.

It appears that at that time no person knew of any conflict between the Bouillet and the Elliott. J. D. Bracken, son of W. G. Bracken, and grandson of M. Bracken, testified upon the trial that the first time he knew or heard of any Elliott line in conflict with the Bouillet was in 1906. It is shown—or at least suggested—by the testimony that a survey, made by one Doncetti within the comparatively recent past, first revealed the conflict. One Monk appears to have lived on the land before Bracken bought it, and there was testimony that the place appeared to have been cultivated for some years before Bracken moved on it. After a lapse of more than 50 years the memory of witnesses as to lines and locations, and the size of the fields and lots of cleared and used land and the exact location, is very indistinct, but it is evident that Bracken's house was on the Bouillet land proper, while somewhere between 5 and 15 acres was east of the true west line of the Elliott. Defendant in error by regular chain of title owns the Bouillet or Bracken land, while plaintiff in error holds the Elliott by regular chain of title. The map which was part of the statement of facts makes clear the relative location of the Bouillet and Elliott surveys, as it does also the description of the land claimed by plaintiff in the action.

M. Bracken died in March, 1872, leaving surviving him his widow, Mary L. Bracken, and one child, a son, W. G. Bracken, and on April 24, 1872, Mrs. Bracken made to her said son a deed to the south half of the Joseph Landis survey lying west of, and adjoining, the Bouillet, and also to that part of the Bouillet described as follows:

"All that part * * * which lies south of Beaumont creek and the branch thereof in front and south of the homestead place of the late Mathias Bracken, deceased, the quantity of land south of said branch and creek being as yet unascertained."

On the same day the son executed to his mother a deed to the north half of the Landis—to the south half of which she had executed to him a deed, as above stated—and also conveyed by the same deed a part of the Bouillet described as follows:

"Beginning at the northwest corner of the Bouillet; thence south along the west line of the same and the east line of the Landis, to the branch south of the homestead place of Mathias Bracken, deceased; thence down said branch to Beaumont creek, and down Beaumont-creek to the east line of said Bouillet survey; thence north to the northeast corner of the said Bouillet survey; thence west to the beginning, the quantity of land not being exactly known."

Although upon the trial there was a surveyor on the stand, it was not shown how far it is from the junction of the branch and creek to the east line of the Bouillet, nor how far the creek is from the south line, nor what the area of land is between the branch and creek, nor what the area between the creek and the south line is, and even plaintiff in the court below (defendant in error here) does not allege the area, the description in the petition being substantially as follows:

"Beginning at the southwest corner of the Bouillet, at 703 varas cross the supposed west line of the Elliott league, at 1,344 varas corner, being the southeast corner of said Bouillet survey; thence north with the east line of said Bouillet survey to Beaumont creek and corner; thence up said creek to mouth of branch which runs south of the old Bracken homestead place, and corner; thence up said branch crossing Elliott west line to the west line of said Bouillet survey and corner; thence south with the west line of said Bouillet survey which is also the east line of said Landis survey, to the place of beginning."

The defendant, plaintiff in error here, disclaimed as to all the land sued for except that part which is in conflict with the Elliott and Hampton leagues. None of it appears to have been in conflict with the latter league. It pleads also that if any adverse possession was held by plaintiff as alleged, it was ineffective by reason of limitation and pleaded the 3, 5, and 10 year statute of limitation, but as to that defense concededly failed to make necessary proof. The record reveals no evidence of actual possession of any part of its Elliott by defendant below.

Defendant recalled J. D. Bracken, son of W. G. Bracken, and proved by him that in 1878 his father conveyed to him and his sister each a tract of land out of the east end of the Bouillet, beginning at the southeast corner, running north for the tract conveyed to the witness, and basing that conveyed to his sister on the north end of the tract conveyed to witness, and the witness testified that there were no improvements on either tract at that time. It was in evidence also that the fences had disappeared, but the old rows and furrows could be seen in the fields east and south of the house.

It may serve a useful purpose to say in this connection that the field notes in the deed just above referred to as having been made in 1878 by W. G. Bracken to his son, J. D. Bracken, were as follows:

"Beginning at the southeast corner of said Bouillet survey; thence west along the south boundaries of said survey 225 varas; thence north 600 varas; thence east 225 varas; thence south 600 varas to the beginning."

Within those limits are included practically 24 acres. It evidently includes a body of land 225 varas wide and 600 varas long, the southeast corner of which is the southeast corner of the Bouillet survey and its east boundary is the east boundary of the Bouillet. All the interests of the heirs of W. G. Bracken, grandchildren of Mathias Bracken, are owned by defendant in error, and when the action out of which this appeal arose was brought in January, 1914, the deed above recited to J. D. Bracken from his father had been executed nearly 36 years.

The field notes of the deed made on the same day by W. G. Bracken to his daughter, Mrs. Herrington, were evidently incorrectly copied into the statement of facts, in that one or more calls are missing. It was evidently intended to put that survey, so to speak, on the top of the survey deeded to J. D. Bracken, as in the statement of facts it appears that both the deeds were offered at the same time, and it was stated by counsel that they conveyed two tracts 225 by 600 varas, the east boundary of both being the east boundary of the Bouillet survey. Notwithstanding the incorrect copying of the field notes of the second deed, it is made evident that the two deeds contain a body of land 1,200 varas north and south by 225 varas east and west, or about 48 acres, all of which is in that part of the Bouillet survey which overlaps and conflicts with the Elliott.

From the deed made to W. G. Bracken by his mother and the deed made by her to him it is evident that it is the land she conveyed to him out of the Bouillet that is sued for, and it is through his heirs, the grandchildren of Mathias Bracken, that defendant in error claims title.

The case was tried without a jury, and the court found that M. Bracken went into possession of the Bouillet about January 1, 1860, and immediately commenced the cultivation of the field on said survey, consisting of 50 or 60 acres, and that within said field was about 15 acres of land on the conflict between the Bouillet and the Elliott surveys, and that said field was continuously held and possessed and cultivated from January, 1860, until some time in 1872, when Mathias Bracken died, and that his widow continued to cultivate, possess, and enjoy the 15 acres until 1884.

He found also that when Mrs. Bracken, now Mrs. Patterson, made the deed above recited to W. G. Bracken, her son, he immediately went into possession of the land conveyed. He also found that prior to the death of M. Bracken he had cleared a field south of the branch which is the present dividing line between the plaintiff and M. L. Patterson (formerly Bracken), and that said field had been continuously cultivated from said time during the war up to the death of M. Bracken, and that immediately after the death of M. Bracken, W. G. Bracken, his son, went into possession of said field south of the branch and east of the Elliott west line, and continued to use, cultivate, possess, and enjoy the land situated on said conflict until 1879. These findings are amply supported by the evidence.

The court's conclusion of law was that M. Bracken had matured title under the 3-year statute of limitation to all of the Bouillet survey, and that W. G. Bracken had matured title to the part south of the branch under the 10-year statute of limitation. The judgment of the district court was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals.

Plaintiff in error bases its whole case on the following assignment of error:

"The court erred in not rendering judgment for the defendant as the owner of the record title to the senior survey, because, as shown by the undisputed evidence and findings of fact, the possession of the owners of the Bouillet survey of that part of same in conflict with the Elliott league consisted entirely of the possession, cultivation, and use of a field which lay partly on the Elliott and partly off of same, and was adjoining and was incidental to the residence, houses, and all other improvements which were situated entirely without the Elliott league, and such possession as was held on the Elliott league was merely subsidiary, and incidental to, and therefore referable to, the home and place of residence, and was therefore insufficiently distinct to afford a basis for the acquisition under the statute of limitations of more of the adjoining survey than was actually so possessed and used throughout the statutory period."

The authorities cited in support of the above contention are the following: Hill v. Harris, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 408, 64 S. W. 820; Holland v. Nance, 102 Tex. 177, 114 S. W. 346; Bailey v. Kirby (Civ. App.) 195 S. W. 221.

The holding in the first case cited was, under the facts manifestly correct, and the Supreme Court by refusing writ of error so adjudged, but it is not controlling, and is indeed but to a small, if to any, extent applicable to the case in hand.

In Holland v. Nance the appellee got his fence by accident of error a few feet over on the adjoining survey, and when he discovered that fact, he got a deed (from some party who had no title) to a large part of the adjoining survey, and recorded that deed and paid taxes according to its boundaries for 5 years, but never moved his fence or gave any other notice of his intention to claim title to any part of the adjoining survey. The writer of this opinion was judge of the district court in which the case was tried, and he held that Nance did not acquire title by his deed and payment of taxes, which conclusion, though disapproved by the Court of Civil Appeals, was later upheld by the Supreme Court.

In Bailey v. Kirby, Bailey (to use the language of counsel for appellee, which is quoted by the Court of Civil Appeals) "purposely straddled the line between the Irion (for part of which survey he sued) and the Thompson, subjecting an insignificant portion of the Irion to a purely incidental use under such circumstances as to avoid the appearance of an adverse claim upon his part to the entire Irion survey." The court correctly held that Bailey could not by such method and in such way perfect title to 160 acres of the Irion by limitation.

The case of Fielder v. Houston Oil Co. (plaintiff in error in this action), 208 S. W. 158, is not cited by counsel, but it is a case most apposite to the instant case. In a very clear and able opinion by Justice Montgomery he held in that case that the actual possession of a few acres of a tract of land by inclosure with other land owned by the claimant is insufficient to put the owner (of the other land) upon notice that any claim of adverse possession is asserted beyond that actually fenced. Such holding is in strict accordance with that in Bracken v. Jones, 63 Tex. 184, a case which has been consistently adhered to, because it is in harmony both with sound law and sound morals.

[1] To our minds there is an obvious distinction between all the cases cited and the instant case. The Brackens never consciously put any improvements on any land which they did not believe belonged to them, because it was included, as they believed, in the boundaries by which they bought from the original grantee of the land. It was described by metes and bounds in the patent, and by said metes and bounds was conveyed by onerous title to Mathias Bracken, who did not know that it in any extent conflicted with the Elliott.

He evidently was not seeking, as was the claimant in most, if not all of the cases cited above, by devious and insidious methods to acquire by limitation land that he knew was not included in the boundaries of that which he had bought.

It is true his land overlapped on the Elliott, and that while his house was on the Bouillet west of the conflict, 15 acres of his field was east of the conflict, yet he knew of no conflict but supposed his field was in fact on the Bouillet survey (which was the case), and, so believing, cleared it, cultivated it, and exercised dominion over it. His possession was open and notorious, and was hostile, because the patent under which he claimed and his deed were of record, and he built and improved within the boundaries by which he had bought.

[2] He was of course as to the land lying beyond the line which conflicted with the Elliott, technically a trespasser; but when he opened a field thereon and continuously cultivated it and used it for such purposes as it was adapted to, for the period prescribed by the statute, he lost the character of a trespasser and became the owner. Charles v. Saffold, 13 Tex. 111; Craig v. Cartwright, 65 Tex. 422.

[3] While the testimony of J. D. Bracken concerning the conveyances made to him and his sister in 1878 and the field notes of the deeds as revealed in the record was persuasive testimony against the claim of improvements and use, as alleged by plaintiffs, yet it is not conclusive, and the facts necessary to constitute limitation having been found by the trial court, and that finding having been approved by the Court of Civil Appeals, we are precluded from passing on the question, as it is purely one of fact.

[4] Furthermore, such a situation is controlled by the holding that where a person has in fact held land long enough to give him title by limitation, it is good against a claimant under a paper title, although at the time of the purchase the land is vacant and there is no trace of the prior adverse possession. McGregor v. Thompson, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 32, 26 S. W. 649.

[5] Regardless of the question of conflict between the two surveys, the Brackens, under and through whom defendant in error claims, were in actual possession of parts of the land in conflict, cultivating, using it, and claiming to the extent of the boundaries of their recorded deed, and there not being shown any actual possession or use of any part of the Elliott by the owners of that title, the Bracken possession was exclusive, and was open, adverse, and notorious, and by lapse of time matured into a legal title.

We are of opinion that the case in hand is not within the rule as laid down in the cases cited, and in other cases decided by this court.

If the east line of the Bouillet and the west line of the Elliott had been in fact coincident and there had been in consequence no conflict, and Bracken had then built his house on the Bouillet, but had extended his field a few acres over on the Elliott, a different case would be presented; but so far as he was concerned he manifestly had no intention of putting his improvements anywhere except within the boundaries by which he had bought, and he was only claiming title to land which he was justified by the state's patent in believing belonged to him.

[6] Every owner of land is presumed to know its boundaries and to take notice when they are invaded, and when that invasion arises not from the purpose of the adverse party to prostitute the law of limitation to the unworthy end of securing title to his neighbor's land, but arises by reason of depending on the field notes in the muniment of title issued to his grantor, 10-year possession, and use, vests the party so possessing and using with complete legal title. Authorities supra.

We are of opinion that defendant in error has under the law when applied to the facts the complete legal title, and the Court of Civil Appeals rightly so adjudged, and we therefore recommend that its judgment be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

HOUSTON OIL CO. OF TEXAS v. PATTERSON. (No. 170-3177.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B. June 9, 1920.)

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Ninth Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by M. L. Patterson against the Houston Oil Company of Texas. A judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (199 S. W. 1140), and the defendant brings error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals affirmed.

H. O. Head, of Sherman, and Kennerly, Williams, Lee & Hill and Fred L. Williams, all of Houston, for plaintiff in error.

D. F. Singleton, of Kountze, for defendant in error.

KITTRELL, J. This is a companion case to that of the same plaintiff in error against Olive Sternberg & Co., defendant in error, 222 S. W. 534, No. 169. It involves the question of the title to the land in the upper part of the area in conflict between the L. Bouillet 320-acre survey and the F. F. Elliott, a senior league survey, while the case of Houston Oil Co. v. Olive Sternberg & Co., involved the title to land in the lower, or southeastern part of the Bouillet.

The same counsel represent the respective parties, and, except the title and style of the cases, the briefs are the same, and both cases were appealed upon the same Statement of Facts.

The opinion in the first-named case (No. 169) is treated as applicable in every respect to this case. Therefore we recommend that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals in this case be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

HARBIN INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DIST. et al. v. DENMAN. (No. 168-3173.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B. June 2, 1920.)

1. Schools and school districts \S 24(2)—Enjoining assessment of taxes held collateral attack on corporate existence of district.

A suit to enjoin assessment of taxes on plaintiff's land by defendant school district, on the ground that the land was in another district and that the incorporation of the former district was void, in that it encroached on the latter district when it included plaintiff's land, was collateral attack upon the corporate existence of the defendant district, and not maintainable by an individual.

2. Schools and school districts \S 32—Boundaries may not be changed indirectly by injunction after issuance of bonds.

The boundaries of a school district may not be changed, so as to reduce the taxable value of the property included in it after the district has issued bonds which are outstanding obligations, under Acts 29th Leg. (1905) c. 124, § 50, as amended by Acts 31st Leg. (1909) c. 12, by appeal to the injunctive power of the court, since the court cannot do indirectly what cannot be done directly by the commissioners' court.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Eighth Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by B. V. Denman against the Harbin Independent School District and others. The Court of Civil Appeals (200 S. W. 176) affirmed a decree for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed and rendered.

Chandler & Pannill, of Stephenville, for plaintiffs in error.

Hickman & Bateman, of Stephenville, for defendant in error.

Statement of the Case.

KITTRELL, J. On June 2, 1888, an election was held in Cottonwood, Erath county, for the purpose of determining whether or not said village should be incorporated for school purposes only. The election resulted in favor of incorporation, and the result was duly recorded in the records of the commissioners' court on June 20, 1888, together with the lines and boundaries of the district. No map of the district was ever filed in connection with the field notes, and it is clearly inferable that none was ever made.

On July 9, 1888, five trustees were elected for said district and the report of the election duly recorded. The land of defendant in error was included in the boundaries of said district. In December, 1898, the commissioners' court directed the county surveyor to subdivide the county into convenient school districts, which was done, and the boundaries of Cottonwood district were set forth in the surveyor's report, as were also those of the Harbin school district.

In February, 1904, petition was filed in statutory form for an election to determine whether the inhabitants of the Cottonwood district should levy a tax of 20 cents on the $100 for the purpose of supplementing the state and county school funds. The election was held, the tax voted, and the result duly recorded. At a time not shown by any date, the line between the Cottonwood district and the Harbin district was changed, so as to transfer the property of two citizens from the Harbin to the Cottonwood district.

On December 2, 1911, by due statutory process, the Harbin district was duly incorporated by a vote of 40 to 2 for school purposes only. The metes and bounds of the district are set forth in the order rectifying the result of the election, which order was duly recorded, and the boundaries include the land of the defendant in error. On December 11, 1911, the lands of three citizens were in accordance with the statute transferred from the Harbin district to the Oak Grove district, and the boundaries of the Harbin district were changed to conform to the conditions created by such transfer.

So far as a very meager statement of facts reveals, the Cottonwood school district was conducted in a changing and intermittent way, sometimes as an independent district, and sometimes as a common school district, apparently for the greater part of the time in the latter way. A witness who lived for several years in the district testified that—

"The teachers were paid by vouchers to county judge or county superintendent, just like a common school district, and it didn't claim to be an independent district, and didn't operate as such."

The Cottonwood district never issued any bonds, and never succeeded in obtaining recognition by the Attorney General as an independent district. The Harbin district issued bonds, which were approved by the law department of the state government, and the proceeds were used for the purpose of erecting a schoolhouse, and the bonds are still outstanding, and a sinking fund is provided for their redemption at maturity.

Defendant in error brought his action March 6, 1916, to enjoin the collection of the tax of 50 cents on the $100 levied by the Harbin district, on the ground that the Cottonwood independent district had never been dissolved or abolished, and is yet an existing district, and that as affects his lands the Harbin district had no legal existence. He alleged, further, that the Harbin district includes his lands, and taxes have been and will be in future assessed and collected upon their value. The county tax assessor and county tax collector and the members of the board of trustees of the Harbin district were joined as defendants, and prayer was made for injunction against them from the assessment or collection of taxes by the Harbin district against his land. The district court granted the prayer of the defendant in error, and the Court of Civil Appeals of the Eighth District affirmed that judgment.

Plaintiffs in error by proper assignments present the question of nonuser on the part of the Cottonwood district, and of the vagueness, indefiniteness, and insufficiency of the boundaries of that district; but the view we take of the preliminary, and as we conceive the controlling, question in the case, makes discussion of these assignments unnecessary. As we understand the record, it is not alleged that the proceedings whereby the Harbin independent district was incorporated were not in all things regular, or that it is not duly performing all the purposes of its incorporation, or that it has not received recognition at the hands of the law department of the state, or that it has not issued and sold bonds which are yet outstanding; but the only ground alleged as basis for injunctive relief is that its organization is not valid, in that it encroaches on the territory already included in another district, viz. Cottonwood district, and includes the land of defendant in error.

[1] Conceding all the defendant in error alleges as matters of fact to be true, and that there were irregularities or even illegalities in the incorporation of the Harbin district, which in a direct proceeding might be sufficient to invalidate its corporate existence, and that it is assuming authority and exercising powers with which it has not been legally vested, these are matters which can only be inquired into and determined in a suit brought for that purpose in the name of the state, or by some individual under its authority, who has a special interest which is affected by the existence of the corporation. It cannot be done by an individual suing to enjoin the collection of a tax levied by the authorities of the district. It was so held in Graham v. Greenville, 67 Tex. 62, 2 S. W. 742, and that holding has been consistently adhered to.

That case is cited as authority in the case of City of El Paso v. Ruckman, 92 Tex. 86, 46 S. W. 25. In the last-named case the city sued Mrs. Ruckman for taxes. She resisted on the ground that the city did not have valid control of its public schools. Her contention was sustained by the trial court, and the Court of Civil Appeals of the Fourth District certified the case to the Supreme Court. It was conceded that neither of two elections held with reference to the city taking control of its public schools was regular, or sufficient to constitute the city a school district, and it was so certified, and the Supreme Court was asked to answer whether, in view of that fact, taken in connection with the long-continued exercise of the powers of a school district, its legal existence could be inquired into in a suit by the city to recover taxes levied for the years 1894-1895. The Supreme Court answered the question in the negative. It said:

"When the creation of a public corporation, municipal or quasi municipal, is authorized by statute, and a corporation has been organized under color of such authority, its corporate existence cannot be inquired into * * * in a collateral proceeding."

That holding has never been departed from; on the contrary, has been followed at as late a date as the time of the decision of the case of Crabb v. Celeste School District, 105 Tex. 194, 146 S. W. 528, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 601, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1146. In the Ruckman Case the city sued to recover taxes. In the instant case the plaintiff (defendant in error) sued to enjoin the levy and collection of the tax. Had he been sued as was the defendant in the Ruckman Case, and had set up as a defense the same contention he presented affirmatively in the trial court, his answer would have been subject to demurrer, on the ground that it involved a collateral attack on the validity of the corporation.

We are not able to perceive any distinction in principle between the two situations, because in one he would have been defendant, and in the other he is plaintiff. In either attitude his attack on the corporation would be distinctly collateral. No complaint was made by plaintiff in the court below, nor is any made here, that there has been any such action taken by the commissioners' court as would have justified the exercise of the supervisory power of the district court which was invoked in the cases of McLaughlin v. Smith, 105 Tex. 330, 148 S. W. 238, Dubose v. Woods (Civ. App.) 162 S. W. 3, and Williams v. Woods (Civ. App.) 162 S. W. 1031. The sole ground on which he bases his prayer for injunctive relief is that the Harbin school district has no legal existence; hence has no right to exercise the sovereign power of taxation.

It certainly exists de facto, and has secured recognition at the hands of the state, which the Cottonwood district has never received, and it is performing all its functions as a body corporate, and its right so to do cannot be called in question in the manner attempted by plaintiff in the court below. The duty does not devolve upon us to discuss the reasons for the holding so long prevailing. They are based on sound principle, and supported by high and long-recognized authority. The late Chief Justice Willie said:

"If a municipality has been illegally constituted, the state alone can take advantage of the fact." Graham v. Greenville, supra.

Mr. Cooley says:

"When the question arises collaterally, the courts will not permit its corporate character to be questioned if it appears to be acting under the color of law, and recognized by the state as such" (a corporation).

In the Ruckman Case, Chief Justice Gaines said:

"The election was irregular, and for that reason might have been set aside in a proper proceeding instituted for that purpose. But, having been acquiesced in by the state and all parties in interest, * * * it [the city] was an effective and legal control."

The fact has not been lost sight of that the facts in the cases cited were not identical with those in the case before us, nor were the grounds of defense the same; but, regardless of such differences, the fact remains that a corporation, organized pursuant to the forms of law, and the legal existence of which has been recognized by the superior sovereign, the state, and which is performing all the functions for which it was organized, is attacked, and its right to exist called in question in a collateral way, which cannot be done whatever may be the grounds upon which the attack is based.

Applying the established rules of law to the instant case, we find that defendant in error had lived for about 16 years where he was living at the time he brought his action. The Harbin independent school district was organized in 1911. So far as the record reveals, he made no protest nor offered any objection to the incorporation of his property within its territory, nor did he invoke the process of the law to prevent such action.

He alleges no inconvenience as regards access to the schools; nor does he impute any improper purpose or action to the commissioners' court. He waited until the district had been organized five years, and until four years after it had issued bonds, before he took any action by which the legal existence of the district could be tested, and then chose a method which was ineffective and unavailable.

[2] If the plaintiff below could succeed in achieving his purpose, he would, by changing the boundaries of the district, reduce the taxable value of the property included in it, after the district has issued bonds which are outstanding obligations. Such change is expressly forbidden by section 50, c. 124, Acts 29th Leg., as amended by chapter 12 of the act of February 18, 1909, and that cannot be done indirectly, by appeal to the injunctive power of the district court, which cannot be done directly by the commissioners' court.

It follows from what we have said that the district court erred in granting defendant in error's prayer for injunction. We recommend that the judgments of the district court and of the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and judgment be here rendered for plaintiffs in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

TEXAS CITY TRANSP. CO. v. WINTERS.
(No. 145-3083.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 9, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1062(1)—Assignments not presenting questions of substantive law not within jurisdiction of Supreme Court.

Assignments of error, not presenting questions of substantive law, are not within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, on writ of error to Court of Civil Appeals.

2. Master and servant \S 103(2)—Injuries to servant charged with duty of making working place safe not actionable.

If under the terms of the employment the employé was charged with the duty of seeing that the walls of an excavation are safe for himself and those working under him, recovery cannot be had by him for injuries based on his dereliction in performance of that duty.

3. Trial \S 350(2)—Rule with respect to submission of special "issues of fact" stated.

Every issue of fact presented by the pleadings and supported by evidence must be submitted to the jury, where requested by either party; "issues of fact" meaning, not the various controverted specific facts which may enter into the main issues of fact, but only the independent ultimate facts which go to make up plaintiff's cause of action and defendant's ground of defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Issue of Fact.]

4. Appeal and error \S 974(1) — Trial \S 352(1)—Mode of presentation of ultimate issues of fact to jury will not be reviewed.

If ultimate issues of fact are fairly presented to the jury, the mode of presenting them by the trial court is discretionary and will not be reviewed.

5. Appeal and error \S 218(2) — When too great generalization in submission of special issues will not be reviewed stated.

Too great a generalization by the trial court in submitting ultimate issues of fact to the jury will not be reviewed, even upon timely objection, in the absence of correct special issues tendered by the objecting party, unless there is affirmative error in the issues submitted by the court.

6. Trial \S 350(6)—Special issue as to duty of placing material for curbing walls in excavation held improperly refused.

In an employé's action for injuries sustained by the caving in of a side of an excavation, a special issue as to whether the duty rested on the master to place in the excavation material for curbing the wall, and, if so, whether the master failed in that duty, and, if so, whether employé in the exercise of ordinary care could have obtained the material, was improperly refused, where sustained by evidence.

7. Trial \S 350(6)—Special issue as to whether failure to warn was proximate cause of injury held improperly refused.

In employé's action for personal injuries sustained by caving in of wall of excavation, a special issue as to whether the failure of the master's engineer to warn plaintiff of the dangerous condition of the wall was the proximate cause of the injury held improperly refused, where sustained by evidence.

8. Appeal and error \S 1062(2)—Refusal of special issue as to safe place to work held harmless error.

In employé's action for personal injuries sustained by the caving in of a wall of an excavation, refusal of a special issue as to whether duty of placing in the excavation material for curbing the wall rested on defendant, and whether he failed therein, and whether the employé by his exercise of ordinary care could have obtained material, held harmless error.

9. Appeal and error \S 1062(2)—Refusal of special issue as to failure to warn as proximate cause held harmless error.

In employé's action for personal injury sustained by the caving in of a wall of excavation, refusal of a special issue as to whether the failure of defendant's engineer to warn plaintiff of dangerous conditions was the proximate cause of the injury held harmless error.

10. Master and servant \S 286(3)—Evidence held to raise issue as to employé's duty to make place of work safe.

In a foreman's action for injury by caving in of a wall in an excavation, evidence held to raise the issue as to whether the duty to see to the safety of the wall rested on plaintiff.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of First Supreme Judicial District.

Action by C. E. Winters against the Texas City Transportation Company. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed (193 S. W. 366), and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded, as recommended by the Commission of Appeals.

W. T. Armstrong, of Galveston, and Eugene A. Wilson, of Brownwood, for plaintiff in error.

Frank S. Anderson and Aubrey Fuller, both of Galveston, for defendant in error.

McCLENDON, J. C. E. Winters, the plaintiff, while in the employ of the Texas City Transportation Company, the defendant, as a carpenter foreman, superintending at the time the construction of concrete forms in an excavation at Texas City, received personal injuries, caused by a caving in of a portion of one of the sides of the excavation. Plaintiff brought this suit against defendant to recover compensatory damages for said injuries. The Court of Civil Appeals affirmed a judgment of the trial court in favor of plaintiff, rendered upon a verdict, upon special issues. 193 S. W. 366.

[1] Defendant presents in this court seven assignments of error. The last two of these relate to the action of the trial court in refusing to strike out certain testimony as hearsay, and the refusal to permit defendant to introduce certain portions of plaintiff's pleadings. These assignments do not present questions of substantive law, and are not, therefore, within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

The other five assignments, eliminating duplication, relate to the refusal of three special issues requested by defendant and objection to the first special issue submitted to the jury, which special issues were in substance:

(1) Defendant's refused special issue No. 14, calling for a finding whether the duty to see to the safety of the walls of the excavation rested upon the plaintiff.

(2) Defendant's refused special issue No. 16, calling for a finding whether the duty rested upon defendant to place in the excavation material for curbing the walls; and, if so, whether defendant failed in that duty; and, if so, whether plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care could have obtained the material.

(3) Defendant's refused special issue No. 18, calling for a finding whether the failure of C. A. Stevens, defendant's engineer, to warn plaintiff of the dangerous condition of the walls was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, in the event the jury should find that Stevens knew of such dangerous condition.

(4) The trial court's special issue No. 1 submitted to the jury reading: "Did the defendant exercise reasonable care to furnish plaintiff a safe place to work?"

The Court of Civil Appeals held that defendant's special issues Nos. 14 and 16 were properly refused, because there was no evidence of probative force to support them. With regard to defendant's special issue numbered 13 above, the court held that they were unable to determine whether the requested issue related to contributory negligence of plaintiff or to the proximate cause of his injuries, but that in either event no error was presented, because the case was within the Employers' Liability Act, which abolished the fellow servant defense, and because the court in issue No. 9 properly submitted the issue of proximate cause.

The objection urged to special issue No. 1 was that the whole matter of negligence was condensed into one issue, whereas a number of issues were tendered by the pleadings. This contention was overruled, upon the ground that the only issue presented by the pleadings and supported by the evidence was whether defendant had negligently failed to furnish plaintiff a safe place to work, and that all other issues were incidental thereto and evidentiary. It will thus be seen that the questions here presented are more or less interrelated, and in order to determine the correctness of the holdings of the Court of Civil Appeals a clear understanding of the issues presented by the pleadings is essential.

[2] It may be stated at the outset that, although the general duty of furnishing plaintiff a safe place in which to work rested upon the defendant, yet if, under the terms of plaintiff's employment as a carpenter foreman, he was charged with the duty of seeing that the walls of the excavation were safe for himself and those working under him, recovery cannot be had by him, based upon his own dereliction in the performance of that duty. The pleadings of both parties are very fully set out in the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals. A careful analysis of them leads to the conclusion that the following issues were clearly presented thereby: First, whether the duty to see to the safety of the walls of the excavation rested upon plaintiff; second, whether defendant negligently failed to furnish plaintiff a safe place to work; third, whether the duty rested upon defendant to furnish plaintiff with material to brace the walls, and it failed in that duty; and, fourth, whether defendant's engineer in charge knew of the dangerous condition of the wall and failed to warn plaintiff thereof. The last three of these issues are raised by plaintiff's pleadings in alleging primary negligence on defendant's part; the first issue is raised by defendant's answer.

[3-5] Considering first special issue No. 1, it is quite evident to our mind that the objection thereto is not well taken. The general rule laid down by the authorities with respect to the submission of special issues is that every issue of fact presented by the pleadings and supported by evidence must be submitted to the jury, where requested by either party. So far the law is mandatory. The particular manner in which the issues are presented is largely discretionary with the trial court. By the expression "issues of fact" is not meant the various controverted specific facts, which may enter into the main issues of fact, but only the independent ultimate facts which go to make up plaintiff's cause of action and defendant's ground of defense. If such ultimate issues of fact are fairly presented, the mode of presenting them by the trial court will not be reviewed. Nor will too great a generalization by the trial court be reviewed, even upon timely objection, in the absence of correct special issues tendered by the objecting party, unless there is affirmative error in the issue submitted by the court. This subject is very ably and exhaustively treated by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in Baxter v. Railway, 104 Wis. 307, 80 N. W. 644.

[6, 7] The question of defendant's negligent failure to furnish a safe place to work in our opinion presented a single issue of fact, independent of any of the other three issues embraced in the pleadings. It is true that the duty to warn is sometimes treated under the general duty of the master to furnish his servants a safe place to work; but, when so treated, it does not arise, except in those cases where from its very nature the making of the place safe is rendered impossible, or, as a secondary duty, where the master has failed in the primary duty to furnish a safe place to work. The duty to warn, as presented by the pleadings here, arises independently of the general duty to furnish a safe place to work, under the allegation that defendant's engineer had actual knowledge of the danger. The theory presented is that, even though plaintiff rested under the duty to see that the walls were safe, yet the actual knowledge of the engineer that a particular danger existed, and that plaintiff was subjecting himself thereto, imposed a new duty to warn plaintiff of that danger.

The same reasoning applies to the issue of furnishing plaintiff with material to brace the wall. The duty to furnish material necessarily presupposes a duty in plaintiff to use the material for making the wall safe, and could not arise if the duty to make the wall safe was upon defendant. It follows from what we have said that each of the three refused special issues should have been given, if there was evidence to support them.

[8, 9] With regard to the sixteenth and thirteenth special issues, however, we have concluded that, although supported by evidence, their refusal upon the request of defendant was harmless. These issues were tendered by plaintiff's pleadings, and presented grounds of recovery based upon acts of primary negligence on defendant's part. They in no way related to any matter of defense to the action as submitted to the jury. The only ground of recovery which the trial court submitted was embraced in special issue No. 1: Whether defendant negligently failed to furnish plaintiff a safe place to work. If that issue had been answered favorably to defendant, it would have been the duty of the trial court to render judgment for the defendant. The power of the trial court to substitute its findings, where none have been made by the jury does not admit of a finding by the court upon an independent ground of recovery which the party alleging it does not urge. In such case, the issues submitted will be treated as embracing the only grounds upon which recovery can be had; and the failure of plaintiff to tender an issue not submitted by the court will be treated as a waiver or abandonment thereof.

[10] Upon the issue of whether the duty rested upon plaintiff to see that the place was safe, E. B. Rhodes, who was defendant's superintendent, gave the following testimony:

"Mr. Winters was foreman of the carpenter work in the excavation in which he received his injury on the 8th day of January, 1915. By reason of my experience and knowledge gained as superintendent of the two concerns, I know the duties and responsibilities resting upon a foreman of the character that Mr. Winters was at that time. In the work that Mr. Winters engaged in, in that excavation, on the 8th of January, it was his duty to look after the question of the safety, and so on, of the walls of that excavation. That is what he was there for."

Upon cross-examination, this witness testified that Winters was employed by and received his instructions from Mr. Stevens, the engineer of the company, who had since died, and that he knew the duties imposed upon Mr. Winters by Mr. Stevens. In addition to this, several witnesses testified that bracing had been placed in a portion of the ditch by or under the direction and supervision of the plaintiff. We think the probative force of this testimony was such as to raise the issue under consideration, and that the trial court committed error in refusing it.

We conclude that the judgments of the Court of Civil Appeals and District Court should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the latter for a new trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case and the holding of the Commission with respect to the refusal of special issue No. 14.

VARN v. GONZALES. (No. 152-3114.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 16, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser \S 214(1)—Assignment of option contract held fraudulently induced by secret agreement.

There can be no recovery on notes given for assignment of option contract to convey land in Mexico, where valuable timber on land not on tract was represented to be on land sold, and there was a failure to point out when land was inspected that great areas of the land were gorges and canyons, and two of the makers of the notes coming from the states were represented by Mexican interpreters, who became their agents and partners, and they entered into a secret understanding with assignor that the amount they became liable for as parties to the contract need not be paid, as in such case contract is absolutely void.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨214(1)—Fraudulent assignment of option contract not subject to ratification.

An assignment of an option contract to purchase land, having its inception in fraud, is not subject to ratification.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨214(1)—Fraudulent assignment of option contract, promptly repudiated, not ratified.

Where two makers of notes given for option to purchase Mexican land on discovery of a secret agreement of Mexican cosigners with assignor to defraud them promptly repudiated the contract, and tendered back the property, which was refused, they did all that was required of them, and no ratification could take place.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Eighth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Amador Gonzales against Geo. W. Varn, administrator, and others. From a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals (193 S. W. 1132), affirming a judgment for plaintiff, Varn brings error. Reversed, and judgment entered for defendant.

M. W. Stanton and Turney & Burges, all of El Paso, for plaintiff in error.

F. G. Morris, B. Bryan, and T. A. Falvey, all of El Paso, for defendant in error.

KITTRELL, J. This case is reported in (Civ. App.) 193 S. W. 1132. The opinion to be there found will reveal the character of the case, and the defense interposed.

In order, however, to make our opinion complete within itself, we will, as briefly as possible, summarize the controlling facts.

Statement of the Case.

In the summer of 1908 three Mexican ladies living in the state of Durango gave to Amador Gonzales, a Mexican resident in the state of Chihuahua, a verbal promise or option to sell him for 35,000 pesos, equivalent to $17,500 gold, a body of land comprising about 45,000 acres situated in the state of Durango. On September 17, 1908, Gonzales entered into what was termed a minuto de contrato, or memorandum of a contract, with one Fulkerson, a resident of El Paso, Tex., whereby he assigned to Fulkerson all the rights he (Gonzales) possessed under the "promise" of the Chavez sisters. Fulkerson had been co-operating with Gonzales to find a purchaser for the land, and the jury found he was the agent of Gonzales.

Some time in the summer of 1908 there came to El Paso from Georgia two brothers, W. W. and G. C. Varn, who it appears had, or were able to control, capital, which they desired to invest in Mexican timber lands. They could not speak the Spanish language, nor understand it when it was spoken, and for that reason engaged one Numa G. Buchoz, and one Bernard Schuster, land agents and brokers, to represent them. Buchoz and Schuster and Fulkerson had offices near each other, and all three acted as interpreters and agents of the Varns, and later became their partners.

Some time in August, as nearly as the date can be arrived at from the statement of facts, the Varns and their interpreters and agents and Gonzales, six in all, went, at the expense of the Varns, to inspect the lands, which were bounded on one side for a long distance by land owned by one Shaw. The Varns were shown timber on the Chavez lands, and were shown also, either by mistake or designedly, it appears designedly, much timber of the finest quality as being on the Chavez land, but which was in fact on the Shaw land, and large areas of the Chavez land, which was intersected by inaccessible gorges and canyons, were not shown the Varns at all.

As has been said, the Varns could neither speak nor understand Spanish, and were wholly dependent on Fulkerson, Buchoz, and Schuster for information about the land, and believed the land belonged to Gonzales. After the inspection had been made Gonzales on September 24, 1908, in the city of Durango made a contract with the Chavez sisters, by which they agreed to sell to him, or any person he might designate, their land, which contract was termed an "option or promise of sale," and which was to expire November 4, 1909. The price was to be 35,000 pesos, payable when Gonzales made a deed. Gonzales bound himself to pay semiannually, 1,500 pesos, interest on a mortgage on the land. He was given the right to cut timber paying 100 pesos a carload. If he did not effect a sale, all payments and all the machinery put on the land were to revert to the Chavez sisters. Five days later in the city of Juarez, Mexico, or on September 29, 1908, a contract in most elaborate form was made between Gonzales on the one side and Fulkerson, Schuster, Buchoz, W. W. Varn, and G. C. Varn, in the order named, on the other. By the terms of said contract the minuto de contrato between Gonzales and Fulkerson was first annulled, and the contract between Gonzales and the Chavez sisters of September 24, was recited substantially in complete form. Gonzales transferred and assigned to the five other parties his right and shares arising under the contract he had made with the Chavez sisters.

It had been contemplated that only the Varns should be grantees or assignees, but they were told by their interpreters and agents that the contract was so desirable that they, Fulkerson, Buchoz, and Schuster, would take an interest to the extent of one-half, and they and the Varns made then and there a verbal agreement to become partners in the venture, and the instrument was so executed, Fulkerson taking one-fourth, Buchoz one-eighth, Schuster one-eighth, and the Varns one-half. The price of the "assignment" was $18,195, represented by one note for $15,000 gold, due January 1, 1909, with 8 per cent. interest, and one due in two years for $3,195, bearing the same interest. The "assignees" were to pay the interest Gonzales had promised to pay on the mortgage. It is recited that the instrument was read to the signers in Spanish by the notary, and in English by an appointed interpreter, but the Varns never saw the Chavez sisters contract with Gonzales, and understood he owned the land. The two notes were duly prepared in Spanish, and were signed by Fulkerson, Buchoz, Schuster, and the Varns, and were delivered to Gonzales, and were the notes sued on in this action.

On October 27, 1908, in El Paso, the verbal agreement of partnership above referred to was put into written form, but the recital in it was that the parties were to pay the $17,500 to the Chavez sisters, and the $18,195 represented by the notes and $10,000 in cash, making altogether $45,695 United States gold. It was specifically recited that to the payment of the $10,000 cash each of the parties had contributed in the proportion of Fulkerson one-fourth, Buchoz one-eighth, Schuster one-eighth, G. C. Varn one-fourth, and W. W. Varn one-fourth. The $17,500 to be paid the Chavez sisters was referred to as a debt of Gonzales assumed by the partnership, which appears to support the testimony of G. C. Varn that he believed the lands belonged to Gonzales. The Varns paid their one-half of the $10,000, and went upon the land and established a camp, and cut out trails, and proceeded to cut timber. When the interest installment became due November 1, 1908, G. C. Varn paid it. He agreed to make certain advances, and even to paying the $15,000 due January 1, 1909, if the partnership could not do so. The Varns believed that their copartners had paid in good faith their half of the $10,000, and were to pay their half of the notes, and but for such belief would not have made the contract. The jury so found.

Some time between November 1, 1908, and January 1, 1909, the Varns learned that their copartners and agents had not paid their half of the $10,000, or, if they did, it it had been returned to them by Gonzales, and that they were not to pay their half of the notes, which arrangement was a secret agreement between them and Gonzales, made when the Juarez contract was executed. The Varns on being so advised, at once sought out Gonzales and charged him with the deception and secret agreement, which he admitted, and offered to surrender the notes if the Varns would pay him $10,000 Mexican money, which they declined to do, but repudiated the contract, and offered Gonzales possession of the land, which he refused to accept, saying he would sue on the notes.

These facts are revealed by the record in practically undisputed form. Though Gonzales and the three interpreters, agents, and partners were on the stand, neither was even asked a question calling for a definite categorical denial of the allegations made by the Varns, on which the defense of fraud was based, and the court found as a fact that the secret agreement was made as alleged.

Opinion.

[1] From the preliminary statement of the case set out above it is too clear to leave room for doubt or debate that the contract which was the basis of the action was void and unenforceable because contrary to public policy. It is practically undisputed that the three of the signers of the contract and notes, Fulkerson, Buchoz, and Schuster, stood in the threefold relation to the two other signers, the Varns, of interpreters, agents and partners, and it is elementary law that in each and all of said relations there rested upon them the obligation to preserve the utmost good faith towards those who were at once their principals and partners. It is equally as clearly shown that they did not observe or perform that obligation, but, on the contrary, secretly conspired with the payee of the note to perpetrate a fraud on the Varns. There is no possible ground in morals or in law upon which an action based upon such a contract can be maintained. It has been so adjudged by the Supreme Court of Texas in the past, and those holdings are approved by the present Supreme Court, and the law is so laid down in the reports of many, if not all the other states and in the text-books. Seeligson v. Lewis, 65 Tex. 215, 57 Am. Rep. 593; Wegner v. Biering, 65 Tex. 506; Haswell v. Blake (Civ. App.) 90 S. W. 1125; Reed v. Brewer, 90 Tex. 144, 37 S. W. 418; Simon v. Garlitz, 63 Tex. Civ. App. 172, 133 S. W. 464.

"If a contract involves the violation of a penal law, the court will declare it void, and any agreement the object of which is to defraud an individual or two or more individuals is illegal, and it has been held that any contract which involves a fraud on the rights of others is against public policy." Elliott on Contracts, vol. 2, p. 8 et seq., and notes.

[2, 3] It was contended by appellee in the Court of Civil Appeals that the appellants ratified the contract, and on that ground alone that court affirmed the judgment. Such holding was, in our judgment, erroneous. The contract was clearly not subject to ratification. However, if it were, there is no testimony in the record sufficient to show ratification. Taking all the testimony for plaintiff to be true, it as a matter of law was not sufficient to show ratification, while the testimony for the defendants, which was undisputed, shows that they did all they were required to do in a case springing out of fraud, when upon discovery of the secret and void agreement they promptly repudiated the contract and tendered back the property, which tender was refused. Dawson v. Sparks, 1 Posey, Unrep. Cas. 745; 2 Parsons on Contracts, 780. The trial court should have instructed a verdict for defendants, and erred in rendering the judgment for plaintiff, and the Court of Civil Appeals erred in affirming that judgment.

We recommend that the judgment of both the district court and the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and judgment be here rendered for plaintiffs in error against defendant in error for the $5,000 paid defendant in error by the Varns, and for the $750 paid by the Varns as interest on the mortgage, with interest on both of said sums from the date of the respective payments, and for all costs of all courts.

HOUSTON OIL CO. OF TEXAS v. HOLLAND. (No. 153-3116.)

1. Adverse possession \Leftrightarrow 107—Possession of small field in 640-acre tract held not to show adverse possession of undivided 160-acre tract.

One holding possession for more than ten years of a field 5 to 6 acres in a survey containing 640 acres cannot claim adverse possession to an undivided 160 acres not definitely located, where he exercised no actual possession outside field, and he bought from one who only claimed the field, and owner of survey had no notice of any claim beyond limits of field.

2. Trespass to try title \Leftrightarrow 47(1) — Where pleadings or evidence do not describe tract of land held adversely, no judgment therefor can be given.

Where in trespass to try title to recover a 160-acre tract claimed by adverse possession of a 5½-acre tract included therein, plaintiff showed adverse possession to the smaller tract alone, but the pleadings or evidence did not show its location or give a description thereof there is no basis for a judgment for the smaller tract.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Ninth Supreme Judicial District.

Trespass to try title by J. H. Holland against the Houston Oil Company of Texas. From judgment of Court of Civil Appeals (196 S. W. 668) affirming judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

H. O. Head, of Sherman, and Parker & Kennerly and Kennerly, Williams, Lee & Hill, all of Houston, for plaintiff in error.

Thomas & Wheat and Tom F. Coleman, all of Woodville, for defendant in error.

SADLER, P. J. J. H. Holland filed suit in trespass to try title against the Houston Oil Company of Texas to recover an undivided 160 acres out of the N. H. Hove (or Hooe) 640-acre survey. He based his right upon the ten-year statute of limitation. He pleaded and the evidence tended to show his possession of a small undefined tract of about 5½ acres of the survey for the ten-year period. Neither in the petition nor by proof is the description of the 5½ acres given. The pleading and evidence wholly failed to show any character of dominion exercised by Holland over any definite portion of the larger survey lying without the fencing by which the 5½-acre tract was inclosed. No actual possession is shown to the outland by Holland. His pleading and the agreement of counsel is tantamount to a disclaimer as to all the land in the survey except 160 acres. The description of the 160-acre tract in the petition is not very definitely given, and only in a general manner, so as to include the 5½-acre tract. However, it is not shown that he did any act impressing his possession on the thus defined 160 acres. The description in the petition is clearly nothing more than an effort to render certain the partition desired by Holland.

It was agreed that the oil company had the record title to the whole of the survey, subject alone to such title as Holland might show under his plea of limitation.

In the state of the record Holland shows title, if at all, to the 5½-acre tract only.

Richardson, from whom Holland purchased, claimed and sold only the 5½-acre tract. Holland does not claim that he bought from Richardson a claim to the 160 acres defined in his petition, or to a definite or indefinite 160 acres out of the Hove. Upon the purchase Holland went into possession of the 5½ acres in continuation of the existing possession held by Richardson. This did not extend beyond the inclosure of the small tract. Holland's possession of this small tract was limited by his purchase to that alone as notice in support of the statute.

Thus holding the small tract, by a simple process of the mind, Holland sought to extend his claim beyond the inclosure to an undefined quantity of land necessary to enlarge his holding to 160 acres. No act is shown which constituted notice to the title owner that such secret intention and claim existed. As said by Judge Gaines:

"There were no 'external circumstances discovering that inward intention.'" Titel v. Garland, 99 Tex. 208, 87 S. W. 1152.

[1] The defendant in error fails to show title by limitation to the excess beyond the 5½-acre tract. Lumber Co. v. Kennedy, 108 Tex. 297, 126 S. W. 1110; Titel v. Garland, 99 Tex. 208, 87 S. W. 1152; McAdams v. Hooks, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 79, 104 S. W. 432; Rice, Executor, v. Goolsbee, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 254, 99 S. W. 1031.

[2] Neither by the pleading nor by the evidence is the location of the 5½-acre tract shown. No description of this is given. The evidence furnishes no data on which the verdict of the jury or the judgment of the court can be based as to this tract. Giddings v. Fischer, 97 Tex. 184, 77 S. W. 209.

The judgments of the Court of Civil Appeals and of the trial court should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission on the question discussed.

BERGSTEDT v. BENDER. (No. 136-2045.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A. June 16, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser §44—Contract held not to have been procured through undue influence.

Contract for sale of lands held on the evidence, not to have been procured through undue influence.

2. Specific performance §8—Remedy within court's discretion.

A decree for specific performance of a contract is not a matter of right, but rests in the sound discretion of the trial court, which discretion is not arbitrary, but judicial, and must be exercised according to the established doctrine and principles of equity.

3. Specific performance §16—Relief denied where contract fair at inception has become harsh and inequitable.

Liberty of contract should not be unduly restricted, and for that reason specific performance will not necessarily be denied, because a contract fair at its inception has since become inequitable through subsequent events, for a court largely judges a contract as of the time of execution, but if there has been a great change in circumstances, whereby the enforcement of the contract would be harsh and inequitable, specific performance will be denied.

4. Specific performance §16—Denied where death of vendor renders contract inequitable.

Where a woman who had a considerable expectancy contracted to sell her homestead, worth nearly $5,000, for $1,500, the purchaser agreeing that she might occupy it rent free for life, and that he should pay taxes, held that, where the woman died before the contract was executed, specific performance as against the devisee of the homestead will be denied, and the purchaser left to his remedy at law; for, while the contract may have been fair at its inception, death rendered it inequitable.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of First Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by W. F. Bender against Louis Bender, in which Peter Bergstedt intervened and answered. A judgment for defendant and intervenor was reversed and rendered by the Court of Civil Appeals (187 S. W. 735), and the intervenor brings error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and that of district court affirmed.

D. E. Simmons and Jones & Jones, all of Houston, for plaintiff in error.

T. H. Stone and H. E. Stephenson, both of Houston, for defendant in error.

SONFIELD, P. J. On the 26th day of November, 1913, Mrs. Mary Hafer, under her maiden name, Bergstedt, entered into a written contract with W. F. Bender, wherein she agreed to sell and convey to Bender a certain fractional lot in the city of Houston, known as her residence or homestead, upon which she had resided for some 40 years. Under the terms of the contract, Mrs. Hafer was to have the right to occupy the premises without cost to her during her life, such right not to be assigned, nor the premises sublet. She obligated herself to carry insurance on the improvements in the sum of $1,000 until her death, the policy to be payable to Bender. In the event of the destruction of the premises by fire, the house was to be rebuilt from the proceeds of the insurance, and Mrs. Hafer given the right of occupancy. Bender obligated himself to pay all taxes accruing after the year 1913. He was to pay Mrs. Hafer for the property the sum of $1,500 cash, $100 upon the execution of the contract, and the remaining $1,400 within 60 days from the delivery of a complete abstract of title to the property, provided, the title was good and merchantable. Any defects in the title were to be pointed out in writing by the attorney of Bender, and either party should have 60 days in which to cure such defects. In the event the defects were not cured by either party within that time, then, upon demand of Bender, the $100 paid by him should be returned, and both parties thereupon be released from all liability under the contract as to each other. A part of paragraph 8 of the contract provides:

"If the title to said property is found to be a good and merchantable title, and second party does not within 60 days after delivery of abstract of title and upon a tender of a warranty deed in accordance with the terms and conditions of this contract by first party pay to the first party the remaining amount, namely, fourteen hundred dollars ($1,400.00) in cash due hereunder, then first party shall forfeit to herself and keep the said sum of one hundred dollars ($100.00) this day paid by second party, which both parties hereby agree shall be forfeited as liquidated damages in the event of failure of second party to carry out the conditions of this contract, and thereupon both parties hereto shall be released from all liability hereunder."

Mrs. Hafer died on January 14, 1914. At the March term of the county court of Harris county, 1914, Mrs. Hafer's will was probated, and Louis Bender, named therein as executor, duly qualified. Peter Bergstedt, a cousin of the testatrix, was the sole devisee under her will.

On April 4, 1914, W. F. Bender filed his petition in the county court of Harris county against his father, Louis Bender, as executor of the estate of Mrs. Hafer, seeking specific performance of the contract. The executor filed no answer, and interposed no objection to the granting of the relief sought. Peter Bergstedt intervened for the purpose of preventing enforcement. The trial resulted in a judgment in favor of W. F. Bender, from which intervener appealed to the district court of Harris county.

Specific performance was resisted on the ground that the contract was a mere option without consideration, and withdrawn before its acceptance; that it lacked mutuality, and was of a character which would not be specifically enforced; further, that the property was not properly described. He also pleaded that the execution of the contract was procured through the exercise of undue influence upon Mrs. Hafer by plaintiff, who overreached and wrongfully persuaded and induced her to execute the contract; that the property was of the reasonable market value of $5,000, and the consideration agreed to be paid was wholly inadequate.

The cause was submitted to a jury upon the two following issues:

"(1) Did Mrs. Hafer (née Bergstedt) execute the contract which is in evidence before you by reason of undue influence of W. F. Bender operating upon her mind at said time? Answer Yes or No.

"(2) What was the reasonable market value of the premises in controversy in this suit on November 26 and 27, 1913? State the amount you find in dollars and cents."

The jury answered the first question Yes, and the second that the value of the property at that time was $4,900. Upon these answers the trial court rendered judgment in favor of defendant, Louis Bender, executor, and intervener, Peter Bergstedt. On appeal, the Court of Civil Appeals reversed the judgment of the district court, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff. 187 S. W. 735.

The Court of Civil Appeals held there was no competent evidence to raise the issue of undue influence; that the property was properly described, the contract mutually binding, and the consideration adequate in view of the conditions existing at the date of the contract.

[1] In the view we take of the case, and the recommendation to be made with reference to its disposition, we deem it unnecessary to set out a full statement of the evidence. For the purpose of this opinion, the following will suffice:

There is evidence that at the date of the execution of the contract Mrs. Hafer was 70 years of age, and lived by herself upon the property here in controversy. Plaintiff was quite a young man, and conducted a meat market next door to her residence for many years. Mrs. Hafer was injured by a fall about a year before her death. There was evidence that subsequent to her injury she was physically frail, and her mental faculties greatly impaired. Some time prior to the date of the contract, she had executed her will, making intervener her sole devisee, declaring in her will that the property herein involved was the only real estate owned by her. Prior to negotiations ultimating in this contract, she had declined offers to purchase at a price in excess of that agreed to be paid by plaintiff, giving as her reason that she had devised it to intervener. A witness for plaintiff testified that Mrs. Hafer showed him the contract with plaintiff before its execution. He stated to her that the price was too cheap, and offered to make the same character of contract and give her $1,000 more than she was to receive. The offer was declined, on the ground that she wanted plaintiff to have it. The undisputed evidence established the market value of the property, at the date of the contract, to be $4,900, as found by the jury. Mrs. Hafer was taken sick on the 7th day of January, 1914, and the abstract to the property was delivered to plaintiff on the following day. From the time of the delivery of the abstract to the date of her death, on the 14th of January, 1914, Mrs. Hafer was too ill to attend to any kind of business. After receiving the abstract, and before her death, plaintiff concluded to consummate the contract. His attorney advised Mr. Tharp, who had acted as attorney for Mrs. Hafer in the matter of the contract, that they were ready to close the deal. Tharp stated that he would take the matter up with Mrs. Hafer, and declined to accept any tender. Mrs. Hafer died without executing a deed.

It must be conceded that there was no direct evidence of the exercise of any undue influence by plaintiff over Mrs. Hafer in reference to the contract. The exercise of undue influence is rarely susceptible of direct proof, and resort must usually be had to circumstances. In reaching a conclusion, consideration must be given to the age, health, mental condition, and financial status of Mrs. Hafer, her relations with plaintiff, and how far she was dependent upon and subject to his control, together with the opportunity which he had to exercise such influence.

Upon a careful consideration of the record, we concur in the conclusion reached by the Court of Civil Appeals that there was no competent evidence to raise the issue of the exercise of undue influence. The question remains, however, whether the contract is of such character as will be specifically enforced.

Intervener contends that the contract was but an option to purchase, unsupported by any consideration, and subject to withdrawal by Mrs. Hafer at any time prior to its acceptance, and that the undisputed evidence established that she did so withdraw the offer. Further, that the contract is lacking in mutuality, and will not therefore be specifically enforced. We cannot so construe the contract. The contract was one of purchase and sale. By its terms Mrs. Hafer obligated herself to sell and convey, and plaintiff to purchase and accept a conveyance, conditioned only upon the title being good and merchantable. It is true that, in virtue of that part of paragraph 3 hereinabove set out, Mrs. Hafer could not have had the contract specifically enforced against plaintiff; he being given the right of election between the consummation of the purchase and the forfeiture of the money paid. Moss & Raley v. Wren, 102 Tex. 567, 113 S. W. 739, 120 S. W. 847; Redwine v. Hudman, 104 Tex. 21, 183 S. W. 426. For plaintiff to have declined to take the property, in the event the title was good and merchantable, would have been a clear breach of the contract. But for this provision in paragraph 3 specific performance could have been enforced against him. That provision but marked the limit of plaintiff's liability and the extent of Mrs. Hafer's remedy in the event of a breach. Through this stipulation, Mrs. Hafer divested herself of the right to specific performance, leaving that remedy unimpaired as to plaintiff. The fact that Mrs. Hafer, through the contract, limited her right upon a breach to a forfeiture of the money paid will not prevent specific enforcement at the instance of plaintiff.

[2] Intervener urges that specific enforcement be denied, on the ground that the consideration of the contract is grossly inadequate, and its enforcement harsh and inequitable as to him. A decree for the specific performance of a contract is not a matter of right, but rests in the sound discretion of the court; a discretion not arbitrary but judicial, and exercised under the established doctrines and settled principles of equity. The relief will be granted or withheld by the court upon a consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case, and no definite rule has been announced by which the action of the court can be determined in all cases. As said in Willard v. Tayloe, 8 Wall. 587, 19 L. Ed. 501:

"In general it may be said that the specific relief will be granted when it is apparent, from a view of all the circumstances of the particular case, that it will subserve the ends of justice, and that it will be withheld when, from a like view, it appears that it will produce hardship or injustice to either of the parties. It is not sufficient, as shown by the cases cited, to call forth the equitable interposition of the court that the legal obligation under the contract to do the specific thing desired may be perfect. It must also appear that the specific enforcement will work no hardship or injustice, for if that result would follow the court will leave the parties to their remedies at law."

[3, 4] It is contended by plaintiff that, viewed in the light of the conditions and circumstances existing at the date of the contract, the consideration was adequate and the terms fair and equitable. While Mrs. Hafer was quite old, it was in contemplation of the parties that she would live for some considerable period, her life expectancy being $8\frac{1}{2}$ years. The cash to be paid her was but a part of the consideration. In addition thereto, she was to have the right of occupancy during her life, free of all taxes; and, had she lived for a period of years, the contract might have become extremely onerous to plaintiff. The contention, if conceded, would be quite convincing urged against the setting aside of an executed contract; but it is not so potent, and is far from conclusive, when urged in favor of specific performance.

It is true that courts of equity will, in large measure judge a contract as of the time of its execution. If fair when made, its enforcement will not necessarily be denied because it has become harsh and inequitable through subsequent events and changed conditions. Courts will not enter into an investigation and determine the wisdom of a bargain made by persons competent to deal with their own affairs. Liberty of contract will not be unduly restricted. Mere hardship resulting from miscalculations or from contingencies which might have been foreseen, and for which plaintiff is not at fault, will not ordinarily prevent a specific enforcement. 25 R. C. L. 224. This principle finds application and illustration in the many cases where, through fluctuation in values, a contract, fair in its inception, becomes harsh and oppressive.

But it is well established that the court, in determining specific enforcement, is not limited to, or entirely governed by, the conditions existing at the date of the contract. Where there has been a great change of circumstances, whereby the enforcement of the contract against a party thereto would be harsh and inequitable, violative of its true intent and spirit, or would not effectuate the purpose of its execution, or where, through such subsequent events the rights of third persons become involved, and an enforcement would be harsh and inequitable as to them, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, may deny enforcement. 25 B. C. L. 253.

As said by Mr. Justice Field in Willard v. Tayloe, supra:

"The same discretion is exercised where the contract is fair in its terms, if its enforcement, from subsequent events, or even from collateral circumstances, would work hardship or injustice to either of the parties."

In 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 750A, the rule is announced that:

"Courts of equity will not proceed to decree a specific performance where the contract is founded in fraud, mistake, undue advantage, or gross misapprehension, or where from a change of circumstances, or otherwise, it would be unconscientious to enforce it."

The doctrine is recognized in Marks v. Gates, 154 Fed. 481, 83 C. C. A. 321, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 317, 12 Ann. Cas. 120, wherein the court says:

"A contract may be valid in law and not subject to cancellation in equity, and yet the terms thereof, the attendant circumstances, and in some cases the subsequent events, may be such as to require the court to deny its specific performance."

Upon the death of Mrs. Hafer, the title to the property vested in intervener. The relief sought by plaintiff is against him as the present owner. He was not a party to the contract. True, his title vested after its execution, but after-acquired rights of third persons are equitable considerations to be regarded in determining whether the contract should be specifically enforced. Curran v. Holyoke Water Power Co., 116 Mass. 90; 38 Cyc. 619.

Viewed, then, in the light of conditions existing at the date of the contract, and the changed conditions through the death of Mrs. Hafer, should the court decree a specific enforcement? We think not.

It is not contended that $1,500 is an adequate consideration for property worth, at the date of the contract, $4,900. The cash consideration, standing alone, would, under the facts of this case, be so grossly inadequate as to warrant a court, not only to refuse specific performance, but, in the event the contract had been executed, to set aside and cancel the deed made in virtue thereof. It is recognized by the plaintiff and by the Court of Civil Appeals that the greater part of the consideration was the right of occupancy of the property by Mrs. Hafer, and its protection, through payment by plaintiff of all taxes thereafter to accrue, thus insuring to her a home place for and during the period of her life. It cannot be doubted from the record that this was the motive impelling Mrs. Hafer to enter upon the contract. The death of Mrs. Hafer, while the contract was wholly executory, nothing having been done thereunder, save the payment of a small part of the cash consideration and the procuring of an abstract, rendered complete performance on the part of defendant impossible. He could not pay the cash consideration, her death freeing him from the obligations forming the greater part of the consideration. He seeks at the hands of the court, as against intervener, the enforcement of a contract through which he will acquire title to property for a consideration, not only far less than its market value, but far less than contemplated and provided for in the contract. A decree in his favor would not follow the terms of the contract. Conceding the fairness of the contract in its inception, its specific enforcement will, under the changed conditions and circumstances, enable plaintiff to obtain an inequitable and unconscionable advantage in consequence of an unforeseen event, and violate the spirit and intention of the contract. Under such circumstances, a court of equity should not lend its aid, but remand the plaintiff to his remedy at law.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and that of the district court affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

SOVEREIGN CAMP, WOODMEN OF THE WORLD, v. BAILEY. (No. 151-2937.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A. June 16, 1920.)

Insurance §826(2)—Instruction erroneous in authorizing verdict against insurer without finding on defensive issue.

In an action on benefit certificate, where the fraternal insurer defended on the ground the member met his death while in violation of law, etc., a charge that, if the state of the evidence was such that it could not be determined whether the member on the occasion of his death had made or attempted to make an unlawful assault, and in consequence thereof met his death, verdict should be for plaintiff, was erroneous, authorizing a verdict for plaintiff without requiring a finding on the defensive issue.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by O. F. Bailey, guardian, against the Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World.

A judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (183 S. W. 107), and defendant brings error. Judgment of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and cause remanded for further trial.

A. H. Burnett, of Omaha, Neb., R. L. Daniel, of Victoria, and Henry, McCloskey & Robertson, of San Antonio, for plaintiff in error.

Proctor, Vandenberge, Crain & Mitchell, of Victoria, for defendant in error.

TAYLOR, J. Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World, a fraternal beneficiary association, issued to W. L. Bailey its certificate for the sum of $3,000, payable upon his death to Willie Lee Bailey, his minor child. The father lost his life on April 1, 1912.

This suit was by O. F. Bailey, as guardian of the minor, to recover the amount alleged to be due under the certificate. The cause was tried before a jury and resulted in a verdict and judgment for Bailey. The Court of Civil Appeals affirmed the judgment. 183 S. W. 107. Writ of error was granted by the Supreme Court.

The principal defense urged by the association was predicated upon that provision of the certificate, as well as of the constitution and by-laws of the association, to the effect that, in the event the member holding the certificate should meet his death or die in consequence of the violation or attempted violation of the laws of the state or the United States, the certificate should become null and void, and that all rights thereunder should be forfeited.

It was averred in the defensive allegations of plaintiff in error, among other things, that Bailey at the time of his death was engaged in an unlawful assault upon Alvin Holzheuser, and was rudely displaying a pistol, and was attempting to murder Charles Holzheuser; that his acts in shooting at Charles Holzheuser and attempting to murder him were in violation of the laws of Texas and of the United States; that Charles Holzheuser, for the purpose of defending himself and his brother Alvin, shot and killed Bailey.

The court in the fourth paragraph of its main charge instructed the jury that, if they believed the death of Bailey was in consequence of the violation or attempted violation of the law of the state, they should return a verdict in favor of the association; but, if not the result of such violation or attempted violation of law, they should return a verdict in favor of Bailey. The jury was instructed also as to the other alleged violations of law.

The eighth paragraph of the charge is as follows:

"You are further instructed that, if you conclude that the state of the evidence in this case is such that you are unable to make a finding either affirmative or negative upon the issue as to whether or not the said W. L. Bailey on the occasion of his death had made, or attempted to make, an unlawful assault upon said Alvin or Charles Holzheuser or either, and in consequence thereof met his death, you will find for the plaintiff."

That part of the charge quoted was wrong, in that it warrants a verdict for Bailey without requiring a finding upon the defensive issue. The charge does more than to place upon the association the burden of proof upon that issue. The jury were told, in effect, that a verdict could be reached without a finding upon the issue, either affirmative or negative.

The error in the charge is such, in our opinion, as to require a reversal of the case.

The other assignments of error contained in the application for the writ relate to the refusal of the court to require the Holzheusers to answer certain questions propounded to them which they refused to answer on the ground that they feared the answers would tend to incriminate them. While it is not probable that the question will arise upon another trial of the case, we are of opinion that the Court of Civil Appeals correctly disposed of the assignments raising it in different forms in that court.

We recommend therefore that the judgments of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that the cause be remanded for further trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission on the question discussed.

GREENWOOD, J., took no part in the decision of this case.

FREEMAN v. WILSON. (No. 133-2995.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 16, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 2—Petition for writ filed under act governed wholly thereby.

Where petition for writ of error was filed under Laws 1913, c. 55, it is governed wholly by such act.

2. Master and servant \S 264(4)—Allegation of negligence held sufficient to take case to jury on theory presented by evidence.

In view of inclusiveness of general allegations of defendant railway receiver's negligence in furnishing defective pick, plaintiff employe held entitled to have cause determined by jury in accordance with theory presented by his evidence that pick was so defectively tempered that, when struck against a steel rail, it threw off a sliver.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by C. W. Wilson against T. J. Freeman, receiver of the International & Great Northern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which reversed and remanded the cause (149 S. W. 413), whereupon writ of error was sued out by plaintiff to the Supreme Court, which held it was the duty of the Court of Civil Appeals to determine an excess in the judgment (108 Tex. 121, 185 S. W. 993, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 1203), and thereafter the Court of Civil Appeals required remittitur and affirmed (189 S. W. 1199), and defendant brings error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals affirmed, on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

Ramsey, Black & Ramsey, of Austin, Wilson, Dabney & King, of Houston, F. C. Davis, Marshall Eskridge, and Hicks & Hicks, all of San Antonio, and John M. King, of Houston, for plaintiff in error.

J. D. Childs, of San Antonio, W. O. Campbell, of Palestine, and James W. Brown, of San Antonio, for defendant in error.

SADLER, P. J. On the 12th day of June, 1911, C. W. Wilson, as plaintiff, recovered a judgment in the district court of Bexar county against T. J. Freeman, receiver of the International & Great Northern Railway Company, for $20,386.05, from which judgment an appeal was had to the Court of Civil Appeals, and the judgment reversed and the cause remanded. 149 S. W. 413.

The Court of Civil Appeals held that the verdict was excessive, overruling all of the contentions made by the appellant except in this particular. Writ of error was sued out by Wilson, and the Supreme Court (108 Tex. 121, 185 S. W. 993, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 1203) held that it was the duty of the Court of Civil Appeals to determine the excess in the judgment. Thereafter the Court of Civil Appeals required a remittitur of $3,000, and, on same being filed, affirmed the judgment of the trial court. The appellant filed a motion for rehearing, which being overruled by the Court of Civil Appeals, writ of error was granted to the Supreme Court.

On the trial of the cause, after the plaintiff had rested, the receiver filed a motion asking for an instructed verdict in its favor. This was overruled. After all of the evidence was in, the defendant below requested a peremptory instruction, which was also overruled.

[1] Touching the question of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to entertain this case because of want of importance in the questions presented, we desire to call attention to the fact that the jurisdiction to entertain the petition for writ of error is governed wholly by the act of 1913 (Laws 1913, c. 55), as the petition was filed under that act.

The cause is before us on several grounds of error assigned to the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals. In our view of the case, however, it will be necessary to consider only those assignments relating to the refusal of the trial court to give a peremptory instruction. The disposition of these assignments will be inclusive of the questions presented by other germane assignments. In alleging negligence as a basis for recovery, plaintiff charged:

"That on the 6th day of December, 1909, near Overton, in Rusk county, Texas, he was in the employ of said defendants and temporarily stationed in said Rusk county, Texas, and while in said employ to the carelessness and negligence of defendants, it became necessary for him, in his regular line of employment, to engage at a piece of work for defendants in which it was necessary and was required of him to handle and work with a pick in order to remove cross-ties from the roadbed of said defendants, and in using said pick a piece of steel or metallic substance slivered off from said pick, or from the steel rail, which he struck with said pick, and with great force and violence, and entered the left eye of plaintiff.

"That at said time and place the defendants were negligent in furnishing plaintiff with a pick which was old, worn, defective, blunt, battered, and insufficient, with a crooked, defective, and insufficient handle, which rendered the striking with said pick difficult and uncertain, and defendants were further negligent in then and there failing to provide plaintiff a safe place in which to work, because the embankment was steep and washed out at that place, and in failing to provide plaintiff a sufficient number of men to do the said work, which caused plaintiff and compelled to him to work as a section hand, instead of only requiring him to supervise the said work, and he was therefore, in fact, the same as any other hand, and working under the general supervision of the roadmaster of said defendants, and the plaintiff was by defendants' said negligence required to work at said dangerous place as aforesaid with said defective tool, and the defendants had therefore negligently permitted the grass to grow along the embankment of said place, which concealed a piece of iron, over which plaintiff stumbled at the same time he made his lick with the said pick at one of the cross-ties on said railroad bed of defendants, and missed the said cross-tie, and struck one of the rails, which caused the sliver as aforesaid, which would not have occurred, had said pick been in proper condition."

As we construe the allegations of negligence on the part of the receiver, it was in furnishing plaintiff a pick which, from its condition and from the character of the ground upon which he was required to work, caused him to strike the steel rail, resulting in his injury.

The direct charge is nowhere made in the petition that the receiver was negligent in furnishing the plaintiff with a pick which was improperly tempered, and which by reason of its tempered condition threw off a particle of steel when coming in contact with the steel rail. In view, however, of the general allegations of negligence, the Supreme Court has indicated that—

"The allegations as to the defective condition of the pick, broad and general as they were, were amply sufficient to rendered competent the proof made as to its particular condition, and that by its use the plaintiff was injured in the manner shown."

On the trial of the case, the only evidence of negligence presented by the record was in furnishing a pick not properly tempered, and so defectively tempered as, when struck against a steel rail, to throw off a "sprawl" or "sliver," which produced the injury to plaintiff. The court submitted the cause to the jury on the theory of negligence on the part of the receiver in furnishing a defective and insufficient pick.

[2] In view, therefore, of the inclusiveness of the general allegations of negligence, the plaintiff was entitled to have the cause determined by the jury in accordance with the theory presented by the evidence.

A very careful consideration of the other assignments discloses no question meriting discussion. We therefore recommend that the last judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

HILLIARD v. STATE. (No. 5831.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 26, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §534(2)—Declaration while under arrest leading to discovery of money taken, admissible.

A declaration of one accused of robbery leading to the discovery of money or property taken is admissible, although made while under arrest, without warning, and although induced by promise and not reduced to writing, but it is incumbent upon the state to prove identity of the money found and that taken.

2. Criminal law §517(4)—Proof of identity of money discovered by reason of declaration of accused while under arrest may be made by circumstances.

The proof that money discovered by reason of a declaration of one accused of robbery and under arrest is that which was taken from prosecuting witness, necessary to render the declaration admissible, may be made by circumstances.

3. Criminal law §736(2)—Admissibility of defendant's declaration for jury.

Where the single fact which would render a confession or declaration of one accused of robbery admissible was the identity of the property found by reason of a declaration or confession with that taken, it was the duty of the court to submit to the jury this question of fact and make the admissibility of the question depend on its solution by the jury; the identity of property found with that stolen being a controverted fact.

4. Criminal law §406(2)—Declaration made without warning while under arrest inadmissible.

The court erred in permitting the sheriff to testify that he obtained a pistol from the home of accused's father and exhibited it to accused, and that he admitted that it was the pistol used in the robbery, the accused then being under arrest, unwarned, declaration not being reduced to writing, and pistol not being found by reason of the declaration.

5. Criminal law §925½(1)—Consideration by jury of information received after retirement that coindictor had been convicted ground for new trial.

The court should have granted a motion for a new trial in a robbery case where the jury in their retirement were informed that a coindictor with defendant had been convicted and his punishment assessed at confinement for five years, and such information was made the subject of discussion by the members of the jury before they arrived at a verdict, and before they reached the conclusion that defendant was guilty.

Appeal from District Court, Matagorda County; M. S. Munson, Judge.

Rooster Hilliard was convicted of robbery with firearms, and he appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Holman, C. M. Gaines, and Styles, Krause & Erickson, all of Bay City, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. Appellant is condemned to confinement in the penitentiary for a period of five years for the offense of robbery with firearms. Appellant and Zara Bouldin were jointly indicted for robbing John Weldon of $51 in money. The appellant and Bouldin were separately tried. Weldon had in his possession $51, and while in company with Bouldin at night the robbery occurred. A person not identified presented a pistol, and ordered Weldon and Bouldin to deposit in a hat, which the assailant produced, their money. Bouldin pretended to put in the hat money in his possession, and Weldon deposited $51 therein.

The theory of the state was that Bouldin and appellant were acting together, and the state depended upon circumstantial evidence to identify the appellant; one of the circumstances relied upon being the declaration of appellant made to the sheriff while under arrest. The declaration was not in writing, and was not brought within the requirements of article 810, C. C. P. There was a conflict between the testimony of the sheriff and the appellant touching the circumstances under which the statement was made, and with reference to the substance of the statement. It is the contention of the appellant that the declaration was rendered inadmissible because it was a verbal statement made to the sheriff without warning while under arrest, and was induced by promises and persuasion. This is met by the claim that the statement led to the recovery of the fruits of the crime.

Weldon, the injured party, had before the offense received from the sheriff $53 consisting, according to the sheriff's testimony, of two $20 bills, and 13 $1 bills. The sheriff said that appellant told him where he would find the money, and that he, in company with appellant, went to the home of appellant's father and found under the house $48, consisting of thirteen $1 bills, a $10 bill, a $5 bill, and a $20 bill. According to the state's testimony, there were no peculiarities about the money which served to identify it. Appellant claimed that before the money was obtained the sheriff described it as having certain peculiarities which were not observable in the money secured. Appellant in his testimony said that the sheriff represented to him that certain witnesses, whom he named, were going to swear to facts which would convict the appellant of the offense, but that, if he could get the money which Weldon had lost, the matter would be hushed up and the appellant released; that he then told the sheriff, in substance, that he had not committed the offense, but that he had some money which he had earned, and which he had hid on the sill of his father's house, and that he would go with him and get the money mentioned, as he was willing to surrender it to secure his release; that the inducement for this was his reliance on the promise of release and belief of the statement made to him by the sheriff that he had witnesses who would prove his guilt, although in fact he had not committed the crime. He supported his testimony as to the ownership of the money by the evidence of his father.

[1-3] If, in fact, the money recovered was that of which Weldon was robbed, the declaration of the appellant leading to the discovery of the money was admissible, although made while under arrest without warning, and although induced by promises, and not reduced to writing. Jones v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 329, 96 S. W. 980; Branch's Crim. Law, § 222. Since, however, the admissibility of his confession or declaration depended upon the identity of the money found with that which was stolen, it was incumbent upon the state to prove such identity. This proof might be made by circumstances, but, being controverted, it was a question for the jury. Bagley v. State, 3

Tex. App. 166; Hooton v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 6, 108 S. W. 651; Lynne v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 376, 111 S. W. 729; Doss v. State, 28 Tex. App. 506, 13 S. W. 788; Davis v. State, 68 Tex. Cr. R. 400, 152 S. W. 1096; Branch's Annotated Penal Code, § 2482. That the evidence showing the description of the money found and that which was stolen, standing alone, was insufficient to establish the identity is obvious. There was a difference in the aggregate amount and in the denomination of the bills. Johnson v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 394, 37 S. W. 424; Wayland v. State, 218 S. W. 1068, and authorities therein referred to. The single fact which would render the confession or declaration of the appellant admissible being the identity of the property found with that stolen, and this being controverted, it was the duty of the court, upon request of the appellant, to submit to the jury this question of fact, and make the admissibility of the confession dependent upon its solution by the jury: Doss v. State, 28 Tex. Cr. R. 506, 13 S. W. 788; Davis v. State, 68 Tex. Cr. R. 400, 152 S. W. 1096; Branch's Crim. Law, § 236. The special charges requested upon the subject, while not wholly accurate, we think, in connection with the exceptions to the court's charge and other matters in the record, were sufficient to require the court to give an appropriate instruction to the jury upon the subject.

[4] The sheriff obtained a pistol from the home of appellant's father. Both the appellant and his father testified that the pistol had been placed in the house before the robbery, and had not been removed, and was not used in committing the offense. The sheriff testified that he exhibited the pistol to the appellant, and that he admitted that it was the pistol used in the robbery. This declaration was made while the appellant was under arrest, unwarned, was not reduced to writing, and, in our judgment, was erroneously admitted over the objection of the appellant. As we understand the record, the pistol was not found by reason of any declaration made by the appellant, but the declaration testified to was made after the pistol had been found at the home of appellant's father. Wiseman v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 383, 26 S. W. 627; Musgrave v. State, 28 Tex. App. 57, 11 S. W. 927; Walker v. State, 2 Tex. App. 326.

[5] By motion for a new trial, supported by a statement of facts duly certified and filed during the term, it is made to appear that the jury in their retirement were informed that Zara Bouldin, the coindictée with appellant, had been convicted and his punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for a period of five years; that the same was made the subject of some discussion by members of the jury before they arrived at a verdict, and before they reached the conclusion that appellant was guilty.

This ground of the motion for a new trial should have been sustained. Tutt v. State, 49 Tex. Cr. R. 202, 91 S. W. 584; Morawitz v. State, 49 Tex. Cr. R. 366, 91 S. W. 227; Horn v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 404, 97 S. W. 822; McDougal v. State, 81 Tex. Cr. R. 179, 194 S. W. 947, L. R. A. 1917E, 930. Some other questions raised will doubtless not occur on another trial. See Bouldin v. State, 222 S. W. 555, this day decided.

The errors pointed out require a reversal of the judgment, which is ordered.

BOULDIN v. STATE. (No. 5835.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 26, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §528—Confession of coconspirator after transaction inadmissible.

A confession of an alleged coconspirator in a robbery case was not admissible as against defendant, where made after the transaction.

2. Criminal law §448(11)—Testimony that alleged coconspirator suited description of person described by prosecuting witness inadmissible.

Testimony by a sheriff over objection that an alleged coconspirator suited the description of party described to him by prosecuting witness was inadmissible, being but a conclusion that such coconspirator was the man described, although it would be proper for the prosecuting witness to describe such person to the jury.

3. Criminal law §487(1)—Person under arrest not bound by statements of sheriff in his presence.

One under arrest is not bound by anything the sheriff may have said in his presence.

4. Witnesses §327—Mental capacity proper subject of impeachment.

Mental capacity of a witness is a proper subject of consideration and impeachment, as bearing on his credibility.

5. Witnesses §331½—Insanity in family admissible to show witness' lack of mental capacity.

Insanity in the family of a witness is a proper subject of investigation, where it is sought to show that the witness is insane, or an idiot, to weaken the credibility or strength of his testimony.

6. Criminal law §354—Insanity in family admissible to show insanity of accused.

Where the question of insanity is raised upon the trial of a person accused of crime, insanity in the family of the accused is a proper subject of investigation.

Appeal from District Court, Matagorda County; M. S. Munson, Judge.

Zara Bouldin was convicted of robbery with firearms, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. S. Holman and O. M. Gaines, both of Bay City, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This conviction was had for an alleged robbery by firearms. This is a companion case to Hilliard v. State, 222 S. W. 553, this day decided. The facts are substantially the same in both cases.

The theory of the state was that appellant and Hilliard robbed a party named Weldon. Weldon testified that on the night he was robbed he was at a cold drink stand and treated appellant, and displayed some money; that they went thence to a house occupied by Hilliard, stopped for a moment or so; that appellant and Hilliard had a conversation; they went thence to another house, stopped a moment, and went to the place of the alleged robbery; that when they reached this place near the depot they stopped to attend a call of nature, when a party came upon them, presented a pistol, and demanded they put their money in a hat which he presented; that appellant placed what money he had in it; and that he (Weldon) did the same thing and they all separated. It seems that Weldon did not identify Hilliard as the party who presented the pistol, but gave a description of his costume. Among other things, he said he was wearing a certain described hat; that when the robber left Weldon remarked to appellant that he was going to the sheriff and have appellant arrested, believing that he was connected with the robbery. This was denied by appellant. They separated. Appellant went home and went to bed. Appellant's testimony is to the effect that Weldon desired to find a woman with whom to spend the night; that they went to the house where Hilliard was stopping to find a woman named Hughes; that when they reached the house they ascertained the fact that she had an engagement with Hilliard; that they then went to another house hunting another woman. When they reached that point they ascertained that she had an engagement, and in both instances the men were present. He says they left, going to another part of the town in search of girls, and reached the point where they were robbed. He describes the acts and incidents of the robbery about as did Weldon.

[1] Later during the night the sheriff went to appellant's home and arrested him. He also went to the house occupied by Hilliard and arrested a man named Harris and carried him to jail. This was on such information as he obtained from Weldon. Hilliard was present at the house at the time of the arrest of Harris and remained. After reaching the jail Harris was not incarcerated, but was permitted by the sheriff to go free. Subsequently he arrested Hilliard. After arresting Hilliard he obtained what is shown in the record to be a confession from Hilliard under circumstances that would render it clearly inadmissible, except for the fact the sheriff said by reason of the confession he discovered or recovered a certain amount of money in pursuance of this information. It may be stated at this point that this money was not identified as the money taken from Weldon. If so, it was so indefinite that it is a serious question as to whether this was the money taken from Weldon. He also found a pistol later at the residence of Hilliard's father which had been recently discharged. It is asserted by Weldon that the man who robbed him fired one shot after the robbery was committed. It is unnecessary in this case to discuss the preliminaries and the predicate shown by the state for its introduction. Appellant was not present when the confession was made, was in jail, had no connection with it, and the confession did not implicate him. The various questions raised with reference to these matters are not discussed for the broader reason that this confession as it came was not introducible against the defendant. The state's theory was that appellant was criminally connected with Hilliard in the robbery, that they planned it, and that Hilliard robbed Weldon in pursuance of that agreement, and appellant was present. There is no contention that appellant had any of the money taken from Weldon. The evidence in this connection, to say the least of it, is not of a very cogent nature. Appellant was with Weldon when he went to the two houses mentioned, was with him at the time of the robbery, and had had a conversation with Hilliard at the house where the woman Hughes lived, whom he says they went to see to make an engagement for Weldon. This is weak evidence of a conspiracy to rob Weldon, but in any event the conspiracy could not be proved by the confession of Hilliard even had he implicated appellant in his confession. It was but the narration of past events in which Hilliard participated. The acts and conduct of a coconspirator after the transaction are not admissible as a general rule, and under the cases of Choice v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 297, 106 S. W. 387, and Spencer v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 291, 106 S. W. 386, this character of testimony would not be admissible. See, also, Draper v. State, 22 Tex. 401; Oouch v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 505, 126 S. W. 868; Lauderdale v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 46, 19 S. W. 679, 37 Am. St. Rep. 788; Branch's Crim. Law, § 241, p. 133. We are of opinion, therefore, that the confession of Hilliard under the circumstances stated was not admissible against appellant. There are several bills of exceptions with reference to this, but it is not thought necessary to discuss them further than stated, because this confession was not admissible against appellant.

[2] While the sheriff was testifying, he was permitted over objections to state that Hilliard suited the description of the party described to him by prosecuting witness Weldon. We think this testimony was inadmissible. It was but his conclusion that Hilliard was the man described by Weldon. If Weldon could describe Hilliard to the jury, this was permissible, but the state could not introduce the sheriff's conclusion, formed upon information received from Weldon, that Hilliard suited the description of the man as given by Weldon.

[3] The sheriff was permitted to testify as to what he told Harris after he arrested him. This statement to Harris was made in the presence of the defendant, and the question was asked as to whether the sheriff stated to Harris in appellant's presence whether he would let him go home or not. The sheriff replied:

"Well, he said he didn't know anything about it, was there asleep, and had nothing to do with it. But that wasn't my reason for turning him loose, not what he had to say about it."

In this same connection appellant proposed to prove by the defendant that in his presence the sheriff stated to Harris that he (Harris) was the man who committed the alleged robbery, and that he arrested him because he, the sheriff, believed he was the man who committed the robbery and fitted his description. Without going into a discussion of this matter, we think the sheriff's testimony ought not to have been permitted. Appellant was under arrest and would not be bound by anything the sheriff may have said in his presence. The sheriff's conclusion, and his statement as to that conclusion that Harris was or was not one of the parties implicated, was not legitimate testimony, and especially the act of the sheriff in discharging Harris from custody after Harris made the statements imputed above mentioned. Upon another trial we are of opinion this testimony should not be permitted to go before the jury.

[4-6] There are several bills of exception in the record to the exclusion of testimony offered by appellant. It was the theory of appellant that the prosecuting witness, Weldon, was, if not insane, idiotic or feeble-minded. Appellant should have been permitted to make proof that the witness was idiotic, and therefore incompetent as a witness. The statute provides that insane people shall not be permitted to testify. It was admissible for another purpose. If he was not insane or idiotic so as not to be able to testify, still such testimony could be used as impeachment of the witness upon the same theory that a witness could be shown to be drunk when the occurrences about which he testified did occur. It was held in an opinion by Judge Hurt in Meyers v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. R. 208, 89 S. W. 111, that drunkenness of the party at the time of the occurrences about which he was testifying could be shown, and to the same effect are the authorities generally. It seems to be a well-settled rule that the feeble-minded condition of the witness may be shown to impair or impeach his credit as a witness. See 40 Cyc. 2574 and 2575, and note with collated authorities; 1 Wharton, Crim. Ev. p. 750. It is laid down by these authorities that the mental capacity of the witness is the proper subject of consideration and impeachment as bearing upon his credibility. 40 Cyc. 2573, and note 34. See Wren v. Howland, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 87, 75 S. W. 874. It is also laid down by these authorities that lack of intelligence may be shown as tending to discredit the witness as to his credibility and the weight to be given his testimony. 40 Cyc. 2573, note 75. We are of opinion that the court should have permitted this testimony to go to the jury. Appellant also offered evidence to show that the mother of Weldon was an idiot. If it was sought to show that Weldon was insane, the fact that his mother was crazy or an idiot would be clearly the subject of investigation and proof. Insanity in the family of the witness would be the subject of investigation if the question was one of proving the insanity of the witness. This is unquestionably so where the question of insanity is raised upon the trial of a person accused of crime. We see no valid reason why such testimony, being legitimate to show the insanity of the witness or the accused, as the case may be, would not be legitimate to prove as impairing the credibility or strength of the testimony of the supposed insane or idiotic witness.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

DAWSON v. STATE. (No. 5844.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

Criminal law §424(3)—Statement of coconspirator after consummation of transaction inadmissible.

Statement of coconspirator made out of the presence of defendant, after consummation of the transaction and after defendant had been arrested, was not admissible in evidence.

Appeal from District Court, Eastland County; E. A. Hill, Judge.

H. W. Dawson was convicted of theft, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Mays & Mays, of Eastland, for appellant.
Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of the theft of 14 joints of 6½-inch casing of sufficient value to make it a felony.

A bill of exceptions recites that McLemore Dawson a brother of defendant, was charged with the same offense; that he was not present at defendant's trial and did not testify; that Fred Cook, an employé of the Prairie Oil & Gas Company, the party to whom said casing belonged, was testifying for the state; and that the state was seeking to prove by Cook a certain conversation which had taken place out of the presence of the defendant between witness and McLemore Dawson, brother of defendant; this conversation occurred some time after defendant had been arrested on the charge set forth in the indictment in this case; that the conversation was out of the presence of defendant and without his knowledge or consent. The bill is full in its statements, and, after the objections had been urged and overruled, the witness stated:

"The defendant was not present when we had this talk. He [McLemore Dawson] told me that he, together with George Davis and Hosey Davis, went out to the Barnes lease on the afternoon of the 26th of September, 1919, and secured two loads of 6½-inch casing and hauled it to the home of the defendant, and left it on the wagon till some 8 or 9 o'clock in the evening and took it over and unloaded it at the Jew's yard. The defendant and McLemore Dawson were present when they unloaded it. He went out there at the request of his brother and drove his team, and that his brother paid him $5 per day to drive his team and haul this casing. He told me that he and George Davis and Henry Davis, brother-in-law of the defendant, and the defendant hauled at different times five separate trips."

Objection was again urged to the introduction of this conversation between McLemore Dawson and the witness Cook. This testimony was not admissible. The conspiracy, if any existed, had been consummated, and appellant had been arrested in the case at hand. Shiffett v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 530, 102 S. W. 1147; Overstreet v. State, 67 Tex. Cr. R. 565, 150 S. W. 630; Couch v. State, 58 Tex. Cr. R. 505, 126 S. W. 866; Bouldin v. State, 222 S. W. 555, decided at the present term of the court. This was but the statement of McLemore Dawson to the witness Cook of things and matters connected with this alleged violation of the law and appellant's connection with it in appellant's absence and after the consummation of the transaction, and after appellant's arrest. Under these authorities this evidence was inadmissible.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

WATTS v. STATE. (No. 5845.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Witnesses \S 52(7)—Testimony of defendant's wife as to conduct of deceased toward her available to defendant, but not to state.

In prosecution for murder, where defendant claimed to have been angered by the attentions of deceased to his (defendant's) wife, the wife's testimony as to conduct of deceased toward her was available to defendant, but not available to the state.

2. Criminal law \S 1144(12) — Lower court presumed not to have erred in absence of statement.

In absence of any statement in the bill of exceptions of the proceedings or attendant circumstances such as will enable the appellate court to know, as a certainty, that an error was committed, the court must presume that the trial court did not erroneously sanction the introduction of improper testimony, or permit prosecuting officer to transgress the rules controlling cross-examination of the appellant and his witnesses.

Appeal from District Court, San Augustine County; W. T. Davis, Special Judge.

Sylvester Watts was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. Upon indictment for murder, the conviction was for manslaughter, and punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for a period of five years. That the deceased was shot and killed by the appellant is not controverted. A shotgun loaded with buckshot was used, fired at close range, the shots striking deceased on the side of the face, neck, and shoulder. Circumstances unnecessary to relate were relied upon by the state in support of its theory that the appellant lay in wait for the deceased, and shot him from ambush while he was driving his mules hitched to his wagon. The appellant's theory, developed from his evidence, was that, angered by the attentions of the deceased to the wife of appellant, he armed himself, sought a meeting with deceased, and killed him.

[1] The correctness of the court's charge in the selection of the issues, and the manner of their submission, is not called in question. The bill, complaining of the failure of the appellant to make proof of certain facts which the evidence suggested were within the knowledge of his wife, discloses no just cause for complaint. The conduct of the deceased toward her was an important and controverted issue in the case. Her testimony upon it was available to the appellant, and not available to the state. The ruling of the trial court was in accord with that announced by this court in Mercer v. State, 17 Tex. App. 467, in which it is said:

"Her knowledge of the facts, whatever that knowledge might be, was at his command—was within his reach—and without he produced it, or consented to its production, it was a sealed book, which no human tribunal had the power to open."

Under these circumstances, we think the prosecuting attorney was justified in the remarks complained of. Other cases giving sanction to the rule are collated in Rose's Notes on Texas Reports, vol. 5, p. 431.

[2] The bill complaining of the cross-examination of the appellant's witness, George Martin, to the effect that he also went by the name of George Lewis, fails to disclose error. The surrounding facts are not disclosed, and for all that appears the cross-examination may have been entirely germane to his examination upon behalf of the appellant. The same is true with reference to the witness Lee Lacy and the witness Neely Watts, as well as that taken to the cross-examination of appellant. This court must indulge the presumption that the trial court did not erroneously sanction the introduction of improper testimony, or permit the prosecuting officer to transgress the rules controlling cross-examination of the appellant and his witnesses, and this presumption must prevail, in the instant case, in the absence of any statement in the bill of the proceedings or attendant circumstances such as will enable the appellate court to know as a certainty that an error was committed. Barkman v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 108, 52 S. W. 73; Thompson v. State, 29 Tex. App. 208, 15 S. W. 206; Spencer v. State, 61 Tex. Cr. R. 62, 133 S. W. 1049; Eldridge v. State, 12 Tex. App. 208; Cordova v. State, 6 Tex. App. 447. No phase of the evidence would have warranted a verdict for a lower degree of homicide than that which was accorded appellant, and no violation of the rules of procedure is pointed out which would tend to show that the verdict rendered was not that of an impartial jury in a trial fairly and legally conducted.

The judgment is affirmed.

HERBERG v. STATE. (No. 5708.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

1. Criminal law \S 444—One having supervision of books can testify as to their correctness.

In prosecution of agent for embezzlement by failing to remit proceeds collected for principal, employé of principal who had supervision of the keeping of principal's books can testify to the correctness of the books kept under his supervision.

2. Criminal law \S 400(8)—Employé having supervision of keeping of books not competent to state conclusion as to contents.

In prosecution of agent for embezzlement by failing to remit proceeds collected for principal, principal's employé who had charge of the keeping of its books was not competent to state his conclusions touching the contents of the book in the absence of the production of the books and the verification by him of their correctness, by testifying that the account of particular sale had not been collected.

3. Embezzlement \S 48(4)—Refusal of instruction that deposit of check without fraudulent intent was not conversion held error.

In prosecution of agent for embezzlement of proceeds collected by him for principal, where there was evidence that it was contemplated that a separate remittance was not to be made by agent upon each sale or collection, but that the aggregate amount of the day's business was to be embraced in a single cashier's check, refusal to charge that the deposit by the agent of check received in payment of the account to his credit in the bank, unless done with fraudulent intent, would not be a conversion, held error.

4. Embezzlement \S 48(1)—Charge as to conviction if amount was less than $50 held error in view of charge refused.

In prosecution of agent for embezzlement by failing to remit amount of $70.10 collected for principal, where the memorandum accompanying the cashier's check sent to the principal by agent contained an item of $60.50 described as "cash sales collections," the meaning of which was not otherwise expressed, refusal to submit issue of whether the cashier's check remitted a portion of the $70.10, and to charge that conviction could not be for more than a misdemeanor offense if the amount appropriated was less than the sum of $50, held error.

Appeal from District Court, Floyd County;
B. O. Joiner, Judge.

Gus Herberg was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Kenneth Bain, of Floydada, for appellant.
Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. [1, 2] The conviction is for embezzlement. The appellant was the agent of a corporation dealing in oil, with a principal office at Ft. Worth, in this state, and local office at Floydada. The method of doing business and keeping accounts was that appellant, in making sales of oil for either cash or credit, was required to keep a record and make reports and remittances; blanks being furnished by the corporation. It was the custom to make a separate record of each transaction; thus a book was furnished on which the sale and the amount was recorded, dated, and signed by the purchaser. This book was made with carbon so that an original and two carbon impressions were taken. The original was delivered to the purchaser, one of the carbons sent to the principal office, and the other retained in the local office. If this sale slip represented a cash transaction, exchange or cashier's check was to accompany. If it represented a credit transaction, a charge was made against the purchaser upon the books of the company at the central office. These slips bore a serial number. On the 17th of August a sale amounting to $70.10 was made to Pope, and the ticket bore the serial number 292941. On receipt of the ticket the proper charge was made upon the books of the company at Ft. Worth. On the 19th of August appellant collected from Pope $70.10 in payment of the account made on the 17th of August. Pope made the payment by check, payable to the appellant, drawn on the First State Bank of Floydada. At that time appellant had an account in the same bank, showing a credit balance of $71.84, and on receipt of the check from Pope it was deposited to appellant's credit together with other funds, making the total deposit on that day $87.35. Against this account he at once drew a check for $140.84 with which he purchased a cashier's check payable to the oil company, and which he immediately remitted to the office in Ft. Worth, accompanied by certain tickets designated "cash sales collections," these tickets aggregating $122. The remittance was also accompanied by memorandum showing credit sales collections amounting to $18.50. The cash sales collection tickets did not name the purchaser. One of them was for an item of $60.50. Other than as may be inferred from the tickets accompanying the remittance, nothing is shown by the evidence; that is to say, no direct testimony was given showing any unremitted sales or collections other than the $70.10, except that a witness for the state was permitted over appellant's objection to testify that no remittance covering the sale to Pope had been made. This witness was an employé of the company, and, while not a keeper of its books, they were kept under his supervision, and we think the circumstances detailed by him were sufficient to permit him to testify to the correctness of the books of account kept under his supervision. But in the absence of the production of the books, and the verification by him of their correctness, we think it was not competent to state his conclusions touching their contents, and this, we think, was the character of his testimony to the effect that the account of the Pope sale had not been collected. He did not, as we understand it, purport to speak from personal knowledge, but from knowledge of the books which were under his control, available to the state, and which, if their contents were desired, should have been produced. Moore v. State, 208 S. W. 918.

[3. 4] The court in its charge instructed the jury, in substance, that if appellant received from Pope $70.10 for his principal, and "did embezzle, fraudulently misapply, or convert to his own use said money, or any part thereof over $50, you will find the defendant guilty." He also instructed them, in substance, that if appellant remitted the $70.10 in payment of the Pope account, or thereafter paid it, to acquit him. The appellant sought to have the jury told that the deposit of the $70.10 to his credit in the bank, unless done with fraudulent intent, would not be a conversion. We think the circumstances were such as to demand such a charge on request. There was evidence that it was not contemplated that appellant would remit the checks received, but that he would use the funds in the purchase of exchange or cashier's check, and, as we understand the state's testimony, it was not contemplated that a separate remittance was to be made of each sale or collection, but the aggregate amount of the day's business was to be embraced in a single cashier's check. In various ways the appellant criticized the court's charge, among others contending that, if not all, then certainly the greatest part of, the $70.10 collected from Pope was, on the day of its collection, remitted to his principal, and that the memorandum accompanying the cashier's check for $140 contained an item of $60.50, described as "cash sales collections," the meaning of which was not otherwise explained; that it was not competent for the court, as a matter of law, to determine that this item did not include at least a part of the money collected from Pope; and that the charge was incomplete in failing to affirmatively present to the jury the view of the case that would enable them to have determined this matter, and to have drawn, if they would, the inference from the circumstances that the transaction did not evidence a fraudulent appropriation of the $70.10 to the use of appellant, and particularly that it did not evidence a fraudulent appropriation of an amount thereof exceeding $50. In view of the record, we think this view of the case should have been submitted to the jury in an appropriate charge, and that they should have been affirmatively told that, although there was a fraudulent appropriation of a part of the $70.10, the conviction could not be for more than a misdemeanor offense if the amount thus appropriated was less than the sum of $50. Loving v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 375, 71 S. W. 277; Day v. State, 71 Tex. Cr. R. 414, 159 S. W. 1186; Goodsoe v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 627, 108 S. W. 388.

The evidence that at the time the appellant remitted the $140.84 he did not include funds due because of the Pope account or that the remittance did not cover all that was due by him is not so conclusive as to relieve the court from submitting the question to the jury in a manner more comprehensive than was done in the charge given, which was meager and abstract in its nature.

We have examined the other questions presented and arising from the record, and find nothing likely to occur upon another trial requiring further notice.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

DAWES v. STATE. (No. 5825.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §304(13)—Court judicially knows judges of various districts.

The Court of Criminal Appeals has judicial knowledge that a particular person was not a judge of a given district.

2. Criminal law §1086(3) — Where special judge sits in criminal case, record must show his qualification.

Where special judge sits in criminal case, record must show that he was qualified or authorized to act therein, and that oath of office was administered to him, and, where it does not so show, conviction will be reversed.

Appeal from District Court, Wichita County; P. A. Martin, Special Judge.

Earl Dawes was convicted of felony theft, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

T. F. Hunter, of Wichita Falls, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. Appellant was convicted of felony theft in the district court of Wichita county, and his punishment fixed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1, 2] This court judicially knows that Hon. P. A. Martin is not judge of the Thirtieth judicial district of this state. We observe that all orders, charges, and bills of exception in this record are signed "P. A. Martin, Special Judge, 30th Judicial District." Nothing appears in the record showing how any special judge became qualified or authorized to act herein, or that any oath of office was administered to him. The uniform holding of this court seems to be that such facts must appear in the record. McMurry v. State, 9 Tex. App. 208; Thompson v. State, 9 Tex. App. 649; Snow v. State, 11 Tex. App. 99; Perry v. State, 14 Tex. App. 167; Smith v. State, 24 Tex. App. 297, 6 S. W. 40; Blanchette v. State, 29 Tex. App. 46, 14 S. W. 392; Weatherford v. State, 28 S. W. 814; Reed v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 138, 114 S. W. 834; Summerlin v. State, 153 S. W. 890.

For the reason that no such authority anywhere appears in the record, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Ex parte ALBRITTON. (No. 5165.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

Habeas corpus \S 44—Court of Criminal Appeals will not award writ, where restraint grows out of civil case.

Where relator violated a restraining order, and was imprisoned for contempt, the Court of Criminal Appeals will not entertain an application for a writ of habeas corpus, for Rev. St. art. 1529, gives the Supreme Court authority to entertain applications for writs of habeas corpus in cases in which the restraint grows out of a civil case.

Original application by W. A. Albritton for writ of habeas corpus. Application dismissed.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. This is an original application for writ of habeas corpus. Its disposition has been delayed upon request of counsel for both appellant and state, pending settlement by agreement of a civil suit out of which the injunction, upon the violation of which the contempt was founded, grew.

A restraining order was issued in this civil suit, requiring the relator to refrain from cultivating certain cotton on his premises pending the disposition of the suit. He was adjudged in contempt of the district court rendering the judgment, and from the restraint under the contempt proceedings relief is sought. The relief will not be granted, for the reason that the Supreme Court is by statute given authority to entertain applications for writs of habeas corpus in cases in which the restraint grows out of a civil case. Revised Statutes, art. 1529. In deference to this statute, and the reasons that impelled the Legislature to enact it as stated, in various decisions of this court, it has refrained from granting writs of habeas corpus in cases of contempt growing out of the alleged disobedience of an order entered in a civil case. Ex parte Houston, 219 S. W. 826; Ex parte Alderette, 203 S. W. 764; Ex parte Gregory, 210 S. W. 205.

Following this precedent, the application for writ of habeas corpus is ordered dismissed.

Ex parte ALBRITTON. (No. 5166.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

Original application by J. C. Albritton for writ of habeas corpus. Application dismissed.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This is a companion case to Ex parte W. A. Albritton (No. 5165) 222 S. W. 561, this day decided. Without any further discussion, this application will be dismissed, on the reasoning and authorities stated in the opinion in the other case.

The application for habeas corpus is dismissed.

PARHAM v. STATE. (No. 5782.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 5, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 2, 1920.)

1. Criminal law \S 1054(1)—Court's failure to limit testimony not available on appeal when not excepted to.

Court's failure to limit testimony is not available on appeal, where no exception was taken to court's failure to so do, even though defendant was unlearned in the law, was not represented by an attorney, and did not know how to take advantage of the situation by excepting.

2. Criminal law \S 1168(2)—Failure to limit testimony held not reversible error.

In prosecution for automobile theft, where police officers who had arrested defendant for theft of tool joints testified, court's failure to limit such testimony with reference to the extraneous crime was not reversible error, where defendant pleaded guilty and where the facts showed beyond question that defendant stole the automobile.

On Motion for Rehearing.

3. Criminal law \S 649(3)—Refusal to postpone trial for absence of defendant's counsel held error.

Where defendant's attorney resided in a county other than that in which the case was called for trial, and was engaged in the trial of cases in such other county at the time that the case was called for trial, court's refusal to postpone trial because of the absence of defendant's attorney, where such postponement would not have operated as a continuance, and where such failure left defendant without any attorney, held reversible error.

4. Criminal law §641(1)—Accused entitled to benefit of counsel.

Accused's right, under the Constitution, to have the benefit of counsel, is a valuable right which the courts will strictly enforce.

5. Criminal law §1092(11)—Bills of exception approved subsequent to making of transcript will be considered where transcript was made out before expiration of time for the approval of bills.

Where the transcript was made out and certified by the clerk before the expiration of the period for filing bills of exception, bills of exception approved by the judge subsequent to the making out of the transcript but within the time provided for the filing and the approval of the bills will be considered.

6. Criminal law §1104(6)—Transcript not to be made out until expiration of time for filing bills of exception.

Where time for filing of bills of exception is extended, the transcript should not be made out until after the expiration of the extended period.

7. Criminal law §518(2)—Defendant's statements to officers while under arrest without being warned inadmissible.

Testimony of statements by defendant to police officers, amounting to a confession, made while he was under arrest without being warned and without being reduced to writing, held inadmissible.

8. Criminal law §528—Statements to officers by defendant's associates while under arrest held inadmissible.

In prosecution for theft, testimony as to statements, amounting to confessions, made to police officers by two of defendant's associates, separately made while in separate rooms in the jail, held not admissible.

9. Criminal law §673(5)—Testimony as to extraneous crime should be limited.

In prosecution for automobile theft, where there was testimony by police officers who had arrested defendant for theft of tool joints, after having driven to scene of crime in the stolen automobile, the testimony of such officers should be appropriately limited in the charge of the court.

Appeal from District Court, Wichita County; P. A. Martin, Special Judge.

Elmer Parham was convicted of theft, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Jno. T. Spann, of Dallas, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was charged with and convicted of theft of an automobile. When the case was called for trial appellant presented an application for a continuance, which being overruled he entered a plea of guilty and was awarded by the jury the minimum punishment of two years. The application is not signed by the defendant. There is, however, at the end of the application a statement of the clerk to the effect that it was subscribed and sworn to by the defendant on the — day of November, 1919, and the clerk placed his seal on it on the — day of December, 1919. The days are left blank. The application is based on the absence of counsel, who, he alleges, resided in Dallas, Tex. Our Constitution provides that an accused may be heard by himself or counsel or both, and this right should be accorded him in a proper manner and under appropriate circumstances. The statement as shown in connection with the application is that his counsel was engaged in cases set in court in Dallas county, that they came up about the same time that this case was tried, and that counsel was detained by reason of those cases in Dallas. Under the decisions of this court we are of opinion this is not a sufficient showing. There was no attempt made by appellant to reset his case in order to give his attorney an opportunity to be present. He only sought to continue it for the term. This question has been decided adversely to appellant in Mason v. State, 74 Tex. Cr. R. 256, 168 S. W. 115, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1004, and to the same effect is Davis v. State, 69 Tex. Cr. R. 86, 154 S. W. 228, and Usher v. State, 47 Tex. Cr. R. 95, 81 S. W. 309. The Mason Case is in point. Doubtless had the court been requested to reset this case it would have been granted; at least, there is no attempt on the part of appellant to have the case reset in order that his attorney might be present.

There are two papers in the record purporting to be bills of exception, but neither are signed nor approved by the judge. There is a fourth bill which was reserved to the action of the court with reference to the testimony of two state's witnesses, in that the court failed to limit and restrict the force and effect of their testimony. The substance of their testimony was that appellant and two others came driving to the depot and alighted at the platform and began taking "tool joints." When the boys began to take these tool joints the witness Somerville, who was guard or policeman at the station, arrested them. He was not aware at that time that the auto they were driving was the one with which he was later charged with stealing. The evidence shows that the auto they were driving had been stolen only a few minutes before and for the purpose of going to the depot to get these "tool joints." The object in securing the joints was to get money to pay board. The testimony of the other witness, who was also an officer, was with reference to statements the boys made to him in regard to these matters. These statements in a general way may be stated to be admissions and confessions with reference both to the taking of the car and the taking of the tool joints. The court did not limit this testimony to any purpose, and after the trial appellant filed an exception to the failure of the court to so instruct the jury.

[1, 2] As the matter is presented it cannot be considered. There was no exception taken to the charge at the time, though the bill recites that the charge was given appellant for inspection. The reason given why an exception was not then reserved was that appellant was unlearned in the law and did not know how to take advantage of the situation by excepting. This would hardly furnish a reason legally; but, in any event, under the circumstances of this case it would not present any serious question we think. Appellant pleaded guilty. The state introduced evidence in accordance with the statute which requires it to be done where pleas of guilty are entered. The facts show beyond any question or debate that appellant committed the theft of the auto, and that he drove to the depot a short distance away, after taking the auto, to get the tool joints and was arrested. The minimum punishment was assessed under a plea of guilty.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment will be affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[3, 4] On a former day of the term the judgment herein was affirmed. One question in the case was decided on the theory that the application for a postponement, as now claimed, was only an application for a continuance for the term. In the light of the motion for rehearing and a more careful consideration of the record, we are of opinion that we were mistaken with reference to the full import of the application. While it is denominated an application for continuance, and evidently so treated by the trial court, yet there is a request made of the court, if the continuance should be refused, that his absent counsel's presence could be secured the following week. So this application may be considered as one in the alternative for a continuance or postponement on account of the absence of counsel. The showing made by the application is sufficient so far as the absence of counsel was concerned. He resided in Dallas county, and was engaged in the trial of cases in that county at the time that this case was called for trial, and those cases were set at the same term in Dallas county that this case was called for trial in Wichita county. This was appellant's only counsel and upon whom he relied. This case was tried on the 4th of December, 1918. The court did not adjourn until the 28th of the following February. A postponement of the case for the presence of counsel would not have operated as a continuance. The accused was not defended by any attorney during the trial. After his application was overruled he entered a plea of guilty. The suggestion is that this would not have occurred had his counsel been present and aided in the defense. The Constitution provides that the accused shall have the benefit of counsel if he desires. This is a valuable right and one that has been rather strictly enforced by the courts. We are of opinion, therefore, that we were in error in affirming the judgment from this viewpoint; that appellant was entitled to a postponement that his counsel might be present and represent him.

[5-8] It was noticed in the former opinion that there were two bills of exception in the record which were not approved by the judge. It is made to appear by certificate of the clerk accompanying this motion for rehearing that both bills were approved by the judge subsequent to the making out of the transcript, and the record of the office of the district clerk so shows. As presented, we are of opinion the bills should be considered. It is shown by the record that the court adjourned on the 28th of February. Two orders of extension of time, amounting to 30 days, were granted by the trial judge in which to prepare bills of exception. This extension would have expired about the 28th of March. The transcript was made out and certified by the clerk of the trial court on the 11th of March, and the file mark here shows it to have been filed in this court on the 13th of March, 15 days prior to the expiration of the time allowed by the trial judge for the approving and filing of the bills. The clerk certifies that after he made out the transcript and forwarded it to this court the trial judge approved the two bills in question. Under the order of the trial judge the appellant had to the 28th of March in which to have approved and filed his bills of exception. The transcript should not have been made out until after the expiration of the 30 days. These bills of exception show important matters for the appellant, and we think show erroneous rulings of the trial court. These bills show that the parties were arrested, three in number, connected with the alleged theft, and that they made statements amounting to confessions to the officers, and among others was the confession made by appellant. He was unwarned, under arrest, and the confession was not in writing. It also shows the confessions of two of appellant's associates separately made when they were in separate rooms in the jail from each other. Their testimony was not admissible.

[9] There is another matter that might be mentioned which was discussed in the original opinion. It is this: The court did not limit the testimony with reference to an extraneous crime. Appellant was charged with the theft of an auto. During the same evening or night appellant and his associates were arrested for the theft of some "joints." This testimony was introduced and the court failed to limit it. There was an exception taken to the charge in the trial court before it was read to the jury. Upon another trial we are of opinion this testimony should be appropriately limited in the charge of the court. It had an important bearing upon the case. The contention is made that in taking the car the parties did not intend to appropriate it but only to use it for the purpose of conveying the joints when taken, and appellant undertook to segregate himself even from the taking of the car. These matters rather emphasize the first proposition, that is, that appellant ought to have had an opportunity for his counsel to be present and assist in the trial of the case.

For the reasons indicated the motion for rehearing is granted, the affirmance is set aside, and the judgment now reversed and the cause remanded.

NARANGO v. STATE. (No. 5829.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 19, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 16, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §1102—Statement of facts copied into transcript in a felony case insufficient to constitute duplicate.

Under Vernon's Ann. Code Cr. Proc. 1916, art. 844c, requiring the filing of a duplicate statement of facts in the trial court and sending original to the appellate court, the mere copying of a statement of facts in the transcript in a felony case is insufficient, and a statement so copied in the transcript will be stricken from the record.

2. Witnesses §255(3)—Permitting witness to refresh recollection from paper not offered in evidence not error.

In prosecution for theft of property of the value of more than $50, action of court in allowing prosecuting witness to look at, and refresh his recollection from, a list of property which he had made on a former occasion, where the list was not offered in evidence, nor its contents read, held not error.

3. Criminal law §452(1)—Prosecuting witness' testimony as to value of property under his control held not error, in prosecution for theft.

In prosecution for theft of property of the value of more than $50, involving issue as to value of property taken, admission of testimony by prosecuting witness as to the value of a certain razor enumerated in the indictment as a part of the alleged stolen property was not error, where such razor was under the care, control, and management of prosecuting witness, though he testified that the razor belonged to another party.

4. Criminal law §1100(9)—Admission of testimony held harmless, in view of other testimony given.

In prosecution for theft of property of the value of more than $50, involving an issue as to the value of the property taken, the admission of testimony as to the value of the property when it was new held harmless, where witness also testified as to its value at the time it was taken, and where under such testimony the aggregate value of all the property taken, at the time it was taken, was more than $50.

On Motion for Rehearing.

5. Larceny §32(5)—Ownership property laid in person having custody of property.

In prosecution for theft of property taken from certain ranch, the allegation of ownership was properly laid in the manager of the ranch, in whose care, control, and management the property had been left by real owner.

6. Larceny §40(2)—Proof of real owner's want of consent not essential, where property is in control of other person.

In prosecution for theft of property from ranch, where allegation of ownership was laid in person in whose care, control, and management the property had been left by the real owner, it was unnecessary, in order to sustain case, to show want of consent and knowledge of the real owner.

7. Criminal law §829(1)—Refusal of instruction covered not error.

Refusal of requested instruction, substantially covered by the charge given, held proper.

Appeal from District Court, Schleicher County; C. E. Dubois, Judge.

Jose Antonio Narango was convicted of theft of property of the value of more than $50, and he appeals. Affirmed.

M. E. Sedberry, of Eldorado, for appellant.
Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. Appellant was convicted of the theft of property of the value of more than $50, and his punishment fixed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1] We are met on the threshold of the consideration of this case by a motion, made by our Assistant Attorney General, to strike from the record what purports to be a statement of facts, which is copied in the transcript. Such practice in a felony case seems not to be in accordance with our statutes. See Vernon's Ann. Code Cr. Proc. 1916, art. 844c, which requires the filing of a duplicate statement of facts with the clerk of the trial court, and that the original be sent here for our inspection, and the duplicate be kept on file by said clerk. It therefore appears that we must sustain said motion. Hardgraves v. State, 61 Tex. Cr. R. 422, 135 S. W. 144; Shatter v. State, 61 Tex. Cr. R. 243, 130 S. W. 770.

[2] Appellant has a bill of exceptions to the action of the trial court in allowing the prosecuting witness to look at, and refresh his recollection from, a list of property which he had made on a former occasion. No error appears in such action. Gould v. State, 66 Tex. Cr. R. 122, 146 S. W. 172; Luttrell v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 651, 51 S. W. 930; White v. State, 18 Tex. App. 57. The list was not offered in evidence, nor its contents read.

[3] Another bill of exceptions was taken to the action of the lower court in allowing the prosecuting witness to testify to the value of a certain razor found in the possession of appellant, and enumerated in the indictment as a part of the alleged stolen property; the ground of objection being that this witness had already testified that said razor belonged to another party, who worked on the ranch. The bill does not negative the idea that such razor was a part of the stolen property, nor that it might have been in the care, control, and management of said witness, who thus became the special owner thereof. The same may be said of the bill complaining of similar testimony as to the value of certain underwear found in appellant's possession. Nor do we think there is any legitimate ground of objection to the question and answer of said witness in regard to his control over certain property, consisting of valves and brass boxes, which were claimed to be a part of said stolen property.

[4] Appellant also has an objection to the testimony of what would be the value of new valves of the kind described by the witness Oglesby, and alleged to have been stolen. The evidence could not have injured the accused, as the testimony of the prosecuting witness, Oglesby, was as to the value of such valves in their condition when taken, and the only effect of such objectionable testimony would be to affect the degree of the offense, as being a misdemeanor or a felony, and, under Oglesby's testimony as to values, the aggregate value of all the property taken was more than $50.

The record contains three special charges requested by appellant and refused, but in the absence of a statement of facts we are unable to perceive any error on the part of the trial court in refusing the same.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

Appellant files his motion for rehearing, accompanying the same with the original statement of facts, and asks that it be considered. The motion will be granted, to the extent of considering said statement of facts.

[5, 6] We have examined the special charges of appellant in the light of the facts adduced. Special charge No. 2 sought to have the jury told that certain of the alleged stolen property belonged to persons other than the alleged owner, and that the case could not be made out without proof of the want of consent and knowledge of the real owners. We think this charge properly refused, for under the facts, as we understand them, these various articles of property were in the care, control, and management of Mr. Oglesby, who was in charge of the ranch at the time, and in whose care said property had been left by the real owners. In such case, the allegation of ownership was properly laid in Mr. Oglesby, and the special charge did not correctly announce the law applicable.

[7] Appellant's special charge No. 3 was correctly refused, because of the fact that the same was substantially equivalent to his special charge No. 1, which was given by the court.

The matters complained of in appellant's bills of exceptions were noticed and passed upon in the original opinion, and we see nothing in the statement of facts to cause us to change our views upon any of them. We have examined the testimony of Mr. Oglesby and Mr. Hill, as contained in the statement of facts, and regret to find ourselves unable to agree with the contention made in appellant's motion that the testimony of Mr. Hill was of such prejudicial character as to require a reversal of the case. The testimony of Mr. Hill related only to the value of certain of the alleged stolen articles when new, and inasmuch as Mr. Oglesby testified as to their values at the time when taken, and the aggregate value fixed by him upon the property exceeds $50, we are unable to see how the testimony of Mr. Hill was so material as to call for a reversal.

The motion for rehearing will be otherwise overruled, and an affirmance ordered.

PIERCE v. STATE. (No. 5805.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 19, 1920. State's Rehearing Denied June 16, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §369(8)—Evidence as to defendant's threat to kill prosecutrix held admissible in rape prosecution.

In prosecution for rape, evidence that on day following perpetration of crime defendant had threatened, with gun in his hands, to kill prosecutrix if she told what had occurred, held admissible as against objection that it related to a separate crime.

2. Criminal law §369(8) — Evidence as to other act of intercourse held admissible in rape prosecution.

In prosecution for rape on daughter, where defense was that at time he was charged to have had intercourse with daughter he was merely examining her to ascertain if she had had intercourse with other men, evidence as to another prior act of intercourse on such daughter held admissible.

3. Criminal law §1092(6)—Bills of exception filed after term time not considered.

*Bills of exception filed after term time cannot be considered.

4. Criminal law §1092(6)—Failure to file bill of exceptions in time no effect upon bill filed within required time, though the bills are to the same effect.

Failure to file bill of exceptions in term time would not affect bill of exceptions filed within the required time, though the bills were practically to the same effect.

5. Criminal law §857(2)—Misconduct of jurors in mentioning previous prosecution of defendant held ground for reversal.

The conduct of one or more of the jurors in mentioning, at a time when the jury stood nine for conviction and three for acquittal, that defendant had been previously tried, and that such trial had resulted in a mistrial because the jury stood nine for conviction and three for acquittal, held ground for reversal.

Appeal from District Court, Falls County; Prentice Oltorf, Judge.

A. L. Pierce was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Jno. T. Kitching and Robt. F. Higgins, both of Marlin, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of rape, and his punishment assessed at 7 years in the penitentiary.

The indictment charges rape in three counts—one on a girl under 18 years of age; one on the same girl under 15 years of age; and the other by force, threats, and fraud. The facts show prosecutrix was the daughter of defendant and under 15 years of age. The state's case is that appellant had intercourse with his daughter in a room adjoining that occupied by his wife and son; that he had intercourse with her about the time the family were retiring, and in the same bed was another daughter just younger than prosecutrix, and also a little girl sister, the three occupying the same bed; that appellant went in there, got in bed with this girl, and forced her to have intercourse; that his wife and his son heard the noise; that the son, a boy nearly grown, stated:

"The first thing that attracted my attention was when I heard the racket and the bed popping, and I heard Etta [prosecutrix] hallow. Mamma asked Papa what he was doing in there, and he said, 'I'm not doing nothing,' and Mamma said, 'You ain't got no sense,' and Mamma said, 'You think I ain't got no sense,' and Papa said, 'God damn you, you won't have no sense in a minute if you fool with me.' There was no light on at that time; it was dark. I told Mamma to light the lamp and let's see what that dad-gum fool was doing in there, and he said, 'God damn you, if you light that lamp, I'll blow your head off.'"

This witness was about seven feet from the door of prosecutrix's room, and the remarks mentioned above were made during the alleged assault of defendant upon prosecutrix.

[1] Appellant met this with testimony to the effect that on one occasion shortly before this occurrence one of the neighbor girls was spending the night at his house, and his daughter, perhaps two daughters, and this neighbor girl had taken a bath and were naked in the room and making a considerable noise, and he heard the visiting girl friend ask his daughter if she had ever "spinned," and she replied that she had "spinned" three times; that he understood this to mean that she had had intercourse with boys on three different occasions; that he then determined to satisfy himself whether or not she had had such intercourse; that on the occasion the girl testified he had gone in the room to examine her to see whether or not she had had intercourse; that he was seeking to examine her private parts to ascertain that fact when the matters occurred about which his wife and son testified, and he also denied having intercourse with her at any time or place. During the night of this occurrence and about midnight the two girls who were in bed at the time, prosecutrix being one, left home and went to a neighbor's off two or three miles; that the next morning early and before daylight appellant and his son Dan, who testified in the case, went in search of them, and finally located and brought them back. The son Dan had a pistol with him. En route back the father called for the pistol and presented it and asked prosecutrix if she had told what occurred, and if she did he was going to kill her. Objection was urged to this testimony because it was a distinct offense, extraneous, and not permissible, and not germane to the case, and detrimental to appellant's rights. We are of opinion the court did not err in admitting this testimony. The matter occurred in connection with the flight of the girl on account of the alleged conduct of appellant towards his daughter. It was germane, and, if it occurred as the girl testified, it bore upon his relations with prosecutrix on the occasion that he mentioned. It was at least admissible, and does not come within the rule which would reject extraneous matters not connected with the offense on trial.

[2] There was also introduced in evidence another act of defendant with the same girl while picking cotton shortly prior to the act mentioned as having occurred in the house at night. Appellant put up the same defense against that act that he did against the act that occurred in the house, that is, that he was not trying to have intercourse with prosecutrix and did not; that he was trying to examine her to ascertain if she had had intercourse with men. We are of opinion these acts were introducible. There are several of these bills of exception and all to the same effect and purport.

[3, 4] There are two bills of exception reserved to misconduct of the jury. One of them was filed after term time and cannot be considered under the decisions. It embodied some of the facts alleged to have occurred in the jury room after the jury's retirement. The second bill is practically to the same effect and with reference to misconduct of the jury, which was filed in time. The failure to file the first bill of exceptions in term time would not affect the bill of exceptions filed within the time prescribed by statute. In substance, without going into a detailed statement of the affidavits, the testimony of the jurors is to the effect that after they retired one or more of the jurors mentioned the fact that appellant had been previously tried and that the jury stood eleven for conviction and one for acquittal. This resulted in a mistrial. Up to and subsequent to the time this matter was discussed in the jury room this jury stood nine for conviction and three for acquittal. After having the case under advisement for the night the next morning the ballot resulted in the same, nine to three. There is testimony indicating that they had been carried before the court, where they made a statement that the jury was hung without hope of agreement, but they were sent back. After balloting some time the next morning they agreed upon a verdict of seven years. It is also shown there was something said with reference to defendant's failure to prove his good reputation or character, and, had this been shown, it might have had a favorable effect on the case for him. This bill shows also that the jury was informed of the fact that there had been a previous trial, as developed from examination and cross-examination of witnesses as well as questions asked the jury when being impaneled, but there was no evidence as to the result of the former trial, or how the jury stood in their balloting upon the former trial. This occurred in the jury room after retirement for deliberation.

[5] We think these matters are of sufficient importance to require a reversal of this judgment. The jury stood nine for conviction and three for acquittal until after these matters occurred. Some of the jurymen said it did not affect them in their verdict; that they reached the verdict irrespective of this testimony and these statements. We are of opinion that this testimony and these statements and this conduct are of such a nature as to require us to reverse the judgment.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

LANKFORD v. STATE. (No. 5526.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §721½(2) — Conduct of state's attorney in referring to failure of defendant to call wife erroneous.

In a prosecution for incest, where a witness on cross-examination denied having made a statement to the wife of defendant, held that, where there was nothing else to show that she knew of the transaction, etc., comment by the prosecutor on the failure of the defendant to put his wife on the stand was improper.

2. Criminal law §721(6) — Argument of prosecutor erroneous as reference to failure of defendant to testify.

In criminal prosecution, where the only other witness to the crime was prosecutrix, statement by the district attorney that defendant, instead of putting his wife on the stand, was content to rely on his plea of not guilty, was improper as a reference to the failure of the defendant to take the stand himself.

Appeal from District Court, Hood County; J. B. Keith, Judge.

Jasper A. Lankford was convicted of incest, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Henry Zweifel, of Granbury, and Thompson, Barwise, Wharton & Hiner, of Ft. Worth, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. The indictment charged appellant with having committed incest with his daughter on the 19th day of July, 1918. Her testimony is to the effect that on that day they went from their residence in Hood county to the town of Cleburne to place her in a sanitarium to have one of her ovaries removed by surgical operation. They went in a one-horse buggy. Upon reaching a certain gate her father got out of the buggy to open the gate, and while at the gate he assisted her out of the buggy. They went behind it and stood up in the middle of the road and had intercourse in that position. To this she says she did not consent. Her testimony further indicates that she protested to her father. She says her father was six feet tall, while she was only five feet in height. When this occurred, they went to the town of Godley, in Johnson county. After reaching the town she communicated this matter to a Mrs. Shotwell and Dr. Yeater. Dr. Yeater examined her, the substance of his testimony is that her private parts showed to be enlarged as if they had been accustomed to being penetrated, and he found a dried substance upon her drawers which he took to be seminal fluid. He made no microscopical examination of it, and could not tell whether it was or was not a seminal discharge, and that it could only be determined by the use of the microscope. Dr. Dabney also testified with reference to this matter. These physicians agree in their testimony that the character of this substance could not be determined otherwise than by a microscopical examination, and that it could by this means be determined. They both testified that a discharge from the private parts of the girl would make the same impress and would have about the same appearance as seminal fluid. That there might be a slight difference in color and effect, but the difference could not be told without the investigation mentioned. This investigation was not made, and when the defendant purposed to have it made the state's prosecuting officers declined to permit it. A brother of prosecutrix went to the point that she indicated as the place of the intercourse to examine to see if foot tracks could be found in the road at that point. His testimony is to the effect that there was nothing to indicate such footprints, and he found no evidence of them at the place pointed out by the girl. The father took her from Godley to Cleburne and placed her in a sanitarium. The operation was not performed. There is evidence that she was given to masturbation and had been for a long time. This she admitted, and also evidence that long-continued masturbation produces weakness of the mind, weakness of the body, and sometimes insanity in some form or another, and especially produces hallucinations in which the masturbator would imagine things occurred, which in fact did not occur. There is a great deal of testimony describing the effect of masturbation, which we deem unnecessary to state.

[1] It is also reserved for revision that after the jury had been impaneled the wife of defendant was called by the state and sworn as a state's witness. She was not used as a witness by the state. During the examination of Dr. Dabney, the only witness placed upon the stand by the defendant, and upon cross-examination, he was asked if he had not told the wife of the defendant that her daughter was a good girl and had not had frequent penetrations. This the doctor denied. The wife was not offered as a witness, but the matter was left in that condition. The doctor had testified that the girl was confirmed in her masturbation habits, and gave various reasons and facts and circumstances for his conclusion, and this was substantiated to some extent by admissions of the girl herself. During the argument the district attorney adverted to the fact that the wife was there as a witness and could have testified, but the defendant did not see proper to place her upon the witness stand. As a general proposition, the state may take advantage in argument of the fact that the wife knew facts, and it was within the power of appellant to place her upon the stand, and he did not do so. There is another line of decisions, however, that the state cannot use the wife's testimony against her husband, nor use her as a witness. There is another rule of law clearly recognized that, where a fact is not authorized to be shown directly, it cannot be introduced by indirect means. The same rule that would exclude the direct testimony would also exclude the indirect testimony to prove the same fact.

In Moore v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 234, 75 S. W. 497, 67 L. R. A. 499, 108 Am. St. Rep. 952, 2 Ann. Cas. 873, the district attorney placed the wife upon the stand as a witness and proved by her that the defendant had married her, the substance of all of which was that he had so married her to prevent her testifying against him, as she had been prior to his marriage an important state witness. Objection was urged to all this, and she was tendered as a witness to the defendant. The judgment was reversed. For a discussion of that question see the opinion in that case. That case has been somewhat modified by subsequent opinions, but they all seem to follow the first line of opinions above mentioned; that is, that the state may take advantage of the failure of defendant to place his wife on the witness stand, and discuss that matter before the jury. If the subsequent cases are thought to modify the Moore Case, supra, to that extent they are correct, but that rule does not apply in a case where the facts and circumstances are as depicted by this record. The girl placed her mother in such position that she knew nothing of these transactions. She had not before informed her of the conduct of her father. Of course, after the last transactions became public the wife would know about it. It was not contended that the wife knew any of the facts and circumstances concerning either of the transactions, and it seems that the state desired to place defendant in the attitude of refusing to permit her to testify by placing her in the attitude where she could contradict or sustain Dr. Dabney. Of course, the state could not place her upon the stand to contradict Dr. Dabney, and defendant did not, and, whether she was his wife or not, the defendant was justified in reaching the conclusion that it was not necessary, because Dr. Dabney denied making such statement. If the state had any legitimate testimony by which it could prove Dr. Dabney had made such statement to appellant's wife, they might use such testimony.

but could not use the wife's evidence for that purpose. They did not offer her as a witness, but simply left the matter in that condition. Upon another trial these things should not occur.

[2] In this connection the district attorney, among other things, in his argument stated:

"But, instead of putting his good wife on the stand, he was content to sit still and rely in this case solely and alone on his plea of not guilty and put no witnesses on the witness stand except Dr. Dabney."

This is a quotation from the speech. Objection was urged to this speech because it was an allusion to the failure of defendant to testify. We are of opinion this contention is correct. There was no one present, under the girl's testimony, except herself and her father. There was no other witness who could testify as to those immediate facts. Dr. Dabney was the only witness placed upon the stand, and enough of his testimony has been mentioned to show why he became a witness. This court in Vickers v. State, 69 Tex. Cr. R. 628, 154 S. W. 578, said:

"They tell you the prosecuting witness has not been corroborated; they will tell you no one saw the act of intercourse, except the two. 'Tis true that no one was present at the act of intercourse but these two; 'tis true that Ollie Walston testifies that no one was present, when the defendant told her to take the turpentine, except herself and the defendant; but, gentlemen, she had testified to both of these transactions, and they have not dared to put a witness on the stand to contradict her testimony in any particular."

Judge Harper, writing the opinion, said:

"These remarks were excepted to, and, if they do not challenge the attention of the jury to the fact that defendant had not testified, we are unable to understand the English language. Prosecuting officers should not thus seek to indirectly call the attention of the jury to the fact that a defendant has not testified in the case. This is a right given in law, but he is not bound to avail himself of that privilege; and, if he is willing to rest his case on the weakness of the state's case, he has a right to do so."

On rehearing Judge Harper uses this language:

"The other contention, that we erred in holding that it was error for the prosecuting officers to refer to defendant's failure to deny that he had sexual intercourse with his stepdaughter, after careful and thoughtful study of the record and the law applicable thereto, we are more thoroughly convinced, if anything, that this was such error as it alone ought to result in a reversal of the case. In this case the state's counsel called attention to the fact that no one was present when the act of intercourse took place, if it did take place, other than the prosecuting witness and appellant; that the prosecuting witness swore positively that it did take place, and appellant did not deny it. Language could not be used that would more forcibly impress that fact on the jury's mind, and it apparently was done to aid in securing a conviction of defendant."

The following cases may be cited in support of this conclusion: Miller v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 517, 78 S. W. 511; Williams v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 75, 85 S. W. 1144; Flores v. State, 60 Tex. Cr. R. 25, 129 S. W. 1111; Wallace v. State, 46 Tex. Cr. R. 341, 81 S. W. 966; Dawson v. State, 24 S. W. 414; Barnard v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 111, 86 S. W. 760; Washington v. State, 77 S. W. 811; Wingo v. State, 75 S. W. 29; Shaw v. State, 57 Tex. Cr. R. 474, 123 S. W. 691.

For the errors discussed the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

WALKER v. STATE. (No. 5715.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 7, 1920. Appellant's Rehearing Denied June 16, 1920.)

1. Animals \Leftrightarrow 34—Criminal liability under tick eradication law defined.

Tick Eradication Law (Acts 35th Leg. [1917], c. 60 [Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, arts. 7314-7314q]) does not require allegation and proof that cattle of accused were infected with ticks, or that they have been inspected, in order to sustain a prosecution thereunder.

2. Animals \Leftrightarrow 34—Statute contemplates free facilities for dipping cattle.

Tick Eradication Law (Acts 35th Leg. [1917], c. 60, § 3 [Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, § 7314d]), as amended by Acts 36th Leg. (1919), c. 44, shows a legislative intention that facilities for the dipping of tick-infected cattle should be furnished at public expense, so that one required to pay a charge for the use of the facilities provided cannot be prosecuted for failure to dip cattle as ordered.

Appeal from Comanche County Court; Jno. P. Hoff, Judge.

John Walker was convicted of violating the Tick Eradication Law, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Y. W. Holmes, of Comanche, for appellant.
Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. Appellant was convicted for violating the Tick Eradication Law in the county court of Comanche county, and given a fine of $25.

It appears that Comanche county is in zone No. 1, as fixed by the terms of chapter 60, Acts of the Regular Session of the Thirty-Fifth Legislature (Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, arts. 7314-7314q) known as the "Tick Eradication Law," and that on March 5, 1919, a quarantine was fixed upon said county by proclamation of the Governor, under the provisions of sections 9 and 10 of said act (sections 7314g, 7314h). Thereafter, and in August, 1919, appellant was duly notified to appear and dip his cattle at a certain named vat, and upon his failure to comply this prosecution was instituted.

[1] We do not think it necessary under the 1917 act, to allege or prove that the cattle of accused were infected with ticks, or that they had been inspected, as was held under the 1913 statute, in the McGee Case, 194 S. W. 652, and other authorities cited by appellant. An inspection of one, or any number less than the whole, could not determine that a herd of cattle were free from ticks; nor would an inspection of a herd at a given date determine that the premises or range occupied by said cattle were free from ticks, nor that such herd might not, under ordinary conditions, be again infected by going upon an infected range, or by having infected cattle cross or come upon their range. As we understand it, the purpose of this law is to require the cattle of this state to be so treated as that fever-carrying ticks, etc., will not attach themselves to such cattle, whenever by accident or necessity the opportunity for contagion arises, and that to attain this end the Legislature has seen fit to make obligatory, within the terms of the statute, the dipping of all cattle in this state in the kind and character of solution fixed by authority of the agency established for the execution of the law, to wit, the live stock sanitary commission of Texas. The power to make this law is confided to the legislative branch of the government, and so long as its terms are not shown to be unreasonable, or their execution so arbitrary as to seem oppressive, we must uphold it. We find nothing in the act of 1917 which requires an inspection of the premises or cattle as a condition precedent to the dipping of cattle, when properly notified so to do.

[2] But one other question will be discussed. Section 3 of said chapter 60 (section 7314d) was amended by chapter 44, Acts of the Regular Session of the Thirty-Sixth Legislature, so as to read as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the county commissioners' courts to co-operate with and assist the live stock sanitary commission in protecting the live stock of their respective counties from all malignant, contagious, infectious or communicable diseases, whether such diseases exist within or outside the county, and otherwise protect the live stock interests of their counties. It shall be the duty of said commissioners' courts to co-operate with the live stock sanitary commission and the officers working under the authority or direction of said commission in the suppression and eradication of fever-carrying ticks, and all malignant, contagious, infectious or communicable diseases of live stock; provided when it becomes necessary to disinfect any premises, county, or subdivision of the county infected with fever-carrying ticks, anthrax, hog cholera, glanders, foot and mouth diseases, bovine tuberculosis or contagious abortion, under order of the live stock sanitary commission, the county judge of the county where said premises are located, shall have such disinfecting done at the expense of the county, and according to the rules and regulations of the live stock sanitary commission, and the said commissioners' courts are hereby authorized and empowered and directed to appropriate moneys out of the general fund of their counties for the purpose of constructing or leasing necessary public dipping vats within their counties, and for the purchase of dipping material, and for the constructing of any other facilities and for the purchasing of any other materials for the hire of labor necessary to destroy the diseases and the carriers herein mentioned. Provided that for permanent improvements funds may be expended out of the county permanent fund."

This seems clearly to indicate the intention of the Legislature to make the matter of tick eradication in the several counties one for which the expense should be provided out of the various county funds. The expressions "shall have such disinfecting done at the expense of the county," and "the said commissioners' courts are hereby authorized and empowered and directed to appropriate moneys out of the general fund of their counties for the purpose of constructing or leasing necessary public dipping vats within their counties, and for the purchase of dipping material, and for the constructing of any other facilities and for the purchasing of any other material for the hire of labor necessary to destroy the diseases and the carriers herein mentioned," would seem to us to place beyond dispute the fact that after the taking effect of such amendment of 1919 such disinfecting, dipping, etc., was to be at the expense of the counties. On his trial it was shown that a charge of 25 cents per head was fixed at the vat where appellant was notified to dip his cattle. One of his defenses was that he could not be required to pay this charge, and that he could not be compelled to dip his cattle until the county had prepared public facilities; and he asked a special charge to the effect that he could not be convicted unless it was shown from the evidence that public facilities, without charge, were provided. This special instruction the trial court refused. Said amendment of 1919 went into effect in June of that year, and was effective in August, when this prosecution was instituted. We are unable to conclude otherwise than that such defense was valid, and that said charge should have been given. That the Legislature intended to make this a county expense is apparent from their language. As to whether they had the power to direct such expenditure of county funds is a question not before us.

For the error mentioned, the judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

MAYES v. STATE. (No. 5794.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 21, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 23, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §265—Defendant, under bond at return of indictment, not entitled to two days' delay to plead, after demanding copy of indictment.

Under the statute, where defendant was at large under bond when indictment was returned, and had not been in jail since executing his first bond, and so was entitled to demand a copy of the indictment at any time, he could not delay demanding it till case was called, and then have two days to plead to it.

2. Criminal law §455—Nonexpert can testify to wounds.

Any one who had seen the wounds could testify to their being wounds, and could describe them, without the testimony being subject to the objection of being conclusions and opinions of the witness; it not taking an expert to describe a wound.

3. Assault and battery §84, 87—Evidence of trouble the day before assault admissible on malice and motive.

Evidence of trouble the day before, between the party assaulted and defendant, claimed to have committed the assault, is admissible to show malice and motive.

4. Witnesses §48(1)—Relative to competency, term of service in penitentiary not time between conviction and time of testifying.

Relative to competency of witness convicted of felony, his term of service in penitentiary is not to be considered time occurring between the conviction and the time of his testifying.

5. Criminal law §168(3)—Defendant's witness being allowed to testify, rulings on questions as to competency unavailing.

Rulings on questions relative to competency of defendant's witness because of conviction of felony are unavailing, in view of his having been allowed to testify.

6. Assault and battery §84—Defendant's discharge from employment, because of prior trouble with assaulted person, admissible on malice.

As bearing on malice, it may be shown that as a result of the trouble, the day before the assault, between the person assaulted and defendant, charged with the assault, defendant had been discharged from his employment.

7. Criminal law §1091(10)—Bill of exceptions unavailing, where it cannot be understood to which part of recited evidence objection is made.

A bill of exceptions, so indefinite that it cannot be fully understood what was its purpose and to which part of the testimony set out, part of which, at least, was admissible, objection was urged, will not avail.

On Motion for Rehearing.

8. Criminal law §1159(5)—Conviction not to be disturbed because of conflicting evidence between identity and alibi.

Where there is sufficient evidence to identify defendant as the party committing the assault, conviction cannot be disturbed because of conflicting testimony tending to show he was at another place at the time.

9. Assault and battery §92—Evidence of identity of assailant held sufficient.

Evidence held sufficient to identify defendant as the person committing an aggravated assault.

Appeal from District Court, Grayson County; F. E. Willcox, Judge.

Otis Mayes was convicted of aggravated assault, and appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. D. Buster and C. T. Freeman, both of Sherman, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This conviction was for aggravated assault.

[1] When the case was called for trial, before announcing ready, defendant filed a motion stating that he had not been served with a copy of the indictment, and asked that he be so served, and requested that he be granted two days after such service before being required to plead to the indictment. The indictment charged him with assault to murder. The bill further recites that the motion was presented to the court on the 9th of December, 1919, and that he was served with a copy of said indictment at five minutes after 11 o'clock the same morning. Appellant was arrested under warrant issued from the justice court on the 16th day of July, 1919, and was confined in jail until the 11th of August, 1919, at which date he was released upon bond. The indictment was filed on the 12th day of September, 1919. Upon being notified of that fact, he made his appearance bond shortly afterward, without further being actually imprisoned. Since making these bonds he has been at liberty, and was at the time that he presented his motion.

Appellant contends that he was entitled under this statement to have copy of the indictment served upon him and two days thereafter in which to prepare for his defense. In support of this he cites us to Martin v. State, 80 Tex. Cr. R. 108, 188 S. W. 1000. We are of opinion that this case does not support his contention. Martin was indicted on the 23d of May, 1916, was arrested the same day, and gave bond. A copy of the indictment was not served upon him. When the case was called for trial six days later, appellant filed a motion stating that he had not been served with a copy of the indictment, and requested that the officers be required to deliver him a certified copy, and that he then be granted two days in which to plead to the indictment. Had appellant been in jail at the time of the return of the indictment, his motion would have been well taken, or had he been at large, and not under bond, at the time of the return of the indictment, his motion would have been well taken; but in this case appellant was under bond at the time of the return of the indictment, and had been under bond for about a month. It seems from the bill of exceptions he voluntarily entered into bond, without being actually in custody under the indictment.

Under the statute there are two phases of this question of service of the indictment. One is where it was requisite when insisted upon by the accused before he can be placed upon trial, but in such instance he must either be in custody at the time of the return of the indictment, or if at large at the time of the return of the indictment and not under bond, then the service is required by the statute to be served upon him, and upon this he can insist unless he in some manner waives such service. Venn v. State, 218 S. W. 1060, recently decided. The other phase to the statute is that, where the party is under bond at the time of the return of the indictment, he may demand a copy, and it would be error to refuse it; but in such case it is not obligatory upon the clerk to issue or the sheriff to serve such copy, unless a request has been made for such copy. The statute seems to draw a distinction between where the party is under bond at the time of the return of the indictment and where such is not the case. This statute is in harmony with the Bill of Rights, which provides that the accused is entitled to have a copy of the pleadings bringing an accusation against him. In this particular case we find no error in the ruling of the court. Appellant was under bond at the time of the return of the indictment, and had not been in jail since executing his first bond. He had a right to demand a copy at any time, and here upon his demand he was at once served with a copy. This was in accordance with the law as we understand it. See Revill v. State, 218 S. W. 1044, decided at the present term of the court.

[2] A bill of exceptions was reserved with reference to some matters brought out from the assaulted party, Stepp, while testifying for the state. This was over the objection of the defendant. The bill of exceptions is quite lengthy, the substance of which is that Stepp was permitted to testify to the wounds inflicted upon his head and the character of the wounds. Two of the wounds, one behind the right ear and one on top of the head, were inflicted, according to Stepp's testimony, by the defendant with a blunt instrument. The second wound knocked him senseless. He described these wounds, and also that there was a third wound that was inflicted upon him without his knowledge; that is, while he was unconscious. The objection seems to be based upon the general proposition that these were but conclusions and opinions of the witness, and in support of this we are cited to Conde v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 10, 24 S. W. 415. We do not understand that case to be in point or support the proposition. The witness in the Conde Case testified that he saw the body of deceased, and that it was bloody and had a cloth of some character over the face, where the wounds were supposed to have been inflicted. Under those circumstances that witness could not state that the wounds were inflicted by a gunshot. It was but a conclusion, for he did not see the wounds. Had he seen the wounds, the proposition would have been different. It does not take an expert to describe a wound. The testimony elicited, as we understand this bill of exceptions, from Stepp, was that he was struck these blows, and they inflicted wounds upon his head. Any witness could have testified, who had seen the wounds, to the fact that they were wounds, and could have described them. There are other cases cited, besides the Conde Case, but they are to the same effect.

[3] Another bill of exceptions was reserved to testimony in regard to a previous trouble between the assaulted party, Stepp, and defendant, occurring something like 24 or more hours before this difficulty. This occurred at a station called Gunter. The occurrence and some of the details of what occurred between defendant and Stepp were given. This is not an extraneous matter, or an extraneous offense, as here applicable. This testimony was introduced to show the relation between the parties and the feeling of appellant toward Stepp. Evidence that shows motive or malice may not be regarded as extraneous in cases of this sort. This was the inducing cause, urged why appellant made the assault the following night upon Stepp. We are of opinion this testimony was admissible to show malice and motive.

[4, 5] Another bill of exceptions recites that, while the witness Barr was on cross-examination by the state, he was permitted to testify that he had been charged with and convicted of a felony in McLennan county, and that that felony was assault with intent to murder. Thereupon defendant took the witness, and upon redirect examination proved by him that this was in the year 1907, and that he was convicted of assault to murder and allotted 10 years in the penitentiary. He was then asked by defendant if he had been pardoned. Upon the state's objection, the answer was not permitted; the objection being that, if he had been pardoned, the pardon would be the best evidence. The appellant was then permitted to further examine the witness, and prove by him he did not remember how long he had been out of the penitentiary, but said, "About 4 years." The witness, however, was permitted to and did testify. Appellant's contention is that this was too remote; that it had been more than 7 years since witness' conviction. There is no evidence in regard to his course of conduct after he had been released from the penitentiary, presumably under the pardon. We are of opinion there was no error in the ruling of the court in regard to this matter. His term of service in the penitentiary should not be regarded in the time occurring between the conviction and the time of his testifying. It may be presumed that the state began this cross-examination of the witness to ascertain whether or not he had been pardoned, with a view of disqualifying him as a witness, had he been in the penitentiary. The court decided this matter against the state, and the witness testified. In order to disqualify or render incompetent the witness, it was necessary to produce the pardon. This not being done, he was permitted to testify, and here the matter ended.

[6] Another bill of exceptions recites that the state was permitted to prove by appellant that on account of the difficulty at Gunter with Stepp he was discharged from the railway service, and that this discharge occurred in connection with that trouble. While the act of the discharge by the railroad would not be, perhaps, admissible as acts of a third party, it was introducible in this case to show that on account of this discharge appellant had conceived malice towards Stepp, and that the difficulty with him was the occasion of such discharge. Whether it was the act of the railroad or not, defendant and Stepp were so mingled up with it, and the discharge so connected with the difficulty, that if appellant conceived malice towards Stepp it may have been a cause for his attack upon him. The jury could so regard it. This matter was so connected with it that it was admissible, not as an act of the railroad people, but as a basis why he felt ill will toward Stepp as being the cause of the discharge.

[7] There is another bill of exceptions, but it is so long and complicated that we are unable to understand exactly what part of the testimony set out in it was objected to and what was not. Much of the testimony was admissible, if not all of it. This court would not be called upon to take a lengthy bill of exceptions, and cull from it such matters as might not be introducible, when much of the testimony so narrated is admissible. The bill is so indefinite that we are unable to understand fully what was the purpose of the bill and to which part of the testimony objection was really urged; therefore it is not further discussed.

Finding no material error in the record, if error at all, we are of opinion the judgment should be affirmed; and it is accordingly so ordered.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[8, 9] On a former day of the term the judgment herein was affirmed. The motion for rehearing brings in review only the sufficiency of the evidence to support the conviction. The punishment was $500 and 120 days in jail. On account of the punishment, and the insistence of appellant that the evidence is not sufficient, we have given this case a careful revision from the viewpoint now presented by appellant.

The question presented with reference to want of sufficient evidence is the identity of the attacking party. The assault occurred at night, somewhere between 12:15 and 12:45. Appellant introduced evidence of an alibi. This was sufficient, had the jury believed it, to have authorized an acquittal. It is not the purpose of this opinion to review the testimony bearing upon alibi. The conviction depends upon the sufficiency of the testimony to identify appellant as the attacking party. If this is sufficient, this court would not feel justified in reversing. Where there are two fact theories, one which justified the verdict, and the other upon which the jury could have acquitted, it is the exclusive duty of the jury to decide. In view of that rule, and under the contention of appellant, some of the pertinent testimony will be collated.

There had been trouble between appellant and the assaulted party at a little station called Gunter on the train en route from Ft. Worth to Sherman. Both men were railroad employes. Appellant was not an employe on that particular train, but the assaulted party, Stepp, was. Quoting from Stepp's testimony, after narrating the trouble, he says:

"We came on to Sherman, and I do not know whether the defendant came on that train. I did not see him any more. We got to Sherman about 7:30 a. m. on the morning of the 16th of July, and I did not see the defendant during that day. It was along about 12:30 on the morning of the 17th when I next saw him, as near as I remember, and that was just before he struck me in the back of the head. That was at the roundhouse in Sherman, Grayson county, Tex. I was oiling the engine around, preparing the engine for the trip. I had oiled the right side, and came around on the left side of the engine—that is, the fireman side of the engine—to oil that side, and I was oiling the eccentric there, and I heard some little noise behind me. I didn't know what it was, but, anyway I looked back over my shoulder like, and kind of turned my shoulder a little bit, and he struck me over the right ear. He didn't get a very good lick from that, but enough to kind of stun me, to knock me out of balance. And the next lick I got was on top of the head with some kind of blunt instrument. I couldn't see what it was exactly; looked more like a brake club or coupling pin. That is the last thing I remember of that night. In oiling the engine, we have an oil can in the right hand, if the man is right-handed, and a big torch in the left hand for light. I am right-handed, and at that time I had the oil can in my right hand and the torch in my left hand. The torch is made of tin, and so big around at the bottom, and kind of funnel-shaped. It is about 12 inches around at the bottom, and about 4 inches at the top, with a spout for a wick that contains oil—coal oil—to make a light. The torch has a handle to hold to, and makes a light about the size of a man's head; makes a very good light, if you have got oil in it. I had a good light, a very good torch, at that time; a man could see how to read orders by that torch any time at night. At the time I turned around and saw the defendant on my left, I had the torch, and it gave me light enough to see the defendant, and there was also an arc light there, too, that also gives light. The defendant was dressed—the best I remember, he had on a black hat, and had on a kind of blue overalls, it looked like, if I am not mistaken, his working clothes. The first lick that he struck me was over the right ear; there is a scar there, and there is one on top of my head, too; you can feel it, besides that one in my forehead. The first blow back of my head was more of a glancing lick than a direct blow. I kind of ducked my head. The first blow knocked me down partly, and staggered me. It was a very little while after that first blow until I was staggering that I was struck another blow on top of the head, and there is a very long scar up there, about six inches. * * * I couldn't say that I was angry with the man after the trouble was over at Gunter, but I did not see the man any more until the morning of the 17th, about 12:30 o'clock, as near as I remember. I have no means at all of guessing the time of day as 12 o'clock; only we are called for 12:45, and 118 is due here at 12:15, and I was just talking to the engineer as he came in on the 118. I could not say whether 118 came in on time that night, or whether it was 5 or 10 minutes late. * * * I know that this is the man who struck me. I could not be mistaken about it."

This witness stated he had not told anybody until the day before he was testifying as to who it was that struck him. Up to that time he denied knowing who it was; that he first told Mr. Gafford that he knew appellant was the man who struck him. Further testifying he states:

"At the time I heard the noise and looked around, the best I remember the party was about three feet from me—three or four feet, I couldn't say the exact distance. I was facing north, and he was south of me; as nearly due south as I could state. I was oiling the engine, and was standing, you might say, erect. I was oiling the eccentric. I was not oiling any one thing when I heard this noise, but I was generally oiling the engine. I was actually emptying oil from my oil can on some part of the engine when I heard the noise. My lamp was in my left hand. I could not say how far the lamp was from the point of the engine that I was oiling; it was over two feet; it might have been closer; that is very hard to say, exactly the distance a hand would hold a lamp from the engine. As to how long it was after I glanced backward before the blow was struck, I will say that it was just immediately, I looked around, and the blow was struck. In other words, the act of glancing backward and the receipt of the blow on the right side of my head was about at the same instant, and as I saw the blow coming I ducked my head like that, and caught the blow right over the right arm. I seen him as I looked over my shoulder, and I ducked my head just about the same time, or just immediately afterwards. In other words, at the time I heard the disturbance, the blow was in motion, and was in the act of falling upon my head, but had not quite reached my head at that time, as I saw him. * * * At the time I saw the man who was making this blow, he had already begun the stroke, and I saw him just a moment before it hit. I saw the man who hit me, and the blow was in motion. That is the answer I gave you a while ago. I am not a bit in the world mistaken about that. The best I remember the man had on a black hat. He had on a black hat, a medium size hat; as to whether it was a derby, a stiff hat, or soft hat, I did not examine it, and I could not say whether it was stiff, soft, or what it was. It was not a straw hat."

On the identification of the defendant this is, in the main, the evidence. There was no question of the fact that Stepp was assaulted by some one, and that his skull was fractured, and he was rendered unconscious until perhaps in October—at least a considerable length of time. If this evidence is sufficient to identify appellant as the assaulting party, the judgment should be affirmed, so far as that question is concerned. The witness is positive as to the identity of the defendant. The jury believed Stepp's testimony as to the identity of the appellant as the assaulting party. With this evidence in the record, we would not feel justified in saying the jury was not authorized to disbelieve appellant's alibi. Appellant introduced evidence which, if believed by the jury, would have tended to show that he was at a different place. He claimed he was at the depot, something like three-quarters of a mile from the place of assault, at such time as he could not have been at the roundhouse and committed the assault. The time fixed is largely a matter of deduction, drawn from circumstances and incidents upon which the witnesses base their conclusion. This was all before the jury. We are of opinion that, as this case is presented, we would not be justified in reversing on the question submitted and discussed.

The motion for rehearing will therefore be overruled.

SHRUM v. STATE. (No. 5712.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 21, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 16, 1920.)

1. Homicide \S 340(3)—Failure to mention defendant's right to shoot, from viewpoint of manslaughter, if he suffered pain from being shot, not erroneous.

In a homicide case, where defendant's testimony tended to show that he shot in self-defense, and manslaughter was brought in issue by testimony indicating that defendant was the aggressor, defendant cannot complain, where the court correctly charged on his right of self-defense, that it did not specifically mention that he had the right to shoot, from the viewpoint of manslaughter, if he suffered pain, etc., on being shot, for such an instruction would have been an undue limitation on the right of self-defense.

2. Criminal law \S 823(6)—Where court gave instruction as to right to picket, etc., failure of main charge to treat the subject not error.

In a prosecution for homicide, where defendant, a striker, killed a guard, defendant cannot complain that the main charge failed to treat of his right to picket, etc., where his request dealing with the subject was given.

3. Homicide \S 300(7)—Evidence sufficient to present issue of provoking difficulty.

In a prosecution for homicide, evidence tending to show that defendant provoked difficulty held sufficient to authorize the court to limit the right of self-defense by charging on the provoking of the difficulty.

On Motion for Rehearing.

4. Criminal law \S 1124(4)—Where affidavit as to newly discovered evidence did not appear in the record, the matter will not be reviewed.

Where an affidavit containing alleged newly discovered evidence claimed to be attached to the motion for new trial did not appear in the record, denial of defendant's motion on the ground of newly discovered evidence will not be reviewed on appeal.

5. Criminal law \S 424(5)—Acts of defendant's companions after murder held admissible.

Where defendant accompanied by two other strikers went to a point where persons in the master's employment were at work, and as result of a difficulty killed a guard, testimony by a police officer that when he arrived at the scene he arrested one of defendant's companions, who had the big end of a billiard cue in his hand, was admissible as part of the res geste, despite defendant's contention that he and his companions went to scene of homicide for purpose of peacefully picketing, and that they were assaulted; the state being entitled to introduce contradicting evidence that defendant's companions attacked person working with bludgeons.

6. Criminal law \S 424(5) — Evidence that, when police arrived, defendant's companion was armed with club, admissible.

Where defendant, who with other strikers had gone on an alleged picketing expedition, etc., shot deceased, a guard, the fact defendant's companion had dropped the billiard cue, and picked it up just as police arrived, did not render inadmissible testimony that the companion had the cue in his hand; it being the state's version that defendant and companions went to the scene of the difficulty and began attacking persons at work.

7. Criminal law \S 423(3)—Testimony that defendant's companion began attacking persons at work held admissible.

Where defendant, a striker, killed a guard, testimony that defendant's companion, who accompanied him to the scene of the difficulty, on arriving there attacked persons at work with bludgeons, was admissible.

8. Criminal law \S 1091(8)—Bill of exceptions must show that there was not testimony justifying remarks of counsel.

Bills of exceptions, complaining that remarks by counsel were unsupported by the evidence, must show that there was no evidence which justified the remarks, and are insufficient, where the statements of counsel were not verified, otherwise than by statement of court that he instructed jury not to consider the remarks; the mere objection that the testimony did not justify the remarks not being sufficient.

9. Criminal law \S 413(2) — Where defendant fled from scene testimony that he offered to allow a friend to surrender him inadmissible.

Where, after the shooting, defendant left the scene of difficulty, going to his parents' home, some miles distant, and defendant explained his flight by testimony that his mother was ill, testimony that he told the friend who was carrying him away that he would allow the friend to surrender him and collect the reward was properly rejected as a self-serving declaration.

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Dallas County; C. A. Pippen, Judge.

Al Shrum was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Mike T. Lively, Puckitt, Mounts & Newberry, Oscar H. Calvert, and Baskett & De Lee, all of Dallas, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owale, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, F. J. This conviction was for manslaughter; the term of punishment being assessed at three years in the penitentiary.

The court charged upon murder, manslaughter, self-defense, and provoking a difficulty. The charge on self-defense was from the standpoint of apparent and real danger as presented to defendant's mind at the time of the occurrence. This included, not only the danger from an attack by deceased, but also another party who was with him. The jury was informed that, if defendant's life was in danger from either standpoint, he would be entitled to his protection under the law of self-defense. The charge to the jury was not limited to the act of deceased, but included those who were acting with him, if such facts were shown. The theory of the defense was that he was shot at and shot by two men, deceased being one and aided by another party, both firing shotguns; that they were in a truck owned by the electric company, for whom the deceased and others were working; that these parties had been employed by the company, and in such employment were working in the business of the company; and that their employment arose out of the fact and on account of a strike by those who had been theretofore employed by the company. There was a strike by other employes, and what defendant terms a sympathetic strike by others engaged in same character of work, but not embraced among the strikers, and that those who were favoring the strike, and aiding and engaged in it, did what they called "peaceful picketing"; that is, they would go to the employes of the company, who had taken the places of the strikers as employes, and talk with them and persuade them if they could—at least, sought to persuade them—to quit working for the company and join in the strike. There had been some trouble arising between the employes of the company who were substituted for strikers and the strikers. The company also employed parties who are denominated guards, and they were armed.

On the morning of this trouble appellant and two others went to the scene of the difficulty for the purpose of engaging in this peaceful picketing. Defendant carried a shotgun, and it seems from the record the other two carried bludgeons. Upon arriving at the scene of the trouble, and where the employes were at work, two of the parties left the car, in which they accompanied appellant, and engaged in trouble or difficulty with one or more of the employes, striking with a club. This seems to have precipitated the difficulty, and the shooting began; several shots being fired. Appellant was standing at his car at the time of the difficulty, and his contention is, supported by his evidence, that while standing there he was shot at by deceased and another man, who was in a truck owned by the company, that they struck him in two or three places, and that he returned the fire, killing the deceased, and that there were a number of shots fired. The theory of the state was that appellant, as soon as he reached the point where his car was stopped, just across the street from the truck and the employes of the company, jumped from his auto and shot deceased, and the shooting became general, and that the two other men who went down the street engaged in a difficulty with another employe of the company; that these three men went from a point in the city to where these parties were at work, and immediately upon arriving there this series of difficulties occurred—the state's theory being that they went for that purpose, and that they were all participants or conspirators in what was done. Appellant testified he carried his gun to protect himself in case of trouble, as there had been trouble between the guards employed by the company and some of the "peaceful picketing" strikers, and that he carried this gun to defend in case an attack was made upon him by those people.

[1] An exception was reserved to the court's charge on manslaughter, because it did not specifically mention that appellant had the right to shoot, from the viewpoint of manslaughter, if the shots of the others produced pain or bloodshed. We are of opinion this contention is without merit. If, as appellant contended, he was fired at by the other two parties from the truck with double-barrel shotguns at close range, and he fired in return to protect his life, the question would be purely self-defense, and to have carved out of this testimony as a fact that he was struck several times, and make that the cause of manslaughter, would have resulted, upon exception, in a reversal of the case, if the court had limited his right of self-defense by such charge on manslaughter. There was no question of the fact that the shooting occurred. The issue between them was, Who began this shooting? The state's evidence clearly shows appellant began shooting at once upon reaching the scene, and the employes or guards shot in self-defense. His theory was that, when the difficulty occurred down the street where his two comrades struck the employe with a billet, this produced the occasion of the shooting, and that he was then acting in self-defense; that he was not engaged in nor acting in concert nor agreement with those who struck the men down the street. His defensive theory seems to exclude the idea of assault on him for any other purpose except that of killing him by shooting him with a couple of shotguns. This was a direct attempt from his viewpoint to take his life, the parties being in such relation to his person that it could be done, and but for the protection of the auto he would have been killed. This would exclude aggression on the part of appellant, and place it entirely upon deceased and his companions. If the state was right, it would place the aggression on the part of appellant in connection with their purpose in going out there, and this difficulty between his two companions and the men engaged in the trouble when they were struck with the clubs. The court, however, charged on manslaughter.

ter, favorably to defendant, and the jury found in his favor, acquitting him of murder. The charge on self-defense, in this connection, was based upon the proposition and theory that appellant was shot by deceased and his companions at close range, and with shotguns, and that they continued to shoot, and did fire several shots. It occurs to us, if the charge specified pain and bloodshed under such circumstances, it would have been an unsafe limitation upon appellant's right under his theory, and would practically have deprived him of his self-defense theories.

Nor do we think there was any merit in appellant's contention that the court limited self-defense as only against the deceased. The court expressly instructed the jury that he had a right to shoot in self-defense, not only against deceased, but any other person who was engaged in shooting at him. Exception by appellant to the charge is not sustained by the expressions in the charge. The court instructed the jury that appellant had the right of self-defense if assaulted by deceased or any other person, etc.

[2, 3] Another exception was reserved to the charge because it did not inform the jury appellant had the legal right to go to the scene of the killing for the purpose of picketing or talking to the employes of the company, in order to induce them to quit work and join in the strike. The court in the main charge did not so instruct the jury, but gave appellant's requested instruction presenting not only that question, but further that he had the right to arm himself, etc., and to go to the place where the trouble occurred, and to defend himself against any attack that might be made upon him, and that such action would not abridge his right of self-defense. His theory of the case was, and he so testified, that he went there to peacefully talk to these people and to induce them to quit work, and in so doing armed himself to protect his person from any assault that might be made against him. The charge as given is in accordance with the rule laid down in Shannon v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 2, 28 S. W. 687, 60 Am. St. Rep. 17. This case has been followed by numerous cases. He also gave another special charge, requested by appellant, that although he went with Rob Roy and Bohanan to the place of the trouble, and that though they engaged in a combat with a employe of the company, he (appellant) would not be responsible unless such conduct was a part of the agreement to do what was done, and that if they engaged in an independent enterprise of this sort without his concurrence or knowledge, that he would not be responsible for it, and the jury should find him not guilty from that viewpoint, if they found the facts as indicated in the charge. He also instructed the jury that, if appellant shot originally in self-defense, he had a right to continue to shoot until all danger was passed. Nor do we think there was error in the court's charge upon the issue of provoking a difficulty. We think this question was in the case, as shown by the testimony, even that introduced by the appellant. The only reason why this question was not in the case would arise from the fact that appellant was the aggressor from the beginning and pushed the difficulty to its final conclusion. This he denied, claiming that, while he went there, he did not go for the purpose of bringing on the difficulty, but to defend himself in case it was brought upon him without legal excuse. The court's charge on provoking a difficulty, we think, was called for by the facts, and it was a correct charge; that is, it charged both the theory of provoking a difficulty for the purpose of killing, or for the purpose of not killing. Upon this theory of the case manslaughter became an issue, and not only was it an issue, but provoking the difficulty was in the case by reason of the facts pertaining to self-defense. The facts authorized the court to limit and abridge the right of self-defense by a charge on provoking the difficulty, if the jury should take that view of the testimony. The evidence suggested the issue. We are of opinion that this case was fairly tried, and without reversible error.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

On a former day of the term the judgment herein was affirmed. It is now urged that the court committed error in various and sundry ways in the affirmance. It is not the purpose of this opinion to review the questions decided in the original opinion with reference to charges.

[4] Appellant complains that the court was in error in not reversing the judgment on the ground of newly discovered evidence as shown by the affidavit of Parkinson attached to the motion for a new trial. We have examined this motion for new trial, and fail to find such affidavit signed by Parkinson. This matter was examined before the original opinion was written. As we understand the original presentation of the case to this court claimed newly discovered testimony was supported by the affidavit of Harrington. We failed to find an affidavit of Harrington in the record, and the question was not discussed.

[5] There is a bill of exceptions to the introduction of testimony of the witness Askins, a police officer, who testified that he went to the scene of the killing; that it took him about three minutes after he received the call to ride to the scene of the difficulty; that when he arrived he arrested a man by the name of Rob Roy, who had on a soldier's uniform, and also had the big end of a billiard cue in his hand. The court says he admitted this as a circumstance to identify Rob Roy as the person who struck Allen Le Croy with a billiard cue. The evidence shows that appellant, Roy, and Bohanan went in a car driven by appellant to the scene of the homicide, as appellant says, for the purpose of "peacefully picketing." There seems to have been a strike on hand, and their purpose was to induce these people to join the strike. The assaulted parties were in the employ of the telephone company. Immediately upon reaching the scene, the state's theory of the case is that Roy and Bohanan alighted from the car, went down a short distance to where Le Croy and Ballard were at work for the telephone company, and that Le Croy was struck by Roy with the butt end of a billiard cue or a club, and that Ballard was struck at by Bohanan, and at the time this occurred appellant fired upon and killed Fisher. A few minutes afterwards Officer Askins arrived and arrested Rob Roy. He had the big end of a billiard cue in his hand. This testimony was admissible, even as a part of the res gestæ. Appellant seems to predicate his idea of the inadmissibility of this testimony upon the theory that he and his friends only went out there on a peacefully picketing mission, and not for the purpose of engaging in serious trouble, unless they were attacked by the employes of the telephone company. That was their view of the case, but it afforded no ground of objection to the state's testimony which showed the contrary. These were matters for the consideration of the jury, and not the subject of objections to the admission of testimony.

[6] There is also a suggestion that after Roy struck Le Croy and knocked him down, that he dropped the billiard cue, and just about the time that Askins undertook to arrest him he picked it up. We do not think this affords any objection to the introduction of the testimony. It would make no difference so far as the attack upon Le Croy was concerned whether he afterwards threw the billiard cue down.

[7] It is also urged as error that the state was permitted to show that the two parties carried by appellant in his car to the scene of the tragedy went to where Le Croy and Ballard were at work near by and assaulted them with clubs; one striking Le Croy and the other striking at Ballard. The judge would not certify to the correctness of the alleged statement set out in the bill of exceptions as shown by his qualification. He says the evidence was ample to show that the matters occurred as indicated. We are of opinion there could be no valid objection to the introduction of this testimony. This was but part of the testimony relied on to show the converse of appellant's contention of peaceful picketing. It was admissible for the state to show that these parties who went to the scene of the trouble in the car with appellant left the car immediately upon it stopping at the point it did stop, and in going to and making an assault upon these two employes of the telephone company, as evidence from which the jury might conclude the parties were acting together.

[8] It is also insisted that the court erred in not reversing the judgment because of remarks indulged by counsel for the prosecution. The court qualifies this bill by stating that he instructed the jury not to consider the same. The statements imputed to counsel in the bill of exceptions are not verified, otherwise than by the statement of the judge that he instructed the jury not to consider the remarks. The bill does not verify the statements. It is true that they urged as ground of objection that the testimony did not justify the remarks, but these are only stated as grounds of objection, and not as matters of fact. Grounds of objection will not be treated as statement of facts. The bill must show, if it is desired to have the matter reviewed, that there was no testimony which justified the remarks imputed to counsel.

[9] There is another matter urged by appellant. After the fatal difficulty appellant immediately left the scene, and during the day went to Cedar Hill 18 miles from the city of Dallas, he says, to visit his parents. After making this visit and en route on his return to the city of Dallas he was in a car with a Mr. Caffey. Caffey called his attention, he says, to the fact there was an offer of $500 for his arrest. Appellant then offered to prove that he told Caffey that, if he (Caffey) would take him to the sheriff's office that he would surrender in order that Caffey might obtain the $500 reward. Caffey did not see proper to do so. Appellant desired to introduce this; the purpose for which it was sought, as we understand the bill, was to explain his going to the country to see his parents. This would be a self-serving declaration made to Caffey, which in no way is explanatory of his going to Cedar Hill, but an offer to benefit Caffey, if Caffey would take him to the sheriff's office. It did not explain, or attempt to explain, why he left the scene of the tragedy and went to the country. He did explain his visit to the country, which was admitted on the theory that he went to see his parents; that his mother had been sick, and he went to see her.

We have mentioned these matters, because counsel urge in their rehearing they were of moment. We did not think so upon the original hearing, and did not discuss them, and upon a review of the matters we are still of opinion there is no merit in any of the contentions.

The motion for rehearing will be overruled.

HASLEY v. STATE. (No. 5836.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

1. Indictment and information §71—Indictment for burglary must allege necessary facts with certainty.

Indictment for burglary must allege whatever is necessary to be proved with such certainty as will put the accused on notice and enable him to plead the judgment rendered in bar of subsequent prosecution for the same offense.

2. Burglary §22—Indictment alleging building was under the "control" of specified person held sufficient; "management."

In prosecution for burglary of a mule barn, averment that the building was under the control of specified person held sufficient as against objection that it should have been alleged to be owned, occupied, and controlled or put under the care, control, and management of such person; "control" and "management" being synonymous, and control meaning to manage, govern, to have authority over, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Control; Management.]

3. Criminal law §511(2)—Evidence showing defendant's connection with crime is sufficient corroboration of accomplice.

If there is other evidence independent of that of the accomplice which tends to connect the accused with the commission of the crime, the corroboration of the accomplice is sufficient.

4. Criminal law §511(2)—Evidence in corroboration of accomplice testimony held to sustain conviction.

In prosecution for burglary, evidence independent of that of accomplice, tending to connect defendant with the commission of the crime, held sufficient to sustain conviction.

5. Burglary §46(5)—Refusal of requested instruction as to the management and control of the barn burglarized held proper.

In prosecution for burglary of mule barn, alleged to have been under the control of manager of the plantation, refusal to instruct to acquit defendant if the barn was under the care, control, and management of specified person held proper under evidence that such person was a mere employé under the manager.

6. Criminal law §814(5)—Larceny §8—Instructions unnecessary unless evidence raises issue; control not necessarily exclusive in one person.

Care, control, and management are not necessarily exclusive in one person, but may be joined in several, within the comprehension of the law of theft; and, unless the evidence raises the issue of exclusive care, control, and management in some person other than the one named as the owner in the indictment, it is not necessary to present such issue to the jury.

7. Criminal law §829(1)—Requested charge covered by main charge properly refused.

Refusal of special charge, which was almost verbatim the language of the main charge given by the court, was proper.

8. Burglary §33, 34—Evidence as to who employed and discharged men upon plantation admissible on question of ownership and control of property and building.

In prosecution for burglary of mule barn, involving issue of whether person named in indictment had control, evidence of such person as to who employed and discharged the men who worked on the place held admissible on question of ownership and control of the property taken and the building burglarized.

9. Criminal law §1153(3)—Order of testimony discretionary with trial court.

The order of introduction of testimony is almost wholly discretionary with the trial court, and appellate court will not review its action, unless it is made to appear that injury had probably resulted.

10. Witnesses §236(2) — Questions purely ancillary not subject to objection that they are immaterial.

Questions that are purely ancillary, and which only form a part of some predicate and lead up to the matters at issue, are not subject to the objection that they are immaterial, unless they contain something hurtful within themselves.

11. Criminal law §419, 420(11)—Admission of hearsay held reversible error.

In prosecution for burglary, defended on ground of alibi, where certain witness had testified for defendant on such issue, the admission of testimony as to conversation with such witness' mother, in the absence of such witness and the defendant, tending to impeach the testimony of such witness, was reversible error; testimony of such conversation being hearsay.

12. Witnesses §406—Cannot be impeached by proof of conversation between other persons in absence of witness and party for whom he testified.

A witness cannot be impeached by proof of a conversation between two other persons at which neither he nor defendant for whom he testified were present, even though one of them made statements in such conversation which would tend to show that the testimony given by such witness was not true.

13. Witnesses §389—Evidence of statement by a witness inadmissible for impeachment, where making of statement is admitted.

If a witness unequivocally admits making statements, proof as to the making of such statements is inadmissible for impeachment purposes; but if the matter is not clear, or is partially admitted or denied, such impeaching testimony is admissible.

Appeal from District Court, Matagorda County; M. S. Munson, Judge.

Ben Hasley, Jr., was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Jno. E. Linn and Styles, Krause & Erickson, all of Bay City, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. Appellant was convicted of burglary in the district court of Matagorda county, and his punishment fixed at two years' confinement in the state penitentiary.

[1, 2] A motion to quash the indictment is based on the fact that there was no other description of the house in question, save and except that it was then and there under the control of F. J. Spence. If it is necessary in a burglary indictment that it be alleged that the house in question is owned, occupied, and controlled, or is under the care, control, and management of any person, then the motion should have been sustained. The direct question does not seem to have been up in this state, within our knowledge. There appears nothing in our burglary statutes, other than those relating to the burglary of a private residence, which in terms requires any averment of occupancy, ownership, or other description of the house alleged to have been burglarized. It is necessarily true, however, that an indictment for this offense must conform to the general requirement that whatever is necessary to be proved must be alleged, and also that there must be such certainty in the allegation as will put the accused on notice, and enable him to plead the judgment rendered in bar of subsequent prosecutions for the same offense. If the averment that the house in question was then and there under the control of F. J. Spence individualizes the house, and would enable the accused to plead in bar the judgment rendered, this would seem to meet the demands of the law. Examining our authorities, we find that we have upheld indictments where the description of the house was that it was "occupied and controlled by." Pyland v. State, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 382, 26 S. W. 621. Control means to manage, to govern, to have authority over, etc. Anderson v. Stockdale, 62 Tex. 64. Control and management are synonymous. Youngsworth v. Jewell, 15 Nev. 45. In the Lamater Case, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 249, 42 S. W. 304, the trial court charged the jury that a person who is in direct control of the house, and has the exclusive management and control of the property therein, is in law the occupant of said house, and the owner of such property. In an opinion handed down by the present presiding judge of this court this charge of the lower court was upheld. In the instant case, the house in question was a mule barn, the same being a building about 150 feet long by 20 feet wide, and having a harness room at one end, and a feed room at the other. This building was located upon the farm of a Mr. Stoddard, who seems to have had several other farms and much other business; each of said farms being intrusted to the management of a local manager, who was charged with the duty of looking after all of the affairs of the same, including the employment and discharge of men who had various duties to perform under the direction of the local manager of the particular farm. Mr. F. J. Spence was the manager of the farm on which was located the mule barn in question, and the burglarized building was occupied on the night in question actually by the harness and mules; but the same was under the control of Mr. Spence. We think a plea in bar of any subsequent prosecution would needs be upheld under these facts, and that the allegation of control of the house was all that was necessary, and that the motion to quash was properly overruled. We think the house alleged to have been burglarized was sufficiently described to identify it. What we have said will also dispose of the contention that the trial court should not have charged the jury that the offense was made out, if it showed burglary of a house then and there under the control of F. J. Spence.

Appellant urges the insufficiency of the evidence to corroborate the accomplice, and insists that the trial court should have granted his request for an instructed verdict of not guilty. As stated, the premises alleged to have been burglarized was a mule barn, and it was shown in testimony that most of the harness was kept in the harness room at one end of said barn, but because of lack of room some of said harness was hung on pegs out in the barn. It was stated that the mule barn was open, but that every night the harness room, which had only one door, was closed, and the door fastened by a peg which fitted into a staple. It was testified that said door was so closed and fastened on the night in question. Some harness was taken from both the open shed and out of the harness room. On the morning after the alleged burglary, an examination disclosed that 17 collars, 12 bridles, 10 lines, and 7 sets of harness were missing. A search for some evidence as to how the property was taken disclosed the fact that near a corner of the barn lot, a hack or light wagon had been hitched the night before, the indications being that the team had stood at said place for some time, the ground being much trampled. A peculiarly large track, showing no heel to the shoe, and part of the sole gone, was observed, and also another and different track was testified to at the place where the hack had been hitched. Witnesses took the trail of this hack, and followed it for several miles; there having been a very recent rain, which enabled them to easily follow the tracks. The witnesses, following the trail, finally came to a place where the hack stopped, which was near a pasture belonging to appellant; and, at a point a short distance away from the place where the hack stopped, most of the alleged stolen harness was found. The hack was then traced from the point where it stopped to appellant's house, and from there to the home of one Shannon.

Albert Dadrick was placed on the stand by the state, and in his testimony stated that he went with the appellant, at appellant's solicitation, on the night in question, and assisted him in the removal of the harness, and accompanied him from the place where the harness was stolen, along various roads, crossing the Tres Palacios river, and on up Wilson Creek bottom, where, according to Dadrick, the parties concealed the harness in a thicket, at which place he said they separated, he (Dadrick) going on to the home of some kinsman named Smith, and appellant taking the hack and team on with him. This witness said the hack and the team, which was composed of two gray mules, belonged to Shannon, and was borrowed by appellant from Shannon on the Sunday afternoon preceding the night of the burglary. This witness further testified that as he and appellant drove the hack along on the night of the burglary, at the Tres Palacios bridge, they met some men in a buggy, and that they, he, and appellant had to back their hack off the bridge. He also testified that a little later his party passed Mr. Legg and Mr. Spoor. The state placed upon the stand the witnesses Legg and Spoor, both of whom testified that on the night of the burglary, between 11 and 12 o'clock, they were passed on the road by two negro men in a hack, the team being composed of gray or grayish animals; and one of the witnesses described the animals as mules. The state also placed on the witness stand Jim and Tom Allison, who testified that they were in a buggy, and met two negroes on the bridge over the Tres Palacios; that the negroes were driving a hack, and that the witness helped back said hack off the bridge. One of these men remembered that the negroes were driving a pair of gray animals, and the other remembered that the occasion was Sunday night, January 26, 1917, which was the night of the burglary. The state also introduced a witness named Moore, who testified that on Sunday, the 26th of January, at the request of appellant, he went to the house of one Shannon, and hooked up a team of gray mules to a surrey, which he brought back to appellant's house, and that the appellant and the accomplice Dadrick got into the surrey and drove off, and that he saw said outfit in the possession of a negro named Slim Davis, who worked for appellant, early the next morning, and that the team looked like it was about played out.

[3, 4] The only rule known to us by which to test the sufficiency of evidence to corroborate an accomplice is the well-known one that if there be other evidence, independent of that of the accomplice, which tends to connect the accused with the commission of the offense, the corroboration will be sufficient. The evidence here detailed seems to us to sufficiently corroborate the accomplice Dadrick. It not only shows that the hack used in the transportation of the alleged stolen property was that of Shannon, but that it was borrowed by appellant the afternoon preceding the night of the burglary; that two negro men participated in the burglary, and thereafter accompanied said hack along the road down to appellant's pasture, where the property was hidden, and that the hack was driven from said point to appellant's house, and from there back to Shannon's. Both the appellant and Dadrick were negroes. In our opinion, this evidence tends to connect the appellant with the commission of the offense.

[5] Appellant asked a charge to the effect that if the care, management, and control of the barn was in Gibbs the jury must acquit. The evidence showed that Mr. Spence, who was the local manager of said plantation, had employed Mr. Gibbs to work around the barn, and that Mr. Gibbs' duties were to see to the feeding of the stock, that the harness was kept in proper places, the doors shut, etc. The other hired men put away the harness of their individual teams, and got the same out in the morning, and Gibbs had no right of disposition thereof, or power to give or refuse consent to the removal of the harness. We think it clear that Mr. Gibbs was but the hired servant, charged with the custody, under the supervision of Spence, and that there was no evidence supporting any other theory, so as to make it needful to give the special charge asked. Moore v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 361, 128 S. W. 1115; Lockett v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 531, 129 S. W. 627; Suggs v. State, 65 Tex. Cr. R. 67, 143 S. W. 183; Hogg v. State, 66 Tex. Cr. R. 252, 146 S. W. 195.

[6] Care, control, and management are not necessarily exclusive in one person, but may be joint in several, within the comprehension of our law of theft; and, unless the evidence raises the issue of exclusive care, control, and management in some person other than the one named as the owner in the indictment, it is not necessary to present such issue to the jury.

[7] Appellant asked a special charge on the corroboration necessary in the case of an accomplice, which appears to be almost verbatim the language of the main charge on that point, and which was properly refused because covered by the charge as given.

[8] The objection to the question of the state to the witness Spence as to who employed and discharged the men who worked on the place, and his answer that he did, is without merit. No injury could possibly result to appellant if the matter was really irrelevant, but we think this evidence admissible, as bearing on the question of ownership and control of the property taken and the house burglarized.

[8] Objection was made to certain testimony of the witness Glover as to tracks—that same was offered after the appellant had closed his case, and was not in rebuttal. Under our practice, the order of introduction of testimony is left almost wholly to the discretion of the trial court, and we would not review his action unless it was made to appear that injury had probably resulted, which was not true in the instant case.

[10] Deputy Sheriff Jordan was asked by the state if he had an attachment for the witness Harry Sykes, to which question he answered affirmatively. He was then asked if he made any effort to serve same, which he also answered in the affirmative. This was all objected to upon the ground of immateriality, and that it was prejudicial to appellant. It is evident that the questions were but a part of, and leading up to the conversation had by said Jordan with the witness Sykes, when he was served with said attachment, upon the language of which conversation the state was seeking to impeach Sykes. We are unable to see anything in the said questions and answers which could cause any possible injury. Questions that are purely ancillary, and which only form a part of some predicate, and but lead up to the matters at issue, are not subject to the objection that they are immaterial, unless they contain something hurtful within themselves.

[11, 12] Appellant has a bill of exceptions to the testimony of the state witness Lawson Jordan, as to statements made to him by Harry Sykes' mother. It appears from the recitals of the bill that Jordan went to the home of Mrs. Sykes, inquiring for her son Harry. The witness was directed by state's counsel to tell what Mrs. Sykes said to him on that occasion, to which objection was made that such testimony would be hearsay, and also without any predicate, and inadmissible. The trial court overruled the objection, and the witness answered that Harry Sykes' mother told him on Tuesday afternoon, of January 13, 1920, that Harry was not there; that he had been gone about three weeks, and she did not know where he was. This testimony was hearsay and inadmissible. Harry Sykes had testified rather strongly for the appellant, his testimony, if true, showing him to have been in the county of the prosecution at the time of the alleged burglary. Mrs. Sykes, the mother of Harry, and the party with whom the alleged conversation was had, was not a witness in the case. It was not claimed that appellant was present when this supposed conversation took place between Jordan and Mrs. Sykes, and we are unable to perceive any theory upon which the testimony could have been held admissible. We are of opinion that Harry Sykes could not be impeached by proof of a conversation between two other people, at which neither he nor appellant were present, even though it be admitted that one of them made statements in such conversation which would tend to show that the testimony given by Harry Sykes was not true. This evidence was not only inadmissible, but capable of harm to appellant.

We think the statements of the district attorney, made in the presence of the jury, relative to certain matters which he sought to bring out concerning the witness Harry Sykes, were improper, but as it appears from the bill of exceptions that the trial court sustained the objection, and, as the case must be reversed, we conclude that such matter will not again arise.

[13] There is also a bill of exceptions, complaining that the state was permitted to introduce certain impeaching statements of the witness Jordan as to various conversations had by him with the witness Sykes; it being stated in the bill of exceptions that the witness Sykes had not denied, but had admitted, the matters and statements upon which the supposed impeachment rested. The rule is well established that, if the witness unequivocally admits making the statements, that ends the matter, and there is no need of proof further; but, if the matter is not clear, or is partially admitted or denied, then such impeaching testimony is admissible. What we have just said applies to the testimony of the witness Jordan as to conversations had with witness Sykes, as detailed in bill of exceptions No. 9. What Sykes said to Jordan out of the presence of the appellant could not become admissible, except it be as to some matter material in this case, which was made admissible by reason of the fact that an apt predicate therefor had been laid in the form of questions propounded to Sykes, and by him denied in whole or in part.

The matters complained of in the argument of state's counsel will probably not occur upon another trial.

For the errors mentioned, the judgment of the trial court will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

MESSIMER v. STATE. (No. 5760.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 26, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 23, 1920.)

1. Witnesses \S 277(2)—Defendant may be cross-examined as to whether his witnesses were present by whom acts attributed by deceased's alleged declarations to himself could be proved.

Where defendant in homicide, claiming reasonable belief that deceased was armed and making a demonstration to attack, relied in part on alleged declarations of deceased to him that deceased was the aggressor in difficulties with named persons, the state on cross-examination of him could ask whether such persons, by whose testimony as to such attacks he could support his case, were present, or whether an effort had been made to secure their attendance.

2. Homicide \S 188(1)—Defendant, relying for belief of impending attack by deceased on alleged declarations by deceased of acts by him, could prove the acts.

It is permissible, though not necessary, for defendant in homicide, claiming reasonable belief that deceased was armed, and making a demonstration preparatory to attack, and relying in part on alleged statements of deceased to him that deceased had been the aggressor in difficulties with named persons, to support this by evidence of such attacks on such persons having been made.

3. Criminal law \S 721½(2)—State may comment on defendant's failure to avail of privilege to prove acts attributed by deceased's alleged declarations to himself.

The state could comment in argument, on failure of defendant in homicide, relying in part on alleged declaration of deceased to him of difficulties with named persons in which deceased was the aggressor, to avail himself of his privilege of proving by others the specific acts of violence attributed to deceased by his alleged declarations.

4. Criminal law \S 695(2)—Unless obviously inadmissible, objection that evidence is irrelevant, immaterial, and prejudicial too general.

Objection to evidence that it is irrelevant, immaterial, and prejudicial is too general, unless obviously the evidence is inadmissible for any purpose.

5. Criminal law \S 1091(4)—Bill of exceptions to admission of evidence over general objection must show surrounding circumstances.

Bill of exceptions to admission of evidence over objection that it is irrelevant, immaterial, and prejudicial must, unless the evidence is obviously inadmissible, show the surrounding circumstances making it inadmissible.

6. Witnesses \S 277(5) — Cross-examination that accused on apprehension of danger did not appeal for protection when deceased brought out gun held not harmful.

Evidence adduced on cross-examination of defendant in homicide, relying on a reasonable apprehension of danger, that he did not appeal to any one for protection when deceased brought a gun out is not obviously irrelevant and harmful.

7. Witnesses \S 277(1)—Accused subject to cross-examination like others.

Accused, having offered himself as a witness, is, in general, subject to the same rules of cross-examination as other witnesses.

8. Criminal law \S 404(2)—Door admitted in evidence held sufficiently shown in same condition as at homicide.

That condition of a screen door through which defendant fired was the same when it was introduced in evidence as at time of homicide held sufficiently shown.

9. Criminal law \S 1087½—Record held not to show opinion of witness was admitted.

Viewed in the light of testimony in the statement of facts held that the record, fairly construed, did not bear the interpretation that, as complained in bill of exceptions, the opinion of witness was taken as evidence.

10. Criminal law \S 829(5)—Requests on self-defense covered by instructions given, need not be repeated.

There was no error in refusing special charges on self-defense which merely embraced, in varying phraseology, the same subject-matter covered by the main charge and other special charges given.

11. Criminal law \S 858(3)—Allowing jury to take a door introduced in evidence permissible.

Permitting the jury to take in their retirement a door introduced in evidence was not error (Code Cr. Proc. 1911, art. 751).

12. Criminal law \S 720(6)—Counsel may draw deductions from and comment on evidence.

Remarks of counsel in argument which are legitimate deductions from and comment on various phases of the evidence are permissible.

Appeal from District Court, Potter County; Henry S. Bishop, Judge.

J. H. Messimer was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

L. S. Kinder of Plainview, and Reeder & Reeder, of Amarillo, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. The conviction is for murder with punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for five years.

[1-3] Appellant introduced evidence to the effect that deceased bore the general reputation of a violent and dangerous man, also that it was the custom and habit of the deceased to go armed; that the deceased had threatened to arm himself and attack the appellant, and shortly before the homicide appellant had seen a pistol among the effects of the deceased, and believed him to be armed with a pistol and in the act of removing it from his pocket for use against the appellant at the time the fatal shots were fired. In his testimony the appellant related various conversations with the deceased, in which the deceased told of difficulties in which he had been engaged, and in which he had been the aggressor, naming some of the parties with whom he was engaged. On cross-examination of the appellant, he was asked by state's counsel whether he had in attendance upon the trial the persons named by deceased as having been injured by him in the various difficulties mentioned. The appellant answered that he did not. This question and answer were permitted over the objection of the appellant, and the ruling is made the subject of complaint on this appeal. In substance, this contention is that appellant was under no duty to produce the witnesses, and that their testimony to specific acts of violence by the deceased would not be admissible, and that the ruling tended to discredit the appellant's right of self-defense. We are referred to the case of Clifton v. State, 46 Tex. Cr. R. 18, 79 S. W. 824, 108 Am. St. Rep. 983, wherein the rule announced is that the effort of the sheriff or other persons to procure the attendance of a witness is not provable as a circumstance against the accused on trial. That rule, where the question is capable of casting suspicion upon the accused, or corrupting a witness or suppressing his testimony without proof thereof, is a sound one, and has been frequently applied. Funk v. State, 208 S. W. 513. Its application in the present instance is not apparent. Touching the effect of the failure to call a witness who is present or available, we are aware of no rule inhibiting the use on the trial of the failure of either the accused or the prosecution to use an available and competent witness who was present, unless it be one who is privileged from testifying. Corpus Juris, vol. 16, p. 541, § 1023. The matter in hand, however, is the proposition that the case must be reversed because the prosecution asked the appellant, while testifying as a witness, if certain persons, whom he named, and who would probably know certain facts, were present, or whether an effort had been made to secure their attendance. The record does not indicate that the prosecuting officers knew, prior to the time that appellant gave his testimony, of any of the difficulties, between the deceased and others, to which appellant referred. It was not the reputation of the deceased that was involved. It was his mental attitude toward the appellant, and the existence of reasonable grounds upon the part of the appellant to dread him and fear an attack from him. The deceased was unarmed when he was shot. Appellant seeks to justify the homicide upon his reasonable belief that the deceased was armed, and that he was making a demonstration preparatory to attack. Under such circumstances many instances are found in the books in which the specific acts of violence by the deceased, known to the accused, may be proved. Among these are Hampton v. State, 65 S. W. 527; Poer v. State, 67 S. W. 500; Brunet v. State, 12 Tex. App. 521; Johnson v. State, 28 Tex. App. 26, 11 S. W. 667; Crass v. State, 81 Tex. Cr. R. 314, 20 S. W. 579; People v. Harris, 95 Mich. 87, 54 N. W. 648; State v. McIver, 125 N. C. 645, 34 S. E. 439; State v. Beird, 118 Iowa, 474, 92 N. W. 694; State v. Shadwell, 22 Mont. 559, 57 Pac. 281.

Clearly, appellant was not obliged to prove the acts were done in order to avail himself of the effect upon his mind of the specific acts of violence committed by the deceased, and coming to the appellant through the declarations of the deceased. He had the privilege of relying upon proof of these declarations, but, under the circumstances, we think he was not confined to proof of these declarations. He might have supported them by the evidence of third parties who could relate first-hand knowledge of the acts of the deceased. Dodson v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 200, 70 S. W. 969; Spangler v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 430, 55 S. W. 326; Hysaw v. State, 69 Tex. Cr. R. 562, 155 S. W. 941; Bullock v. State, 73 Tex. Cr. R. 419, 165 S. W. 199. In Hysaw's Case, supra, it is said, where the accused testifies on the trial that he knew or had information concerning specific acts of violence of the deceased, "then he would be permitted to go further and prove by others, who know the facts, the said specific acts of violence without going into the details thereof." It is further said in the case, in substance, that when the appellant avails himself of this privilege, the state may rebut the theory presented by counter evidence or by cross-examination.

The rule concerning threats in homicide cases is somewhat analogous. The accused may act upon his information that threats against him have been made by the deceased. He is not confined to his information, however, and may prove that the threats were actually made, and upon this issue the prosecution may introduce controverting facts. In the light of the record and the authorities, we are of the opinion that the bill of exceptions in question presents no error either requiring or justifying a reversal of the judgment, and are also of the opinion that the appellant, not having availed himself of the privilege of proving the specific acts of violence attributed to the deceased otherwise than by the declarations of the deceased to the appellant, cannot justly complain of the reference to such failure in the argument of the case.

[4-7] From bill of exceptions No. 4, taken to the cross-examination of the appellant, we quote:

"You did not appeal to any one for any protection when he brought that gun out there, did you?" The defendant objected to this question on the ground that same was wholly irrelevant and immaterial, and might be prejudicial to the defendant."

To the answer that he did not, objection was urged upon the same ground, and the court verbally requested to instruct the jury to disregard it. Mr. Branch, in section 208 of his Annotated Texas Criminal Statutes, says:

"An objection to the evidence admitted that it was immaterial and irrelevant and prejudicial to the defendant is too general to be considered, unless obviously the evidence would not be admissible for any purpose"—citing the case of McGrath v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 422, 34 S. W. 127, 941, and numerous others.

This is not an arbitrary rule, but is related to and in aid of the reasonable and necessary requirement that a bill of exceptions to require consideration must sufficiently set out the proceedings and attendant circumstances to enable the appellate court to know certainly that an error was committed. Thompson v. State, 29 Tex. App. 208, 15 S. W. 206; Barkman v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 108, 52 S. W. 53; Spencer v. State, 61 Tex. Cr. R. 62, 133 S. W. 1040; Eldridge v. State, 12 Tex. App. 208; Cordova v. State, 6 Tex. App. 447, and other cases in Branch's Annotated Texas Penal Code, § 207. The burden on appeal is upon the appellant to show that the ruling complained of was erroneous and material. The correctness of the ruling is presumed, unless the contrary appears from the bill of exceptions. Vernon's Texas Crim. Statutes, vol. 2, p. 537, note 21.

The bill in question fails to set out facts other than those disclosed by the quotation, and is inadequate to inform the court of the surrounding circumstances, and to make it plain that the evidence was not admissible upon some issue, or made admissible by some phase of the procedure upon the trial. The question and answer, in our opinion, are not obviously improper and harmful. On the merits of the question we are referred to Newman v. State, 70 S. W. 951, in which this court expressed its disapproval of the question put to the accused on cross-examination:

"Did you file any complaint before any justice of the peace or any other officer authorized under the law to receive complaints, charging deceased with making serious threats against your life, or asking that he be placed under a peace bond, after you heard of the threats against you by deceased?"

This question was much more specific than the one under consideration, and the objections addressed to it more comprehensive, and doubtless on review its materiality as impairing the appellant's right was made to appear by a bill of exceptions. Without challenging the correctness of the decision in that case, as the matter was presented and applied to the record, we think the holding does not establish a rule of evidence which should be extended so as to embrace the facts disclosed by the bill in the present case and characterize them as obviously irrelevant and harmful. It often happens that the acts and declarations of the accused in a homicide case, where the issue of self-defense arises, become admissible in his behalf. Koller v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 496, 38 S. W. 44; Smith v. State, 46 Tex. Cr. R. 284, 81 S. W. 936, 108 Am. St. Rep. 991; Pratt v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 233, 96 S. W. 8; Anderson v. State, 214 S. W. 356; Branch's Annotated Texas Penal Code, § 1929; Everett v. State, 30 Tex. App. 682, 18 S. W. 674; Thomas v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 562, 51 S. W. 242, 46 L. B. A. 454, 76 Am. St. Rep. 740. The jury were called upon to determine mainly from the testimony of the appellant whether, as viewed from his standpoint at the time the shot was fired, he was under a reasonable apprehension of danger. Having offered himself as a witness upon this issue, cross-examination which would lead to its solution was relevant and proper. Mr. Wharton, in his work on Evidence, § 55, vol. 1, says:

"In homicide, evidence is relevant to show the good faith of the defendant who pleads that he was acting in self-defense after recent threats by the deceased to take his life and when some overt act accompanies such threats."

The state of mind of appellant was in question. Howard v. State, 25 Tex. App. 691, 8 S. W. 921; Pratt v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 232, 96 S. W. 8; Branch's Annotated Texas Penal Code, § 1929. The evidence available in the instant case was almost exclusively the testimony of the appellant. On this issue, we are of the opinion that the inquiry made, as developed by the bill, was not so obviously improper and hurtful as to entitle the appellant to have the judgment set aside. Touching the scope of cross-examination of the accused when he offers himself as a witness, Mr. Branch, in his Annotated Texas Penal Code, citing many decisions of this court, states the conclusion deduced therefrom as follows:

"When defendant takes the stand as a witness he is subject to the same rules as any other witness. He may be contradicted, impeached, discredited, attacked, sustained, bolstered up, made to give evidence against himself, cross-examined as to new matter, and treated in every respect as any other witness testifying in behalf of defendant, except where some statute forbids certain matters to be used against him, such as proof of his conviction on a former trial of the present case, his failure to testify on a former trial or hearing, and the like." Huffman v. State, 28 Tex. App. 177, 12 S. W. 588; Branch's Annotated Texas Penal Code, § 147.

The deceased leased his farm to the appellant, making certain reservations. A controversy between the deceased and other persons developed, and ripened into a suit over a strip of land claimed by the deceased. A fence was put around this land by the appellant, in the absence of the deceased, and a gate was made in the fence, inclosing land of deceased. This, according to appellant's theory, did not meet with the approval of the deceased, and he became quarrelsome and offensive by reason thereof. He was boarding at the home of the appellant. The homicide took place in the morning. According to appellant's testimony, while he was milking the deceased came into the lot with his left hand in his hip pocket, and said, "Maybe, by God, you want to start something this morning," to which appellant replied, "No, I don't want to have any trouble with you, but I have asked you to stay out of my house, and I want you to stay out; don't come in there any more at all." Deceased replied that "by God" he would come in there when he got good and ready, and if appellant tried to stop him he would shoot hell out of him. The appellant, according to his testimony, had previously provided himself with shotgun shells to fit his Winchester gun; and after he finished milking he went to his room, loaded his gun, and sat down on the bed, and while there saw the deceased approaching on horseback, and, after hitching his horse, upon foot. Appellant said:

"Mr. Ward looked like he was looking at me as he approached. After he got pretty close I moved from where I was sitting on the bed, and he was coming towards me, looking at me. I raised up, and as I did that Mr. Ward reached towards his pocket with his right hand. I grabbed my gun and shot him twice—shot fast, as quick as I could. The screen door was between us. I shot him because I thought he was going to shoot me. I thought this from threats that he had made and from the signs that he was making at the time."

[8] During the cross-examination of the appellant, the screen door through which the shots were fired was exhibited and used. The use of the door and its introduction in evidence are complained of upon the ground that the identity of the condition of the door at the time of the trial with that at the time of the homicide was not established. Without rehearsing in detail the evidence touching the condition of the screen door at the time of the trial as compared with its condition immediately after the shots were fired, we have examined the record, and find nothing that would justify sustaining the contention made. It appeared from the testimony of the witness Bailey that he reached the premises a very short time after the deceased was killed, and while his body was lying upon the ground, and remained there until the sheriff arrived. Subsequently, on another day, the appellant pointed out to the witness the place from which the shooting was done, the position of the deceased, and the holes in the screen door through which the shots were fired. When the appellant was on the stand he identified the door, and said:

"I suppose these two holes are in about the same condition they were just after the shots were fired. I don't know as I looked at it afterwards and examined it. They look like they are in the same relative position now as they were at that time."

The sheriff testified that he examined the door about 11 o'clock in the morning, the homicide having taken place about 9, and that he observed no difference in the condition of the door as it was exhibited upon the trial and its condition at the time mentioned.

[9] Bill of exceptions No. 6 recites that while Mrs. Durham was on the witness stand she was asked on cross-examination the following question:

"Now, counsel for defendant asks you if you knew what was said and what happened inside of that barn when Ward went in after his saddle. Tell the jury whether or not there was time enough for anything much to have happened" —to which she replied: "No; there wasn't." This was objected to as calling for an opinion. The bill is too meager to enable us to decide whether or not the evidence was admissible or hurtful. None of the surrounding facts are set out. Viewed in the light of the testimony of witness Mrs. Durham in the statements of facts, which we have examined, the bill discloses no error. The witness stated on recross-examination that when she made the statement complained of she misunderstood the question, and said that she did not know what happened while Ward was in the barn. We think, fairly construed, the record does not bear the interpretation that the opinion of the witness was taken as evidence.

[10] Various charges were requested upon the subject of apparent danger. The general subject of apparent danger was embraced in the main charge, and in addition thereto the theory of apparent danger arising out of communicated threats. The subject of self-defense seems to have been submitted in an unexceptional way in the main charge; in fact, no exceptions were addressed to this. Two of appellant's special charges on that subject were given. One informed the jury that if the appellant feared an attack from the deceased, he had a right to arm himself and purchase shells. The other was in the following language:

"You are further instructed that if you believe from the evidence in this case, viewing it from the standpoint of the defendant at the time, that immediately before the killing of the said George Ward by the defendant, the deceased was advancing towards the defendant, and made a demonstration as if to draw a weapon, and from the conduct and manner of the deceased and the demonstration made by him, if any, and the defendant's knowledge of the character and disposition of the deceased, and the defendant was caused to have a reasonable expectation or fear of death or serious bodily injury, and that the defendant, acting under such reasonable expectation or fear and while such reasonable expectation or fear continued, shot and killed deceased, or if you have a reasonable doubt as to such facts, then you will acquit the defendant, although you may believe from the evidence that the deceased in fact had no weapon at such time, and that the defendant was in truth in no danger from an attack by the deceased."

In view of the court's charge on the subject of self-defense and the special charges given, there was no error in refusing other special charges, which embraced in varying phraseology the same subject-matter.

The suggestion that special charge No. 14, while incorrect as a legal proposition, was sufficiently pointed to call the court's attention to the omission in the charge to instruct the jury upon the right of the appellant to continue to shoot is met by other parts of the record. On the subject in the main charge the jury was told that the appellant was, under no circumstances, required to retreat, and in special charge No. 1, given at the request of the appellant, the jury was told, in substance, that if his life appeared in danger "he had a right not only to shoot and kill, but to continue to shoot at deceased so long as the appearance of danger existed in the mind of the defendant."

[11] Permitting the jury to take in their retirement the door which was introduced in evidence was not error. Article 751, Code Cr. Proc.; Holder v. State, 81 Tex. Cr. R. 194, 194 S. W. 163; Chalk v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 116, 32 S. W. 534; other cases listed Vernon's Texas Crim. Statutes, vol. 2, p. 566.

[12] We fail to find in the remarks of counsel such infringement of the right of legitimate argument as would be calculated to taint the verdict with passion or prejudice. In the light of the expressions on the subject often made by the court, we, without quoting them, express the conclusion that the remarks criticized were legitimate deductions from and comments upon various phases of the evidence.

Impressed with the view that the record discloses no errors authorizing a reversal of the judgment, its affirmance is ordered.

STOPPELBERG et al. v. STOPPELBERG.
(No. 6381.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. May 19, 1920.)

1. Evidence §222(3)—Admission of defendant admissible as against him.

In action for partition by a widowed daughter-in-law and sister-in-law against her mother-in-law and brother-in-law, testimony that the brother-in-law had told the witness that certain of the personal property involved belonged in equal parts to him and his brother, plaintiff's husband, held admissible as between plaintiff and the brother-in-law.

2. Appeal and error §931(6) — Testimony heard by judge without jury presumed to have been properly applied.

Where a case is tried before the judge without a jury, the presumption will prevail that testimony was used only on the point and between the parties to which it could legally apply, particularly where there is sufficient competent evidence to sustain the judgment.

3. Discovery §70—Refusal to admit testimony of party who failed to appear for taking of deposition within discretion of court.

In view of a defendant's failure to appear for taking of her deposition on interrogatories pursuant to Rev. St. art. 3680, it was within the discretion of the trial court to refuse to allow her to testify, and to allow plaintiff to introduce the interrogatories to her in rebuttal of defendant's evidence, pursuant to article 3685.

4. Discovery §54—Notice of filing of interrogatories to parties or attorneys not required.

Under Rev. St. art. 3682, notice to parties in a suit or their attorneys of filing of interrogatories in order to take their depositions is not required, and failure to issue such notices was not evidence of a design to intrap defendants.

5. Husband and wife §262(1)—Land bought during marriage presumed to have been community property.

There is a presumption that land bought by a husband during the existence of the marital relation between himself and his wife was community property, and the burden was on the wife, sued, after her husband's death, for partition, to establish that it was her separate estate even though the deed was executed to her.

6. Husband and wife §255—Payment for land by wife from insurance on life of husband did not destroy community character.

Payment of the balance of the purchase money on a tract of land purchased by a husband out of insurance money on his life by his surviving wife to whom the deed ran did not destroy the community character of the property and stamp it as separate estate.

7. Partition §87—Charge against heir of proportionate part of purchase money of community property held proper.

In a daughter-in-law's suit for partition, where the court properly decreed certain land to be community property of defendant mother-in-law, who had paid part of the purchase price with her own funds, it properly charged the daughter-in-law with her proportionate part of the purchase money paid by defendant mother-in-law.

8. Husband and wife §258—Separate estate must reimburse community for proper improvements made in good faith.

Where improvements on a wife's land were made with community funds of husband and wife, after the husband's death a daughter-in-law, widow of a son, was entitled to her share in such improvements as against her mother-in-law, under the rule that the separate estate of one member of the community must reimburse the community for any proper improvements made in good faith on separate estate with community funds; but, since no such claim should be permitted to affect or jeopardize the title to the land, a lien for such funds cannot be fixed on it.

9. Husband and wife \Leftrightarrow 49½(8) — Evidence held to show husband intended to make gift of land to wife.

In a daughter-in-law and sister-in-law's action for partition against her mother-in-law and brother-in-law, evidence held insufficient to show that the deceased father-in-law intended to make a gift of certain land to the mother-in-law, his wife, when purchasing it.

Appeal from District Court, Bastrop County; R. J. Alexander, Judge.

Action by Minnie Stoppelberg against Bertha Stoppelberg and another. From the judgment, defendants appeal. Judgment reformed, and, as reformed, affirmed.

The Bowers, of Giddings, for appellants. Maynard & Maynard, of Bastrop, for appellee.

FLY, O. J. This is an action for partition of property, real and personal, and for damages arising from a conversion of certain personal property, instituted by appellee against Bertha Stoppelberg and John Stoppelberg. The appellants are mother and son, and appellee, a widowed daughter and sister, in law. The property sought to be partitioned consisted of five tracts of land, seven bales of cotton valued at $1,050, 4,500 pounds of seed cotton, 200 bushels of corn, two tons of unbaled hay, and two tons of fodder. The property, alleged to belong to appellee alone and to have been converted by appellants, consisted of cattle, hogs, automobile, horse, piano, two organs, motorcycle, bicycle, buggy, and set of harness. Appellants answered that four of the five tracts of land, described in the petition, were the separate property of Bertha Stoppelberg, and that lot No. 1, block 17, in the city of Galveston, sought to be partitioned, belonged one-third to appellee and two-thirds to appellants; that all the personal property sued for was the separate property of Bertha Stoppelberg, except one bicycle and one motorcycle. Appellants filed a cross-action against appellee for conversion of two bales of cotton, one silver railroad watch, one small cooking stove, and one chest of blacksmith tools. No jury was demanded, and the trial judge rendered judgment in favor of appellee for a one-eighth interest in and to two tracts of land, one of 147.6 acres, and the other of 145 acres; for one-sixth of the Galveston lot; for one-half of seven bales of cotton, seed cotton, corn, tops, and fodder, all of the value of $1,830, and for the other personal property sued for, and for $250, her interest in improvements on the 82½-acre tract, and rendered judgment in favor of Bertha Stoppelberg for the 82½-acre tract and for $86.87½, being one-eighth of amount of purchase money paid by the said Bertha Stoppelberg on the 145-acre tract.

The findings of the court are sustained by the evidence. They show that Bertha Stoppelberg was the widow of Henry G. Stoppelberg, who died intestate in 1905, leaving as his heirs appellants and Paul Stoppelberg, the husband of appellee. Paul Stoppelberg, to whom appellee was married on September 11, 1918, died intestate on October 17, 1918, and at his death owned the personal property described in the petition, with the exception of one horse, one buggy, one set of harness, one piano scarf, one open-face silver watch, one tool chest, and one stove, which belong to appellants. He also died possessed of a one-fourth interest in and to the 147½- and 145-acre tracts, which he inherited from his father, who owned a one-half interest therein at the time of his death; Bertha Stoppelberg owning the other half. Two-thirds of the Galveston lot was the community property of Bertha Stoppelberg and her deceased husband; the other third being the separate property of her said husband. Bertha Stoppelberg paid $695 on the purchase price of the 145 acres of land, after her husband's death.

[1, 2] The court permitted William Schroeder to testify that John Stoppelberg, one of the appellants, had told him that certain of the personal property belonged, in equal parts, to him and his brother, Paul Stoppelberg, and that action is made the basis of the first assignment of error. No doubt the testimony was admissible as between appellee and John Stoppelberg, and, being tried before the judge, without a jury, the presumption will prevail that it was used only on the point and between the parties to which it could legally apply. Appellee had alleged that she and John Stoppelberg jointly owned the cotton, sorghum, and corn tops, and Schroeder testified that John Stoppelberg told him, not that all the personal property but that the last-mentioned property, was owned in equal parts by him and Paul. Appellants seem to ignore the fact that the admission was made by one of the parties, and cites authorities on declarations made by third parties to sustain the assignment. The presumption will prevail that the trial judge considered it as bearing upon the case against John Stoppelberg, especially as there is sufficient competent evidence to sustain the judgment. Lindsay v. Jaffray, 55 Tex. 626; Cole v. Noble, 63 Tex. 432. This ruling disposes of the second assignment of error, which complains as to like declarations made by John Stoppelberg and Paul Stoppelberg as to the personal property mentioned. The court stated in his findings of fact that he had excluded from his consideration all declarations made by Paul Stoppelberg. He had the right to use the declarations of John Stoppelberg as affecting disputes between him and appellee. It was proved that Bertha Stoppelberg had admitted that the property belonged to John and Paul. In her depositions, taken as confessed, she admitted the same thing.

The findings of the court show that on January 27, 1919, interrogatories to Bertha Stoppelberg were filed by appellee, and a commission issued to take her depositions. Efforts were made to obtain her depositions from time to time, but the officer failed to obtain the same, although her house was visited, and a subpoena and attachment issued for her. Appellee introduced her testimony and rested as did appellants also. Appellants afterwards asked to be allowed to introduce evidence, and when Bertha Stoppelberg was introduced as a witness in her own behalf, and was asked questions covered by the direct interrogatories, appellee objected, and asked that said interrogatories be taken as confessed. The objection was sustained, and the witness was not permitted to answer questions covered by the interrogatories. The court found that Bertha Stoppelberg "failed and refused" to answer the interrogatories, and the notary public to whom the interrogatories were delivered certified that Bertha Stoppelberg and John Stoppelberg denied him admission to their house, and declined and refused to appear before him. The interrogatories were filed six months before the trial, and a subpoena was served on Bertha Stoppelberg on January 28, 1919, commanding her to appear and answer the interrogatories, and she was tendered a fee for her attendance, but she failed and refused to attend. An attachment was then issued for her, but she could not be found by the officers. Appellants filed a motion after she was not allowed to testify to matters about which the interrogatories were propounded, and then a motion was filed that Bertha Stoppelberg be allowed to answer the interrogatories at that time. The motion was sworn to by Bertha Stoppelberg, in which she stated that she was 70 years of age, and did not obey the summons to appear and answer the interrogatories because she was sick and in mental distress at the recent death of her son, Paul, but went to Giddings to consult with her attorneys about answering the interrogatories, and was seized with influenza, and was not able to answer the interrogatories, and then went to Houston for treatment, and was not able to answer until her trial came off. As to refusing the notary public admission to her house and refusing to appear before him, no answer was attempted. No time to consult with attorneys was requested. The returns of the officers are not contradicted, and no testimony was introduced by appellants to sustain their motion. As said by this court in Weinert v. Simang, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 435, 68 S. W. 1011:

"A number of cases have been cited by appellant to show that the court should have set aside the certificate of the officer and have permitted appellant to testify, but none of them hold that this court has the authority to determine that the action of the court in deciding against appellant on his motion to suppress the certificate in the first instance and to have another hearing on it in the second instance was erroneous, in the absence of a statement of the facts upon which the motion was tried."

The interrogatories are authorized by Rev. Stats. art. 3680, and taking them as confessed is authorized by article 3685. The finding of the trial judge would be sustained in the face of the affidavit, as the court could reject its contents if he desired. It was not supported by evidence. There was nothing tending to show any attempt to intrap appellants in taking the depositions.

[3] It was clearly within the discretion of the court to refuse to allow Bertha Stoppelberg to testify and to allow appellee to introduce the interrogatories to her in rebuttal of appellants' evidence. No abuse of discretion has been shown in this case. Jones v. Wright, 92 S. W. 1010; Railway v. Morris, 144 S. W. 1163; Ayers v. Harris, 77 Tex. 108, 13 S. W. 768; Bounds v. Little, 79 Tex. 128, 15 S. W. 225; Railway v. Robinson, 79 Tex. 608, 15 S. W. 584.

[4] Bertha Stoppelberg disclosed in her motion that, while she was so sick and mentally distressed that she could not go to Bastrop to answer interrogatories, she was able to go to Giddings to consult her attorneys, and her sickness did not prevent her from going to Houston and remaining away until July 10, 1919, when the case was tried, when she was able to go to Bastrop and offer to testify. Her own motion tended to show that she was evading the answering of the interrogatories. In the cases cited by appellants, evidence was introduced to show that there was no willful refusal to answer the interrogatories. Appellants relied alone on their motion to vacate the official certificate of the notary public. The law does not require notice to parties to a suit, nor to their attorneys, in order to take their depositions, and a failure to issue such notices was not evidence of a design to intrap appellants. Article 3682, Rev. Stats. They knew about the matter, and refused to answer the interrogatories. The third, fourth, fifth, and sixth assignments of error are overruled.

[5-7] The 145-acre tract of land having been bought during the marital relation between Bertha Stoppelberg and her deceased husband, the presumption obtains that it was community property, and the burden was upon her to establish that it was her separate estate. The fact that the deed was executed to Bertha Stoppelberg did not destroy the presumption that the property was community. Payment of the balance of the purchase money on the 145-acre tract out of insurance money on the life of the deceased husband by the surviving wife did not destroy the community character of the property, and stamp it as separate estate. The court properly decreed the property to be community, and charged appellee with her proportionate part of the purchase money paid by Bertha Stoppelberg. Allen v. Allen, 101 Tex. 362, 107 S. W. 528; Hayworth v. Williams, 102 Tex. 308, 116 S. W. 43, 132 Am. St. Rep. 879; Moore v. Moore, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 600, 68 S. W. 59; Miller v. Odom, 152 S. W. 1185. The deeds did not state that the property was the separate estate of the wife. According to the testimony of John Stoppelberg, his father agreed to furnish the money to pay for the 147 acres of land. There was no agreement that either tract of the land would be the separate property of the wife. There was no testimony tending to impress the character of separate property upon the land. If the $600 was given by the husband to the wife to pay for the land, there was no testimony tending to show that it was the separate money of the husband. The testimony was too vague and unsatisfactory to remove the presumption that the property was community estate. The seventh and eighth assignments of error are overruled.

The ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth assignments of error are overruled. There was testimony tending to support the judgment of the court as to the cotton bales, the seed cotton, and other personal property.

[8] The question of the homestead rights of Bertha Stoppelberg in the 82½-acre tract of land is sought to be raised in the brief of appellant, but not in pleadings or proof. The improvements on the land were made with community funds, and appellee was entitled to her share in the same. It is the well-settled law of Texas that the separate estate of one member of the community must reimburse the community for any proper improvements made in good faith upon the separate estate with community funds. Furrh v. Winston, 66 Tex. 521, 1 S. W. 527; Schmidt v. Huppmann, 73 Tex. 112, 11 S. W. 175; Maddox v. Summerlin, 92 Tex. 483, 49 S. W. 1033, 50 S. W. 567; Bullock v. Sprowls, 54 S. W. 657, affirmed by Supreme Court, 93 Tex. 188, 54 S. W. 661, 47 L. R. A. 326, 77 Am. St. Rep. 849; Summerville v. King, 98 Tex. 332, 83 S. W. 680, affirming 80 S. W. 1050. In all of these cases, however, it is asserted that no such claim would be permitted to affect or jeopardize the title to the land. If that be the law, then the lien to secure the interest of appellee in the 82½ acres of land, the separate estate of Bertha Stoppelberg, was improperly fixed on that land.

The cases which appellants claim hold, where it is shown that the consideration in a deed taken in the name of the wife was the separate property of the husband, the presumption will arise that the husband made a gift to the wife, whether the recital in the deed shows it or not, do not so hold. They hold that where the evidence shows that the purchase money was the separate property of the husband, which he gave to the wife, the presumption of a gift to the wife of the land would arise, although the deed did not so recite.

[9] In this case the only testimony tending to show that the husband intended to make a gift of the 147 acres of land to Bertha Stoppelberg is the testimony of John Stoppelberg, a defendant, and, of course, interested party. He testified:

"I was not present with my mother when she bought the tract of 147 acres of land from Meyer, the second tract. I was not present at the time the deed was executed. As to whose money paid for that land, my mother paid for it. I don't recollect how much she paid for it; I think it was $600. I know why the deed was made to my mother. It was made to her because father said he did not want to pay the land off; that if she wanted to pay she could buy and he would furnish the money. The deed was made to Bertha Stoppelberg."

No inkling is given as to when and where the father made the declaration, nor to whom it was made. If made when the trade was consummated, John Stoppelberg was not there, and it is so inconsistent as to be unreasonable for the husband to say that he did not want to pay for the land, but that the wife could buy and he would furnish the money. That might be a loan, but not a gift to the wife, and it might be separate property or money belonging to the community, that he was lending. The evidence was too vague and unsatisfactory to be credited, and evidently it was rejected by the trial judge. The deed from Meyer recites the payment of $600 on November 1, 1899. In order to rebut the legal presumption that the property was paid for with community funds, the only testimony is the vague and indefinite assertion of one of the appellants that at some time and some place, not designated, the husband had said he would not pay for the land, but would let his wife have the money. The evidence was ignored, and it should have been ignored.

According to the theory of appellants, the husband of Bertha Stoppelberg bought no land, although he seemed to have the money, but gave his wife free rein in dealing in real estate on her own responsibility and for her own separate use and benefit. She had no money, but was compelled to look to his pocket while living and to insurance on his life after his death for the payments made on what is claimed to be her separate estate. What the idea was for taking the different deeds of conveyance in the name of the wife remains unexplained. Different motives might be assigned for such conduct of a husband, but it is unnecessary to indulge them, and all that is proper to presume is that the property was bought for the community and placed in the name of the wife.

The judgment will be reformed so as to eliminate the lien granted on the 82½-acre tract, and, as reformed, will be affirmed.

NEWCOM v. FORD. (No. 2280.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
May 20, 1920.)

1. Gifts \Leftrightarrow 34—Conditional promise to give not enforceable.

A conditional promise to give a thing or forgive a debt is not enforceable.

2. Contracts \Leftrightarrow 147(1) — Nature determined with reference to intention.

The nature of a transaction should be determined with reference to the intention of the parties.

3. Vendor and purchaser. \Leftrightarrow 50—Deed and purchase-money note to be construed together.

Where a note constituted the consideration for a deed, the deed and note should be construed as if they were parts of one and the same instrument.

4. Gifts \Leftrightarrow 5(2)—Evidence held to show sale of land and not a gift.

Where land was conveyed and a note taken for the price and the deed contained a recital that if the grantor died before the note was due then he willed the note to the grantee, the transaction was not a gift of the land or of the note to the grantee, but a sale of the land and an agreement to pay therefor conditioned on the grantor living until maturity of the note.

Appeal from District Court, Harrison County; P. O. Beard, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Lula P. Newcom, administratrix of J. E. Ford, deceased, against Charlie Ford. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This was a suit by Mrs. Lula P. Newcom, as administratrix of the estate of J. E. Ford, deceased, against Charlie Ford, to recover the amount of a promissory note made by the latter, dated August 21, 1915, whereby he undertook three years thereafter to pay to said J. E. Ford or order $525. It appeared from recitals in the note that it was for the purchase money of 11¼ acres of land conveyed by the payee to the maker thereof, and that a vendor's lien had been retained on the land to secure its payment. The suit was to foreclose that lien also. In his answer Charlie Ford alleged that—

The deed made to him "provides that, if J. E. Ford should die before the note became due, then the note was to be willed or given by J. E. Ford to this defendant; that J. E. Ford died on 3d day of July, 1918, and note became due on 21st day of August, 1918, after the death of J. E. Ford. Wherefore the note sued on became the property of the defendant and became canceled."

The trial was to the court without a jury. It appeared from a recital in the deed from J. E. Ford to Charlie Ford admitted in evidence that the consideration therefor was the note sued on, and the deed contained another recital as follows:

"If I die before this note is due then I will it my nephew Chas. Ford."

The appeal is from a judgment that the administratrix take nothing by her suit.

John W. Scott and Wm. Lane, both of Marshall, for appellant.

Geo. Prendergast, of Marshall, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-4] As we view the record, the judgment is not erroneous unless it is true, as appellant insists it is, that the provision in the deed to appellee set out in the statement above in its legal effect was a mere promise of J. E. Ford if he died before the note matured to give it to appellee. Of course, if that was the effect of the provision, the judgment is wrong, for a conditional promise to give a thing or "forgive" a debt is not enforceable. 12 R. C. L. 832, 944, 950. But we do not agree that was the effect of the provision. The nature of the transaction should be determined with reference to the intention of the parties, and in determining that the deed and note should be construed as if they were parts of one and the same instrument. Dunlap's Adm'r v. Wright, 11 Tex. 598, 62 Am. Dec. 506. So construing them it is reasonably plain, we think, that the transaction was a sale of the land by J. E. Ford and not a gift thereof or of the note to appellee. What J. E. Ford agreed to do was to convey the land to appellee; and what appellee agreed to do was not unconditionally to pay said Ford any sum of money for the land, but to pay him $525 therefor if said Ford was alive three years from the date of the deed. It is clear, we think, that said Ford did not expect appellee to pay, and that appellee did not expect to pay anything for the land if said Ford should not live as long as three years. For aught the record shows to the contrary, appellee may not have been willing to bind himself unconditionally to give as much as $525 for the land, and may have been induced solely by the agreement that he need not pay anything for it if J. E. Ford died within three years to bind himself to pay said sum for it if said Ford lived that long.

The judgment will be affirmed.

NEWCOM v. FORD. (No. 2282.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. May 20, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser \S 280(2)—In action on vendor's lien note, general denial sufficient to support judgment.

In an action on a vendor's lien note, a general denial was a sufficient pleading to support a judgment for defendant, assuming that a special plea that the note was turned over to defendant with the understanding that the debt would be satisfied if the vendor died was insufficient.

2. Pleading \S 378—General denial puts every material allegation in issue.

A general denial operates to put in issue every material fact alleged in plaintiff's petition.

3. Appeal and error \S 750(4)—Sufficiency of evidence cannot be raised by assignment of error attacking the pleading.

The sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment must be raised by an assignment of error attacking the evidence and not the pleading.

4. Vendor and purchaser \S 280(3)—In action on vendor's lien note, general denial entitled defendant to explain possession of note.

In an action on a vendor's lien note where plaintiff by a supplemental petition alleged that defendant had possession of the note through mistake and that he owed the note and had not paid it, evidence to explain his possession and show that it was not through mistake was admissible under a general denial.

5. Gifts \S 43—Maker of note not liable when holder delivers it to him as a gift.

Where a vendor taking a vendor's lien note for the price subsequently delivered it to the vendee with the expressed purpose and intention of making an immediate gift thereof, the vendee was not in possession of the note through mistake as alleged in an action thereon, but was the owner of the note and not liable for its payment.

Appeal from District Court, Harrison County.

Action by Mrs. Lula P. Newcom, administratrix of J. E. Ford, deceased, against Sam Ford. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Appellant, as administratrix of the estate of J. E. Ford, deceased, sued the appellee on a vendor's lien note executed by appellee to J. E. Ford and to foreclose the lien on 12½ acres of land. The petition also alleged that the note sued on "was through mistake turned over to the said Sam Ford by the said J. E. Ford." The appellee answered by general denial and by special plea "that the note was turned over to the defendant before the death of J. E. Ford with the understanding that in the event J. E. Ford died that the debt would be satisfied." The appellant by supplemental petition replied "that if the note was delivered to the defendant that same was delivered through mistake and with no intention that same should become the property of defendant without payment," and that no consideration passed from Sam Ford to J. E. Ford for the delivery of the note. The trial was before the court without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant.

J. E. Ford conveyed to appellee a tract of land containing 12½ acres of land, in consideration of $500 evidenced by a promissory note payable to J. E. Ford or order, dated August 21, 1915, and due three years after date. J. E. Ford, it appears, "delivered this note back to Sam Ford about two weeks after it was made." J. E. Ford was at the time in feeble health, and continued so until his death on July 2, 1918. Sam Ford was a nephew of J. E. Ford, and they lived about 400 yards from each other. The note remained in the possession of Sam Ford from the date of delivery to him until the trial of the suit. It was proven that J. E. Ford had stated to the certain named relatives "that he had given Sam Ford his note," and "that he had given Sammy his note back, as he had as soon for him to have the place as anybody else, because he had a big family and was not able to pay for it."

Scott & Lane, of Marshall, for appellant. Hall, Brown & Hall, of Marshall, for appellee.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). The first assigned error does not afford, it is concluded, as ground for reversal of the judgment, and it should be overruled.

[1-5] By the second assigned error it is insisted that the pleadings of the appellee were not sufficient to support a judgment for the defendant. The appellee filed a general denial and a special plea. It can be assumed, in passing upon the assignment of error, that the special plea is subject to a general demurrer, as claimed by the appellant, and that there was a general denial as a legal pleading of the defendant. The general denial would, it is thought, be a sufficient pleading in this case, as in all cases, to support a judgment for the defendant. A general denial operates to put in issue every material fact alleged in the plaintiff's petition. The sufficiency of evidence to support the judgment rendered is another question, required to be raised by an attack on the evidence and not the pleading. In the instant case, though, a material fact alleged in the petition and required to be proven by the appellant was that appellee was in possession of the note "through mistake," and that appellee owed the note and had not paid it. The general denial allowed the appellee to explain his alleged possession of the note, that it was not "through mistake" as alleged. And looking to the evidence, which is not required by the assignment, it appears without contradiction that J. E. Ford, payee of the note, delivered the note to Sam Ford, the maker, in about two weeks after its execution, with the expressed purpose and intention of making an immediate gift thereof. The evidence only went to show an absolute and not a conditional gift. If J. E. Ford made an absolute gift of the note to Sam Ford, then Sam Ford would not be in possession of the note "through mistake," but would be the owner thereof, and would not be liable for payment of the same.

The judgment is affirmed.

FORD et ux. v. NEWCOM. (No. 2284.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. May 20, 1920.)

Appeal from District Court, Harrison County; P. O. Beard, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Lula P. Newcom, administratrix of J. E. Ford, deceased, against Ed Ford and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. H. Prendergast, of Marshall, for appellants.

Scott & Lane, of Marshall, for appellee.

HODGES, J. Mrs. Lula P. Newcom filed this suit as administratrix of the estate of J. E. Ford, deceased, against the appellants Ed Ford and his wife, Nellie Ford. The suit was based upon a promissory note executed by Ed Ford and wife April 25, 1911, payable to the order of L. N. Ford and secured by a mechanic's lien on a house and lot. The defense urged in the court below was that the note did not belong to the estate of J. E. Ford, deceased, but was the property of L. N. Ford, the father of the appellant Ed Ford, and that it had been settled before the suit was filed. In a trial before the court a judgment was rendered for the plaintiff for the sum of $219.24.

In this appeal only one assignment is urged: That the evidence did not support the finding by the court that the note sued on belonged to the estate of J. E. Ford, deceased. It is true that the testimony upon that issue was conflicting; but, after a careful examination of the entire statement of facts, we have concluded that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

McCOLLUM et al. v. McMANUS et al. (No. 8446.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas. May 15, 1920.)

Injunction §118(1)—Petition to enjoin inspectors from dipping cattle good as against demurrer.

A petition of cattle owners to enjoin live stock inspectors from requiring the dipping of cattle, alleging that plaintiff's stock would be seriously crippled and bruised, and that there would be a total or partial loss of milk or butter as to milch cows, held good as against demurrer.

Appeal from District Court, Henderson County; John S. Prince, Judge.

Suit by W. D. McCollum and others against C. W. McManus and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

W. L. Faulk and Miller & Miller, all of Athens, for appellants.

RAINEY, C. J. W. D. McCollum and about 175 others, as plaintiffs, brought this suit against certain parties, live stock inspectors for Henderson county, and alleged, in substance, as follows:

"That the plaintiffs reside in Henderson county, Tex., and that the defendants reside in Henderson county, Tex.

"For cause of action plaintiffs show to the court that they are the owners and caretakers of cattle, horses, and mules, located on their respective premises in said Henderson county, Tex. That they have been the owners of said stock for a long time, and are now the owners of said live stock, consisting of cattle, horses, and mules, as aforesaid, and they are being kept by the plaintiffs on their respective premises in Henderson county, as aforesaid.

"That the defendants purport to be and are pretending to act as official live stock inspectors in and for Henderson county, Tex., and are being paid a salary as such pretended inspectors by the commissioners' court of said county, except the defendant McManus, who is receiving his pay from the state government, the amount being $185 per month, said inspectors, receiving for their services $85 per month from the commissioners' court of Henderson county, Tex. That each inspector receives $85 per month as aforesaid.

"That the defendants are claiming the right, power, and authority as inspectors to compel plaintiffs and all others, citizens of Henderson county, who own or have such live stock under their control, to dip said live stock in certain vats constructed by defendants and the county authorities of Henderson county, Tex., in June, July, August, and September, 1919, and located at various points in said county, and that after the constructions of the vats the defendants filled them with a mixture of fluid, chemicals, and poison, and began calling upon and demanding that plaintiffs and all other citizens owning or controlling live stock in Henderson county, Tex., should immediately drive their stock to the vats and dip them into said mixture and poison, and threaten and stated that all who did not comply with said demand would be arrested, prosecuted, and fined for their failure or refusal so to do. That the vats are about 18 or 20 feet in length and from 3 to 5 feet wide, and constructed in excavation about 7 or 8 feet below the surface of the earth, with a narrow chute leading to one end of the vats, and through which chute the defendants compelled, and are still attempting to compel, plaintiffs and other citizens to drive their stock, and to cause them to jump or fall a distance of several feet into the vat with great force and violence.

"That on the account of the character, quality, and quantity of the fluids, chemicals, and poison placed and maintained in the vat by the defendants, and the manner employed by defendants in forcibly compelling plaintiffs and other citizens to drive their live stock into the vats, great damage has already been inflicted on plaintiffs and other citizens, and that unless the unauthorized and unlawful conduct of defendants is restrained by the court said defendants will continue to employ said means and methods in the future as they have in the past, and will continue in their demands to forcibly compel plaintiffs and other citizens to drive their stock into said vats, and that unless restrained the defendants will thus cause the plaintiffs and said other citizens to suffer irreparable injury. That the dipping of said stock was without their consent and contrary to their wishes, and was caused by the demands, notification, and threats of defendants.

"That the live stock so dipped were bruised, skinned, crippled, and injured because of the manner of the construction of said vats and chutes, and on account of forcing the animals to jump or fall into the same, and because of the quality and quantity of said liquid and poison in the vats.

"That the defendants so conducted said operation and work as to cause said live stock to swallow and inhale said poison, causing them to be almost strangled to death and rendering them weak, stiff, and sick; numerous cattle of plaintiffs and other citizens being thereby crippled and injured and some killed. The numerous and valuable milch cows were thereby crippled and killed.

"That many of said cows were so injured and poisoned they dried up in their milk to one-half of the quantity they had theretofore been giving, causing their bags and teats to be injured, in some instances causing the milk of the cows to be unnatural and bloodshot, wholly unfitting it for family use, also decreasing the amount of butter realized by plaintiffs in proportion to the decrease in milk. That plaintiffs were depending on their milch cows for all the milk and butter necessary for their family, and that the damage they have suffered in this particular is serious. That defendants not only brought about the dipping, but stated that they would accept no reason or excuse for a failure to comply with their demands.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that said live stock were healthy at the time of the forcible dipping, and did not have splenic fever, and did not have any other malignant, contagious, infectious, or communicable disease whatever, and were not affected with any agency or condition for the transmission of splenic fever, and did not have upon them any fever-producing ticks, and had not been exposed to said condition, all of which was well known to defendants, or could have been known to them had they used proper diligence. That before the defendants called dipping and injuries they had never inspected said stock, and had not found said live stock with splenic fever or fever-producing ticks, but nevertheless they insisted and persistently demanded that plaintiff and other citizens should drive their live stock into said vats of liquids and poison, and threatened that all who refuse or fail to do so would be reported by them to the constable or sheriff, and that the defendant and said officer would enter the premises of those who disobeyed, and then forcibly take and drive their live stock away from the control from such owners and then force such stock into said vats. Plaintiffs further show to the court that they are now being prosecuted in the county court of Henderson county, Tex., and being harassed in every way possible by the said defendants.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that the defendants claim and contend that the plaintiffs are amenable to the law, and are entitled to be prosecuted in the criminal court for failure to dip their live stock, even though they are free from disease and free from ticks.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that the defendants do not claim that said live stock had splenic fever, or that they had made an inspection or had found fever-producing ticks upon said cattle, but claimed and asserted that they had the power and authority to compel the dipping of cattle, horses, and mules in Henderson county, Tex., even though said live stock were in a perfectly healthy condition.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that they protested against the conduct of the defendants, and requested them to inspect the live stock of plaintiffs before requiring them to be dipped. But that defendants arbitrarily refused to comply with such reasonable request, and failed and refused to examine or make any inspection whatever, but proceeded to carry out the forcible dipping of live stock, although not a condition existed in law or fact that warranted forcible dipping. That the stock of some of the plaintiffs had been dipped once, and the stock of other plaintiffs had been dipped several times; and that defendants are demanding that all of said stock be dipped again, and as often in the future as defendants shall demand, and at least every two weeks; and that defendants have threatened that they in connection with the sheriff or constable will forcibly dip the stock or they will prosecute them in the criminal court who refuse to comply with said demands; and that unless restrained by the court the defendants will execute said threat, and that the defendants are now causing the plaintiffs to be arrested and prosecuted in the courts; and that in carrying out said forcible dipping they will cause the live stock of the plaintiffs and others to be injured, poisoned, crippled, and killed, to the great damage of the owners.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that at least 1,000 head of cattle, horses, and mules (principally cattle) have been damaged by said dipping in Henderson county. That the defendants are notifying plaintiffs and other citizens that all of their cattle, horses, and mules must be dipped in said vat, although said live stock are not affected with any disease or character whatever; that defendants have made no inspection of said animals, and if the demands and threats of defendants are carried out plaintiffs and each of them will suffer thousands of dollars of damage on account of the fact that their horses, cattle, mules, etc., will be injured, crippled, poisoned, and damaged. That the said defendants have caused an expense to Henderson county taxpayers a sum of money which amounts to more than $10,000 since the 1st of June, 1919.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that the said trespasses and wrongs were without authority of law, and that any statute attempting to authorize such invasion of personal rights would violate the Constitution of the state.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that two elections, or at least one, has been had in Henderson county, Tex., to determine whether live stock should be dipped, and said election or elections resulted against the enforcement of such a law in Henderson county. That by some sort of order passed by the commissioners' court of Henderson county, Tex., or some other body, said tick law has been put in operation in Henderson county, Tex., or rather a pretended operation of said cause has been put in operation in said Henderson county, Tex.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that the defendants have no right to disturb these plaintiffs. That the defendants are now demanding and insisting that plaintiffs and other citizens should submit their live stock to the dipping process again, and at frequent intervals in the future, and threatening that, if said demands are not complied with, all who refuse obedience will be arrested, prosecuted, and fined.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that the expense account will bankrupt the taxpayers of Henderson county, Tex., if the defendants are permitted to destroy the property of the plaintiffs and to continue to spend the funds of Henderson county as they have heretofore done.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that the voters of Henderson county voted twice, or at least one time, on the question of whether or not the county should adopt the provisions connected with the dipping law, that at each of said elections, and at least at the last election, said voters refused to adopt or to bring Henderson county within the terms of the statute governing the eradication of ticks. That in the face of the action of the voters the said law destroyed local self-government in this: It permits the law to become effective when the people vote against the same, and when said law is declined by the vote of the people. That by reason of this, the statute controlling the matter is invalid and void.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that the defendants have threatened, and are now threatening, that in the event the plaintiffs and said other citizens over Henderson county fail to comply with said demands and threats the defendants will then call out the peace officers, and in connection with the defendants forcibly enter the peaceable premises of plaintiffs and said other citizens, and take from their possession their milch cows and other live stock and drive them to said dipping vat, and then by force and without the consent of the owners of said live stock that they will dip said cows and live stock again and as often as they see proper, and the defendants have stated and represented to these petitioners and to said other citizens that unless such demands are complied with they will cause the plaintiffs and said other citizens to be reported and to be arrested and fined in the courts, and plaintiffs represent that unless the defendants are restrained they will enter the premises of plaintiffs and said other citizens in connection with some peace officer selected by them, and in connection with said peace officer that the defendants will drive said live stock to said dipping vat, and will cause them to jump, fall, and plunge into said poison, and will cause valuable live stock belonging to said plaintiffs and other citizens to be injured, damaged, and crippled in said vats, and will cause said live stock to inhale and swallow said poison, and will cause the milk of said milch cows to be decreased in quantity one-half, as aforesaid, and the loss of butter in proportion, and will cause valuable live stock of plaintiffs and other citizens to be made sick, stiff, and helpless, and will cause them to die, all to the great damage of petitioners and to said other citizens of Henderson county, Tex.

"Plaintiffs allege that said forcible dipping of the milch cows of the plaintiffs and said other citizens has decreased the amount of milk and butter they would have realized from them to the extent of one-half, and even more below the normal amount, and that this is a serious damage to them and to their families; and that in the forcible dipping of the milch cows of A. A. Darden, said cows were cut and injured and rendered sick and almost helpless. That a cow of the plaintiff Frank McLeon was killed, and that an unborn calf, belonging to the plaintiffs Coy Elledge and J. V. Hornsby was killed, and the cows rendered sick and stiff, and their bags and teats were torn, injured and poisoned, and one of his calves crippled. That the milch cows of the plaintiffs J. L. Guthrie and T. B. Elledge were injured, damaged, and made sick, and their bags and teats injured and torn, and were rendered so painful and swollen that he had to tie his milch cows in order to draw milk from them. J. K. Derden lost the breeding of two cows, and one lost her milk.

"That a cow of plaintiff Joe Parker was killed by said dipping and poison. That the cows of the plaintiff Ellis Williams were rendered sick and weak on account of said dipping and poison. J. P. McKey lost one yearling.

"That the cows of the plaintiff Sebe Tindel were injured and damaged; their bags and teats cracked, torn, and blistered. That they suffered so much pain from the inflictions of said injuries that he had to tie his cows in order to forcibly withdraw the milk from their bags.

"That all of the plaintiffs had cattle that lost in their milk and were damaged by reason of said dipping, and were seriously injured and rendered sick by said dipping and poisons, and their milk made bloodshot and unfit for use, and compelling the plaintiffs and their families to do without milk for a number of days, although they had been realizing enough theretofore for their own consumption, in addition to a sufficient amount to sell a number of castomers.

"That all of said cattle were practically dried up in their milk. That cattle of other citizens living in Henderson county were also dried up in their milk and injured, that are not plaintiffs herein. That there is attached hereto a list of cattle damaged and marked 'Exhibit A.'

"That the following parties did not submit their live stock to said forcible dipping in the said vats, because they say that they know that valuable cows and cattle of their neighbors and of numerous citizens over Henderson county had been seriously injured and damaged, and in many instances killed, and they say that their own live stock had not been inspected by any inspector, and that no condition existed in law and in fact that required them to submit to the injury or destruction of their property, and consequently they have escaped damages by reason of the fact that they have not complied with said unlawful demands. Brooks Rodgers had one horse killed; Roll McClur had one cow killed; Jim Barton one calf killed; Bill Foster had one cow killed.

"Plaintiffs charge and respectfully represent to the court that the defendants, emboldened by their past conduct and misled by a misconception of their official power and authority, are now actually notifying these plaintiffs and other citizens of Henderson county that all of their horses and mules and cattle must be dipped in said dipping vats in like manner with the cattle that have heretofore been dipped, and yet plaintiffs say that their horses and mules are in a healthy condition, and are not affected or suffering from any disease of any kind or character whatever, all of which is well known to the defendants, or could have been known by them had they used proper legal diligence. Said horses and mules are not infected with glanders or anthrax or any other disease, and yet, notwithstanding the fact that no condition exists either in law and in fact that would warrant the defendants in compelling the dipping of said horses and mules, yet they have made said demand without even an inspection or examination of any kind whatever.

"Plaintiffs say that if the defendants are permitted to carry out such unlawful threats and proposals that valuable mules and horses of these plaintiffs, and of hundreds of other law-abiding citizens of Henderson county will be forcibly driven to the said dipping vats and will be injured, damaged, and crippled, causing each of the plaintiffs and other citizens to suffer thousands of dollars of damage, as they have been made to suffer with respect to their cattle, the forcibly driving and dipping of the said cattle, horses, and mules into said vats would not only injure and cripple them, but would be practically useless afterwards for any purpose whatever.

"Plaintiffs respectfully represent to the court that the trespasses and injuries above described were without authority of law, and that there is no valid statute in this state that would warrant the infliction of such injuries, and that, even if the Legislature had attempted, or were to attempt, to authorize such invasion of personal rights, such a statute would be in violation of the Constitution of this state, and they here now allege that said injuries were inflicted, not only without a warrant of a law, but in violation thereof.

"Plaintiffs further show to the court that there is no such law in force in Henderson county, Tex., to-day, and has never been, that authorized or permitted the forcibly dipping of said live stock, or that authorized or permitted the infliction of said injuries. They here and now distinctly allege that the act of the Legislature under which the defendants claim to have action and to be acting now would not have justified such trespasses, injuries, and damage, even though it had been adopted in Henderson county, Tex., but the plaintiffs say that it has never been adopted by the voters of Henderson county, Tex., and has no application whatever with reference to the dipping of said cattle in said vats, or with reference to tick eradication under the supervision of local authorities.

"Plaintiffs represent the statute under which the defendants claim to be acting while making provisions for the payment of salaries of said inspectors, who are the defendants in this suit, plaintiffs are informed and believe, and upon said belief so represent the fact to be, that the defendants are receiving out of the funds of Henderson county, Tex., a salary each of $85 per month, except the defendant McManus, who is receiving a large salary out of the state government, yet said statute makes no provision for the payment of damages sustained by the citizen for his live stock injured or killed on account of said inspection, and on account of the forcible dipping of their live stock in the poisons placed in said vats by these defendants, and they are informed and believe, and upon such information and belief represent, that said inspectors are under no bond for the payment of the damages they inflict upon the citizens, and that no publication has been made officially in any newspaper of Henderson county, Tex., of any quarantine notice, quarantining the premises of any of these plaintiffs, or of said other citizens whom they represent. That there are a number of newspapers published in said Henderson county.

"Plaintiffs charge that said defendants are seeking to compel plaintiffs and many other citizens of Henderson county to submit to the dipping of their cattle, horses, and mules this week, and at frequent intervals in the future, and are threatening, in the event said demands are not complied with, to invade the premises of plaintiffs and said citizens and forcibly take away their milch cows and calves and their horses and mules and drive them to the said vats filled with said poisonous liquids immediately, and are threatening that unless the plaintiffs and other citizens comply with said demands that they will be arrested, prosecuted, and fined in the courts, and plaintiffs allege that unless the court restrains such unlawful trespass and wrong that said injuries will be inflicted, and plaintiffs and other citizens whom they represent will each be compelled to suffer thousands of dollars of damages in the next few weeks, and they now come representing themselves and said citizens upon the facts and allegations in this petition, and pray that this court issue its most gracious writ of injunction, restraining these defendants and all others from forcibly dipping or injuring their live stock (which are not affected with any fever, or fever-producing ticks), and restraining them and all others from invading the premises of plaintiffs for said unauthorized and unlawful purposes, and that the court grant such other and further relief in law and equity as the plaintiffs may show themselves entitled to.

"Premises considered, plaintiffs pray that the defendants be restrained from further interfering with these plaintiffs' live stock, and from serving notice on these plaintiffs to dip their live stock, and from filing complaints in the court against these plaintiffs for refusing to dip their said live stock or prosecuting them in the courts, and that the defendants be restrained from further interfering with these plaintiffs in any manner whatever, or with their said live stock; and that they be prohibited or enjoined from requiring these plaintiffs to dip their said live stock, or from testifying in the courts against these plaintiffs in connection with said cases, or from disturbing these plaintiffs in any manner in the court or out of the court or their live stock for general and special relief; and that the court authorize the district clerk of Henderson county to issue a writ or writs of injunction in connection with this plea; and that the sheriff of Henderson county be permitted to serve such writ of injunction, requiring the defendants to comply to the prayer herein made."

A general demurrer was leveled at said petition, and the same sustained by the court, to which plaintiffs excepted, and gave notice of appeal.

The first assignment of error is:

"The petition in this case shows that the plaintiffs' cattle were bruised, skinned, blistered, caused to decrease in milk, crippled, killed, and suffered other damages; and that they were dipped in vats that were not prepared properly; and that they were dipped in a solution that was poisonous, and that a great many of the cattle were free from the tick fever, ticks, and other diseases. The same being true, the court committed an error in sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiffs' petition and in dismissing the suit."

The proposition presented by plaintiffs under this assignment is:

"When the pleadings show a case, such as described in the plaintiffs' petition, it is the duty of the court to hear the testimony but in this instance the court, after hearing the petition read, sustained a general demurrer to the petition, plaintiffs declining to amend, the court dismissed the case."

There was no testimony presented to the court, so none was heard. The general demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiffs declining to amend, the case was dismissed.

The appellees have not furnished this court with a brief upholding the action of the trial court, and appellants have cited but one decision in point, which is Castleman v. Rainey, 211 S. W. 630. In that case the plaintiffs' petition was practically the same as the one here presented, and it was there held to be good against a general demurrer. Said case is here cited in support of our views in this case.

The judgment in this case is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, and the lower court is instructed to hear the testimony, and render judgment accordingly.

Reversed and remanded.

NATIONAL SURETY CO. v. ATASCOSA ICE, WATER & LIGHT CO. et al. (No. 6272.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. Nov. 26, 1919. On Motion for Rehearing, April 28, 1920. On Second Motion for Rehearing, May 19, 1920.)

1. Pleading \S 149—Bank sued by depositor for deposits misappropriated by cashier may join cashier's surety in cross-action.

In depositor's action against bank for deposits wrongfully abstracted and misappropriated by bank's cashier, it was proper for the bank by cross-action to join surety on cashier's bond and compel it to discharge the loss or damage; the depositor's right to recover against the bank and bank's right to recover over against surety involving the same facts and issues.

2. Parties \S 50—There is misjoinder of parties where no privity exists.

The courts will not allow a party to be brought in when the issue to be joined is on separate contracts in which there is no privity between the parties, and where to sustain the cause requires separate allegations; but where there is such a privity that no harm will result from keeping the parties together, and where no material or substantial change or other unnecessary burden is imposed, the parties will be held properly joined.

3. Parties \S 25 — Question of misjoinder largely discretionary.

When the plea of misjoinder of parties or question of proper parties is urged, a very large discretion is allowed the courts.

4. Principal and surety \S 161—Evidence held to sustain finding that cashier willfully misapplied and abstracted bank's moneys.

In depositor's action against bank for deposits alleged to have been misappropriated by bank's cashier, in which bank asked for judgment over against cashier's surety, evidence held to sustain finding that cashier wrongfully abstracted or willfully misapplied bank's moneys.

5. Principal and surety \S 79—Cashier "willfully misapplied or willfully abstracted" bank's money, though it was applied to use of other person.

Bank's cashier "willfully misapplied or willfully abstracted" bank's funds, within his bond, whether he used all the money for himself personally, or got it and willfully misapplied it in some other way, to the use of some other person.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Willfully Misapply.]

6. Appeal and error \S 724(2)—Court will not search record for errors to aid indistinct assignments.

While the Court of Civil Appeals is liberal in passing upon all assignments, it cannot search the pleadings, transcript, and statement of facts for supposed errors that are not distinctly disclosed in the assignment itself or propositions thereunder.

7. Principal and surety \S 167—Sureties may be impleaded or come in themselves for determination as to their liabilities.

Sureties may be impleaded in proper suits, or even come in themselves and have the question of their liability determined and fixed.

8. Principal and surety \S 161—Depositor suing for deposits misappropriated by cashier held not entitled to judgment against cashier's surety impleaded by bank.

In depositor's action against bank for deposits misappropriated by bank's cashier, in which bank impleaded cashier's surety with prayer for judgment over, depositor was not entitled to a judgment against the surety in absence of showing that bank was insolvent or could not meet its obligations by reason of any of the alleged wrongful acts of such cashier.

On Motion for Rehearing.

9. Principal and surety \S 159 — Cashier's surety held not liable for payment of draft on bank by cashier.

Payment of draft on bank by bank's cashier held not willful misapplication of the bank's funds within cashier's bond, in absence of affirmative showing that payment was without consent of his superior officers; the presumption being that payment was rightful.

10. Banks and banking \S 130—Bank not liable to depositor for amount charged against depositor's account, where depositor received the benefit.

In depositor's action against bank for deposits misappropriated by bank's cashier, who, having paid draft on bank, charged amount thereof against depositor's account without depositor's authority, bank could have avoided liability to depositor for such amount by proving that the depositor actually received the benefit of the payment.

Appeal from District Court, Atascosa County; Covey C. Thomas, Judge.

Suit by the Atascosa Ice, Water & Light Company against the Atascosa County State Bank, in which defendant filed answer, making National Surety Company a party and seeking judgment over against it. Judgment for plaintiff against both defendants and for defendant bank over against defendant Surety Company, and the latter appeals. Judgment for plaintiff affirmed as to bank, but reversed as to the Surety Company, and judgment for defendant bank against defendant Surety Company affirmed as reformed.

Black & Smedley, of Austin, for appellant.
Arnold & Cozby, of San Antonio, and James A. Walton, of Jourdan, for appellees.

COBBS, J. This suit was filed in the district court of Atascosa county, Tex., by the Atascosa Ice, Water & Light Company, originally against only the Atascosa County State Bank, plaintiff seeking to recover from said bank judgment for $7,182 alleged to have been deposited by it with said bank, and payment of which amount had been refused by said bank. The bank filed its answer, making the National Surety Company a party, and seeking judgment over against it for any amount that might be recovered against the bank by the plaintiff. Later the plaintiff amended its petition and made the National Surety Company a party.

Trial before the court, without a jury, resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Atascosa Ice, Water & Light Company, against both defendants for the sum of $7,036.30, with 6 per cent. interest thereon from date of said judgment, and in judgment in favor of the defendant Atascosa County State Bank over against the National Surety Company for so much of the judgment in favor of the plaintiff as said bank should have to pay.

The case went to trial on plaintiff's second amended original petition, in which the ice company sued both of the defendants, namely, the bank and the surety company. Plaintiff alleges that it had deposited a large sum of money in said bank, and that of said money the cashier of said bank, to wit, R. L. Witt, wrongfully abstracted and willfully misapplied $7,182 thereof, and the pleadings set up the manner in which said Witt accomplished this, namely, by executing checks and charges, wrongfully and without authority, and by taking the money himself. The petition alleges that said Witt was in complete control of the bank, and took advantage of his position to wrongfully abstract and misappropriate said money. The plaintiff's petition alleges that at the time this occurred, the surety company was bound by a bond or contract of indemnity to the extent of $10,000, and this contract of indemnity provided that the surety company would indemnify the bank or any person or persons that may be damaged by the said Witt willfully abstracting or wrongfully misapplying any money during the course of his employment with said bank, and the petition alleges that the said bond was for the benefit, not only of said bank, but also of the plaintiff and all other persons.

The defendant bank answered, and by way of cross-action averred that if in fact it was indebted to the plaintiff, Water & Light Company, in the amount claimed in said pleading, such indebtedness was by reason of the fact that the charges made by the defendant against the plaintiff, mentioned in said Exhibit D, attached to plaintiff's first amended original petition, were not authorized by the plaintiff, but were made by R. L. Witt wrongfully abstracting and willfully misapplying the moneys represented by the charges set forth in said Exhibit D, and that said R. L. Witt was the cashier of the defendant bank and in full charge and control of its business, and that if said charges were not authorized by plaintiff, then said R. L. Witt wrongfully abstracted and willfully misapplied the moneys represented in said charges, and wrongfully charged same to the plaintiff's account, and that, if defendant was liable to the plaintiff on the facts alleged in plaintiff's petition, said liability arose by reason of the acts of R. L. Witt in wrongfully abstracting and willfully misapplying the moneys belonging to the defendant and taking and charging same without authority to the account of plaintiff. Defendant further averred that during said year 1916, and at the time said alleged unauthorized charges were made, said R. L. Witt was under bond issued by the appellant surety company, and that by virtue of said bond the surety company had contracted and agreed that it would hold the appellee bank harmless against and pay to it such pecuniary loss as it may sustain of money or other valuables embezzled, wrongfully abstracted, or willfully misapplied by said R. L. Witt in the course of his employment by the defendant during the period of time that said bond was in full force and effect; and that said bond was in full force and effect upon the dates upon which the various charges referred to in Exhibit D appeared to have been made, and was in full force and effect upon the dates the said R. L. Witt wrongfully abstracted and willfully misapplied so much of the money as is referred to in Exhibit D of plaintiff's said first amended original petition, and the defendant appellee bank further alleged that it had notified the surety company of the claim that had been made upon it by the plaintiff, and that, if it was liable to the plaintiff as claimed in plaintiff's first amended original petition, then in such event the surety company was liable to it in the same amount, because if such liability existed, the same was due to the said R. L. Witt wrongfully abstracting and willfully misapplying the funds of the defendant bank, and wrongfully charging same to the plaintiff without authority. Defendant further averred that R. L. Witt was insolvent, and had departed for parts unknown to defendant, and for that reason was not made a party to the proceeding, and said defendant bank prayed that, in the event any judgment was rendered against it in favor of plaintiff, it might have judgment over against the National Surety Company for the same amount, by reason of the liability existing because of said bond, and for general and special relief.

Thereupon, on October 15, 1918, the surety company filed its plea in abatement and original answer to the cross-action filed in said proceeding against it by the bank. In this answer it set up, in substance, the following: (1) It pleaded in abatement of said cross-action, setting up a misjoinder of causes of action and of parties, as set out in assignments of error relating to the same; (2) a general demurrer; (3) certain special demurrers, raising in main the same issues of misjoinder of parties and of causes of action contained in said plea in abatement; (4) a general denial; (5) it averred a breach of the warranties contained in the application for said bond, the details of which are more fully set forth; (6) that if such bond was issued, it contained a provision with respect to the giving of the notice of loss under the bond, which was breached by the bank. It is not necessary to more fully set forth the substance of the allegations of this pleading.

The exceptions and pleas of all the parties were overruled.

The trial court filed the following:

"Findings of Facts and Conclusions of Law.

"1. The Atascosa County State Bank is indebted to the Atascosa Ice, Water & Light Company in the sum of $6,782, being the aggregate of all of the items set forth in Exhibit D of plaintiff's second amended original petition, except the item of $350 under date of March 25, 1916.

"2. The said sum of $6,782, which is owing to plaintiff by the Atascosa County State Bank, is owing by virtue of the fact that the plaintiff deposited with the Atascosa County State Bank $6,782 more money than the Atascosa County State Bank is willing to return to the plaintiff.

"3. During the year 1916, R. L. Witt wrongfully abstracted and willfully misapplied money to the extent of $6,782. The dates and the amounts of such money so willfully abstracted and wrongfully misapplied by R. L. Witt are those dates and amounts set forth in Exhibit D to plaintiff's second amended original petition, aggregating $6,782, and consisting of all of the items set forth in Exhibit D except the item of $350, under date of March 25, 1916.

"4. Said money so wrongfully abstracted and willfully misapplied by the said R. L. Witt was the money of the Atascosa County State Bank, and particularly that part of the money of the Atascosa County State Bank represented by the deposits of plaintiff, and the said money so wrongfully abstracted and willfully misapplied was charged by the said R. L. Witt to the account of the plaintiff, and the said R. L. Witt, in the carrying out of his designs to wrongfully abstract and willfully misapply said money, wrongfully and without authority executed and caused to be executed and paid, and caused to be paid out of the funds of said bank, and charged and caused to be charged against the deposits of the plaintiff, the checks and drafts and charges set forth in Exhibit D of plaintiff's second amended original petition, with the exception of the charge of $350 under date of March 25, 1916.

"5. The said R. L. Witt, at the time he so wrongfully abstracted and willfully misapplied said money and executed and caused to be executed said checks and drafts, and charged and caused same to be charged to the account of the plaintiff, was an employé and officer of the Atascosa County State Bank, in control and management of the business of said bank.

"6. At the time said money was so wrongfully abstracted and willfully misapplied there was in existence a valid bond constituting a contract of indemnity in the sum of $10,000, executed by the National Surety Company, and being the instrument introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, binding the National Surety Company to indemnify the bank, or any person or persons who may be damaged by the said R. L. Witt wrongfully abstracting or willfully misapplying any money in the course of his employment in said bank.

"7. By virtue of the wrongful abstracting and willful misapplication of the said money by the said Witt, and the execution of the said checks and drafts by the said Witt, and the wrongful charging of same to the accounts of the plaintiff by the said Witt, as hereinabove set forth, which was done in the course of the employment of said Witt in said bank, it has resulted in damages to the Atascosa County State Bank and to the plaintiff.

"8. The Atascosa County State Bank has not breached any of the terms or provisions of the contract of indemnity, and notified the National Surety Company of the claims made against it by the plaintiff as soon as knowledge of such claim was communicated by plaintiff to the Atascosa County State Bank, and notified the National Surety Company of the said wrongful abstracting and willful misapplication of said funds by the said R. L. Witt as soon as knowledge thereof was obtained by the Atascosa County State Bank.

"Conclusions of Law.

"1. I conclude that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment against the Atascosa County State Bank, and against the National Surety Company.

"2. I conclude that the loss represented by the judgment in this case is a loss covered by the contract of indemnity of the National Surety Company, and such loss should fall primarily on the National Surety Company, and secondarily on the Atascosa County State Bank; and that judgment should be rendered in favor of the plaintiff, against both defendants, with the provisions that the plaintiff should exhaust its remedy against the National Surety Company before seeking to collect the judgment against the bank.

"3. The Atascosa County State Bank is entitled to a judgment against the National Surety Company to indemnify and protect the Atascosa County State Bank from any loss by virtue of the wrongful abstraction and willful misapplication of the money by R. L. Witt."

The bank neither appeals nor files any brief.

The first six assignments practically raise the same questions on the several rulings of the court, to the effect "that the cause of action of the plaintiff against the bank and the alleged cause of action of the bank against this defendant are distinct and severable causes of action, the cause of this action alleged by plaintiff being simply a suit by a depositor against a bank to recover the amount of his deposit, while it appears that the suit of the bank against this defendant is based upon a bond, whereby this defendant is alleged to have guaranteed the bank against pecuniary loss of money or property embezzled, wrongfully abstracted, or willfully misappropriated by one of its officers, R. L. Witt, in the course of his employment, and because these are two distinct and separate causes of action, and cannot be properly joined in this suit, existed between different parties, provable by different facts, and because it further appear that there is no privity or community of liability between the defendants and the plaintiff."

[1] It is the contention of the appellee, being a creditor of the bank, that it was interested in the indemnity contract executed by the surety company, which not only bound itself to indemnify the bank, but also all others who sustained loss by the wrongful acts of Witt. Appellee claims the right to join in this action in its own behalf directly against both for the reasons stated. The right of appellee to recover against the bank and the bank's right to recover of appellant involves no additional facts or different issues, and it was proper for the bank to join appellant by cross-action, and to compel it to discharge the loss or damage. Farmers' Nat. Bank v. Merchants' Bank, 136 S. W. 1122; Skipwith v. Hurst, 94 Tex. 322, 60 S. W. 423; Harless v. Halle, 174 S. W. 1023; Kunz v. Ragsdale, 200 S. W. 269; Garrison v. Bowman, 183 S. W. 72; Kerbow v. Wooldridge, 184 S. W. 754; Phila. Underwriters v. Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co., 31 Tex. Civ. App. 104, 71 S. W. 419; Railway v. Grimes, 196 S. W. 693; O'Brien v. Gilliland, 79 Tex. 602, 15 S. W. 681; Paul v. Sweeney, 188 S. W. 527; Adams v. First Nat. Bank, 178 S. W. 996. And it has been held that suits on contracts and on torts growing out of precisely the same transaction, or so intimately connected as to require same proof to establish the complained of wrong, may, within the discretion of the court, be joined where no injury can be shown. Kerbow v. Wooldridge, 184 S. W. 747; Paul v. Sweeney, 188 S. W. 527; Holloway v. Blum, 60 Tex. 628.

[2] Of course, as contended by appellant, the courts will not allow a party to be brought in when the issue to be joined is on separate contracts in which there is no privity between the parties, and where to sustain the cause requires separate allegations, proofs, and issues. U. S. F. & Guaranty Co. v. Fosatti, 97 Tex. 497, 80 S. W. 74; Keel & Son v. Gribble-Carter Grain Co. et al., 143 S. W. 239; Young v. State Bank of Marshall, 54 Tex. Civ. App. 206, 117 S. W. 476; Zau v. Clark, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 525, 117 S. W. 893; Contlett v. U. S. Mortg. Co., 60 S. W. 817.

[3] In questions of practice when the plea of misjoinder of parties, or question of proper parties, is urged, a very large discretion is allowed the courts. We do not mean that such discretion is always allowed in any case, for there must be such a relation or privity that no harm will result from keeping the parties in court together for its ultimate determination, who will be affected by the judgment. When it is apparent no material or substantial change in the proof, or other unnecessary burden is imposed by it in the development of the issues necessary in the case, they will be held properly joined. In a sense, however, the question of parties is largely dependent upon its own peculiar facts and issues.

The surety company is bound to the bank to indemnify it against just such acts as those committed by Witt. The same facts that the bank was required to establish in order to recover against the surety company were established against it by appellee. To sustain the exceptions against the prayer of appellee would not, in the least, change the question of the surety company's liability under its indemnity. It would still be the bank's surety, to indemnify against this very loss and judgment.

To dismiss it from this suit would mean that the bank would be required to pay the judgment, and then institute another suit upon the same bond and recover upon precisely the same state of facts. This would be carrying the doctrine of misjoinder quite to the limit. It would be requiring a useless thing to be done, and this the courts will not do. In fact the presence of all the parties here was very proper in order to establish the facts in the case to fix the liability of the bank to appellee, and the presence of appellant to establish its liability to the bank predicated upon the same facts which alone fixed the liability. It is not a new question, and the case of U. S. F. & Guaranty Co. v. Fosatti, 97 Tex. 497, 80 S. W. 74, goes into a very full discussion of the subject of misjoinder. That case appellant seems largely to rely upon. The question presented in the Supreme Court was upon two certified questions: The first, to ascertain whether or not the record presented such a controversy between the parties as made it a removable cause to the federal court; the second was as to misjoinder of parties, and its answer rendered an answer to first unnecessary. That case does not in any way change the rule of law that a defendant may, in a proper case, bring in its surety, but in effect reaffirms that doctrine in the discussion of the case. In the Fosatti Case, different issues and different questions arose, which would require different proof. In that case the tax collector was not charged with dishonesty, and the bond indemnifying against loss by "any act of fraud or dishonesty amounting to larceny or embezzlement" is an issue in character different from the state's suit, for the loss might result from the loss of the money in many ways without dishonesty. Here the indemnity is different, and is made directly for the bank's benefit, and the liability of the surety company resulted as a matter of law from the establishment of the bank's demand by the production of the written indemnity.

Bear in mind also, in the Fosatti Case, the court is separating in the most technical way to determine whether there are severable controversies that could be tried separately to determine the removability of the case to the federal court.

The seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth assignments raise practically the same questions, and challenge the court's findings that there was evidence to support the recovery to the effect that Witt wrongfully abstracted or willfully misapplied moneys belonging to the bank, because it claims no loss was suffered by the bank, claiming the evidence showed the checks were executed and charged to the water company's account, and no evidence that Witt received the money and willfully misapplied or willfully abstracted same, within the meaning of the bond.

[4] On all these issues the court has found the facts against appellant, and such finding in our judgment is fully sustained by the evidence.

The bond, among other provisions, is as follows:

"* * * For the use and benefit of the bank or any person or persons who may be damaged by breach of the conditions herein set forth."

And the conditions of the above obligation are as follows:

"That, whereas, the said officer is in the service of the bank in the city of Jourdanton, county of Atascosa, Texas, holding the position of cashier: Now, if the above-bounden officer shall well and faithfully perform all the duties of his office or employment and if the company shall hold the bank harmless against, and pay to it such pecuniary loss as it may sustain of money or other valuable securities embezzled, wrongfully abstracted or willfully misapplied by said officer in the course of his employment as such and in the course of his employment in any other position in the bank to which he may be appointed, reappointed, elected or re-elected or temporarily assigned, then this obligation is void; otherwise to be and remain in force and effect. * * *

It is further recited in said bond:

"* * * It being the true intent and meaning of this bond that the company shall be responsible for any loss occasioned by or resulting from any act, as aforesaid, occurring within the period specified in this bond."

R. L. Witt was the chief officer of the bank and in full charge. It has only a bookkeeper, and the cashier, Witt, was bookkeeper and cashier, and managed and controlled all its affairs. The checks and false entries which constitute Witt's embezzlement were made from time to time by him and in his handwriting. They could not have been made by any other. He occupied there a most exalted position, and one of high honor and trust, affording excellent opportunity for his peccancy. Besides being the chief man in the bank, he was the main stockholder in appellee's company, whose moneys were deposited in this bank in his charge, so to speak. He drew checks against the bank at will without authority and for his own use and benefit, and charged many against appellee's account on the bank without authority, and manipulated the accounts so as to represent legitimate charges against appellee to deceive and mislead the officers who examined the bank's accounts from time to time. Appellee had large deposits in the bank, some of which funds Witt abstracted by checks drawn by himself without authority. Witt was speculating and in need of money. He drew something like $11,000 out of the bank as dividends to pay stockholders of appellee, presumably to get some money for himself, and to conceal the facts from the stockholders credited them on obligations they owed the bank, so they would not receive immediate knowledge of his unlawful acts. When Daughtrey, for the ice company, protested and told him he had no authority, he excused himself by saying he needed the money. A number of instances are shown wherein Witt drew his check against the bank, which was paid by the bank and charged by Witt to appellee. D. B. Daughtrey was secretary and treasurer of appellee company, was the custodian of its funds deposited with the bank. At the time these sums were being drawn out, the ice company was not doing any business, had left its money on deposit. While it was active in its business, Witt promptly furnished statements from the bank. Mr. Daughtrey testified as follows:

"The bunch of statements already introduced in evidence started about the 1st of March; I think I got them pretty regularly up to that time, but I did not get any after that time. I asked for the statements, but they did not give them to me. I asked Witt for the statements, and he said that he did not have them ready. I got after him about it 30 or 40 times. That was along in March. I tried to get the statements, but did not get them until about the fall of 1917. I went down to the bank, and inquired how much money we had in the bank. The statement as to the amount of money we had in the bank would not tally out with my book, and that is the reason I wanted the statements. It is hard to tell how much money we ordinarily kept on deposit, as it was more at times than at others, and I can't remember."

These acts go to show his concealment, and finally he absconded; was indicted in Frio county on various charges growing out of these transactions. He was bonded "to faithfully perform all the duties of his office or employment, * * * hold the bank harmless against, and pay to it such pecuniary loss as it may sustain of money * * * wrongfully abstracted or willfully misapplied," etc., and, further "shall be responsible for any loss occasioned by or resulting from any act as aforesaid." A case was made out against him, he did not perform his duties, did cause the bank pecuniary loss, wrongfully abstracted money, and misapplied money in the bank of its depositors, which direct loss was "occasioned by" his "acts." This is not a case where the bond simply provides to pay off any judgment that might be recovered, but the terms are such as to require it to discharge the loss as soon as discovered.

The remaining assignments that raise questions as to the errors claimed in the findings of the court, that there was no evidence that the bank lost the money represented by the checks, or that Witt received the money and willfully misapplied or willfully abstracted it, within the meaning of the bond, have really been discussed in the foregoing.

[6] The findings of the court were sustained by the evidence which showed Witt did not perform his duty, but by his own conduct caused the pecuniary loss to this bank, and by wrongful means and methods adopted by him willfully misapplied the funds of the bank which caused its loss. Under the terms of that bond, it makes no difference whether he used all the money for himself personally, or got it and willfully misapplied it in some other way to the use of some other person, it would be "willfully misapplied or willfully abstracted within the meaning of the bond" in obtaining it in the manner he did.

The eighteenth assignment challenges the item of $1,300 included in the judgment evidenced by draft drawn by Carlos Bee against the bank and charged against the account of appellee by Witt. The evidence showed that the draft was drawn by Carlos Bee, dated at San Antonio, Tex., June 2, 1916, and is payable to the order of the State National Bank, in the sum of $1,300, drawn on the "Atascosa County State Bank, Jourdanton, Texas." Across the face of the draft appears the following: "Ch. to Waterworks a/c"—and the draft was indorsed on the back by Carlos Bee as well as the State National Bank of San Antonio. The draft did not bear any indorsement or stamp showing that it had ever been paid by the Atascosa County State Bank. It was not drawn on the Atascosa Ice, Water & Light Company, but was drawn on the bank itself. It purports on its face, therefore, to be an obligation of the bank, at least when accepted and paid by the bank. Mr. Daughtrey also testified as follows, with respect to this item:

"It is true that we had made a conditional sale of the property of the Waterworks Company to parties in San Antonio."

Being asked if it was not a further fact that the party in San Antonio had paid $2,000 on that conditional trade, witness said he heard it was a fact, but did not know it of his own knowledge.

"I do not know that it is a fact that Carlos Bee, who represented that party, accepted $1,300 of that money as compromise, rather than a suit, although I heard of such a transaction, and our company was connected with it. It seems that Witt made a kind of sale of the waterworks unauthorized by the directors. What I mean by that is he accepted $2,000 as bonus for the sale of the plant. Made a trade to buy out the plant, by which he paid $2,000 down. If we accepted the trade, that money was to go to all of us, and we accepted it. I do not know why Carlos Bee was drawing that fee of $1,300; never heard anything about it, had no communication with Mr. Bee about it. The company had no communication with Mr. Bee about it that I know of. Don't know whether the company did or not. I do not testify as a matter of fact that the company did not agree to pay him $1,300 compromise, and the return of that bond."

Mr. Daughtrey also testified:

"On the draft of Carlos Bee is a notation in pencil reading: 'Charge to waterworks account.' That is written across the face of the check in Witt's handwriting. I didn't authorize anybody to charge that to the waterworks account."

This is all the evidence, of every character, referring to this $1,300 draft, which was included in the court's judgment.

Defendant presented to the trial court a special request for additional findings of fact with respect to this $1,300 item, and asked the court to find that there was no evidence showing that this draft was actually paid by the Atascosa County State Bank, and that there was no evidence that said bank lost or paid out any sum of money on account of said draft, or was there any evidence showing who, if any one, received the amount of money represented by said draft, but this request was refused by the court, to which defendant excepted.

Whether this was a proper charge against the bank or against the ice company is not material to consider, as Witt who handled the affairs of the bank was so connected and identified with the transactions as to know the bank did not owe it, and knew that it was a transaction in which he was engaged in attempting to sell the ice plant. It was his clear duty, either to have turned down this draft or have called on the ice company to pay it. When he made the indorsement, "Charge to the waterworks account," it was as though he had checked out that sum, as in the other cases, and the presumption arises by the possession of the Bee draft that he caused the bank to pay it, took the bank's money knowingly, willfully, and unlawfully, and paid this draft with it when he knew the bank did not owe it, and caused that loss in such way as to come within the terms of that bond. The bond stood for the use and benefit of any one damaged by the breach for the amount of any balance found due, and promised to pay any pecuniary loss of money, wrongfully abstracted or willfully misapplied by said officer in the course of his employment, it being responsible "for any loss occasioned by or resulting from any act, as aforesaid, occurring within the period specified in this bond." It was conceded, so far as Bee is concerned, his acts were entirely proper, and there is enough to show he had a claim against some of the parties, and some one evidently authorized him to draw, presumably Witt, and there is no issue here for us to determine in that respect. There is no proof or intimation that the bank owed it.

In the twentieth assignment appellants challenge the ruling of the court in including in the judgment the item included in a check for $3,000, dated March 25, 1916, payable to the order of R. L. Witt upon the ground there was no evidence showing the bank ever paid it. The check is as follows:

Jourdanton, Texas, 3/25, 1916. No. ———.

"Atascosa County State Bank

"Pay to the order of R. L. Witt a/c $3,000.00 three thousand dollars.

2,215 L. H. Ernst Atas. I. W. & Light Co.
785 R. L. Witt

$3,000.00"

The check was payable to the order of R. L. Witt, and bore no indorsement, and was not stamped "Paid." With respect to this check, Mr. Daughtrey testified:

"Regarding the check for $3,000 dated March 25, 1916, payable to R. L. Witt, apparently signed by the Atascosa Ice, Water & Light Company, will say that I didn't execute this check, and did not authorize any one to execute it. The check is in the handwriting of Witt."

He also testified that he was familiar with Witt's handwriting, and that he did not know of any one that had authorized the execution of the check, and had never been present at any meeting of the board of directors that authorized its execution. Again, he testified with respect to this check:

"As to whether the check for $3,000 payable to the order of R. L. Witt has ever been stamped 'Paid' by anybody, will say I don't see any stamp on it. That check came in with my statement. Our checks are usually stamped 'Paid' when they are paid, and this one, so far as it shows on its face, has never been paid at all."

Daughtrey further testified:

"Regarding the check for $3,000 dated March 25, 1916, payable to R. L. Witt, apparently signed by the Atascosa Ice, Water & Light Company, would say that I did not execute that check, and did not authorize any one to execute it. The check is in the handwriting of Witt. I have seen Witt's handwriting from time to time, and am familiar with his signature, and recognize that as being Witt's handwriting on that check. I do not know of any one who ever authorized the execution of that check, and I was never present at any meeting of the directors that authorized its execution."

It is contended that the check was forged by Witt, as he was not authorized to draw checks in name of appellee. The entire instrument, signature, and marginal memorandum, shows presumably its disposition in paying $2,215.00 to L. H. Ernst and retaining $785 for himself.

"This check was forged by Mr. Witt, and was charged to the account of the ice company by Mr. Witt, and the bank's books show that it was paid out by the bank and charged to the ice company, as is shown by the bank's statement to the ice company, and this particular check was attached to the ice company's statement, as is shown in Daughtrey's testimony. * * * The check was payable to Mr. Witt and cashed by him because it was charged against the account of the ice company on the books of the bank, and therefore by this transaction the money belonging to the ice company to the extent of $3,000 passed into the control of Mr. Witt, and to represent which he charged the ice company with this check, and attached this check to the ice company's statement."

What Mr. Witt did with this money is not shown, except the possible inference that might be gained by looking at the notation on the corner of the check. It is immaterial what he did with the money. The fact remains that the money was paid by him and charged to the ice company's account by reason of this forged instrument. From these facts, in view of the other facts which we have set forth above, the court was well warranted in concluding that this $3,000 item "constituted a wrongful abstracting and misapplying of that much money belonging to the bank, and particularly that part of the bank's funds which represented the deposit of the ice company."

All the assignments challenging the rulings of the court in respect to the items paid out of the bank by Witt, going to make up the court's judgment, claiming it was without evidence to support it, involve practically the same facts and issues already discussed, and all may be disposed of together.

Mr. Daughtrey testified Witt was not authorized to charge against the Atascosa Light & Water Company any of the items, and never received any benefits from these expenditures. The item of $832 was a check, payable to cash, in Witt's handwriting and cashed by the bank; the check of $100, also in Witt's handwriting, payable to Witt, October 19, 1916, cashed by the bank; check, $50, also in Witt's handwriting, payable to Witt, dated April 25, 1916, cashed by the bank, and the item of $150 was to pay one of his personal debts. All these items were charged by Witt against appellee, and rendered to it in a statement afterwards, showing them charged against its account.

The twenty-first assignment is challenging the ruling that R. L. Witt did not have authority, express or implied, to sign these checks. It is overruled because it is satisfactorily shown he had no such authority. He was not an officer in the ice company, had no authority to bind that company, and there is no such act done, knowledge acquired, or benefits received by that company, from which any waiver is shown or inference of authority may be drawn or indulged in to estop it, but per contra.

[6] The twenty-second assignment claims the court erred in holding the bank had not breached the terms and provisions of the contract of indemnity. Neither the assignment nor the propositions thereunder point out in what particular the breach arises, and we cannot speculate as to what they are. At any rate the court found from the evidence there was no breach of the obligations of the bank, and we see no reason to disturb that finding. While this court is liberal in passing upon all assignments, it cannot search the pleadings, transcript, and statement of facts for supposed errors that are not distinctly disclosed in the assignment itself or propositions thereunder. However, from a careful examination of the assignments and the testimony, we believe the court is sustained in all the findings of facts.

[7] We will now return to a consideration of the seventeenth assignment, which we passed for a discussion of the other assignments germane to each other. Sureties, as seen, may be impleaded in proper suits, or even come in themselves and have the question of their liability determined and fixed. Illies v. Fitzgerald, 11 Tex. 417; U. S. Guaranty Co. v. Fosatti, 97 Tex. 497, 80 S. W. 74; Cabell v. Hamilton Shoe Co., 81 Tex. 104, 16 S. W. 811; Stevens v. Wolf, 77 Tex. 215, 14 S. W. 29; Railway v. Yale, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 10, 65 S. W. 57 (affirmed 95 Tex. 683, 66 S. W. xvi).

[8] While we are of the opinion there was no error in permitting the joinder of the cause of action asserted by the bank in its cross-action against the surety company, at least there was no abuse of discretion, as no possible harm could result therefrom, yet we do not believe the appellee the waterworks company alleged or proved a cause of action against the appellant, the surety company, entitling it to hold appellant in this suit for any recovery against it, for it is not alleged, claimed, or shown that the bank is insolvent and rendered unable to respond and pay its said obligation by reason of any of the alleged wrongful acts of Witt resulting in the insolvency of and inability of the bank to pay its said obligation.

The misapplication or abstraction of the money of the bank would not affect appellee's right to recover from the bank unless, as stated, it rendered the bank unable to pay. In such case it might be held that the acts of Witt caused loss to the depositor; but here, as stated, there is no pleading or evidence to that effect. Therefore this assignment is sustained.

The judgment in favor of the waterwork's company, appellee, against the surety company, appellant, is reversed, and judgment rendered, dismissing the suit of the waterworks company against the surety company. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

Reversed and rendered in part and affirmed in part.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[9] We are not satisfied with our ruling in respect to the item of $1,300 discussed by us, presented in the eighteenth assignment. The bank offered no evidence that it did not owe it. Witt was in charge of the affairs of the bank, daily paying out money drawn against it in the regular course of its business, and, so paying out the funds of the bank, the fact of paying this check for $1,300, drawn against the bank, carries with it no particular significance, more than if he had paid it to any other customer of the bank on a similar check or draft. It is not the fact that the bank paid this check that is important at all, but rather the character of its payment. Witt was paying them all, daily, as presented in the ordinary course of business. He was in charge of its affairs. No one, therefore, can contend under the circumstances such a payment of a check drawn on the bank constituted of itself a wrongful abstraction or willful misapplication of its funds. It requires more proof than that. It must be shown affirmatively the payment was wrongful under such circumstances as to constitute willful misapplication of the bank's funds.

[10] None of the directors of the bank explained it; none contended that the payment was wrongful. The drawer of the draft, Mr. Bee, did not testify. It does not look as though the case had been fully developed on the point. It may be that the board of directors, with full knowledge of all the facts, consented to the payment. We cannot speculate on the matter, as the record is utterly silent as to whether the payment was rightful or wrongful, but in the absence of sufficient proof on the subject it must be assumed rightful, because the burden of proof was on the bank to show it was wrongfully paid out. The plaintiff company made out a case against the bank for the recovery of said item of $1,300 by showing that a draft on the bank was charged to its account without its authority. The bank might have avoided the effect of such proof by showing, if it could, that the plaintiff company actually got the benefit of the payment of $1,300 made by the bank, but we do not find the evidence to be sufficient to establish such to be the fact, nor has the bank appealed and complained of a failure to so find. In order, however, for the bank to recover against the surety company, it must show that the payment of the draft was not authorized by the directors, and the fact that it was charged without authority to plaintiff company raises no inference that the payment of the draft was unauthorized. Witt did not get the money, and, to show that he breached the conditions of his bond as to this item, it is necessary for the bank to affirmatively show that Witt paid the draft without the consent of his superior officers in the bank.

As the plaintiff stated no cause of action against the surety company, it is evident that error committed in trying the cause of action alleged by the bank against the surety company cannot affect the judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the bank. The judgment formerly entered by us will therefore only be changed to the extent that the judgment affirming the recovery of the bank against the surety company will be set aside, and the judgment of the trial court in favor of the bank against the surety company will be reversed, and the cause, as between said two parties, remanded for another trial.

On Second Motion for Rehearing.

The Atascosa County State Bank, filing its motion for rehearing, says, while it contends the facts are sufficient to justify the conclusion that the item of $1,300 should be recovered from the surety company, in case this motion is not granted, it does "hereby remit and tender a remittitur of $1,300 of the judgment rendered in its favor by the trial court against the National Surety Company, and does respectfully pray that such remittitur be allowed and accepted, and by virtue thereof the judgment of the trial court in favor of the bank against the surety company be reformed and rendered, and judgment to stand for the amount allowed the bank against the surety company by the trial court, less said item of $1,300."

The motion for rehearing is overruled, but, pursuant to the offer to remit in case such motion is overruled, our judgment reversing the judgment obtained by the bank against the surety company is set aside, and judgment entered reforming the trial court's judgment against the surety company by reducing the same from $7,036.30 to $5,736.30, and, as thus reformed, such judgment will be affirmed.

BROWN v. MUSGRAVE. (No. 1613.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo. May 28, 1920.)

1. Estoppel §63 — Assertion of one ground for refusing to carry out broker's contract of sale does not preclude reliance on another.

Where a landowner who had listed his property with a broker for sale declined to carry out broker's contract for sale made after discovery of oil on adjoining property, the fact that landowner assigned, as one reason for refusing to carry out the contract, that another broker had previously contracted to sell the premises and that he had procured a release, will not estop him from defending a suit for specific performance on the ground that the purchaser colluded to defraud him, and judgment for the landowner will not be reversed on the ground that, having stated in a deposition that the prior sale was one ground for refusing to carry out the agreement, the landowner cannot rely on others.

2. Trial §357—Answers to special question held responsive.

In an action for specific performance of a contract to convey land, executed by a broker with whom the property was listed for sale, the jury's answer to the question as to whether the owner listed the property that the owner did list land for sale, subject to his approval, held responsive to the issue; the jury being admonished to answer as the facts might be.

3. Specific performance §121(8)—Evidence held to show that land had increased in value when broker contracted to sell.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract to convey land, made by a broker with whom the land was listed for sale, defended on ground of agent's collusion, evidence held to warrant findings that at the time the broker executed the contract the land had greatly increased in value, because oil had been discovered on adjacent property, and that the broker knew of the increase.

4. Specific performance §121(8) — Finding that owner did not know of producing well on adjacent property warranted.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract to convey land, made by broker with whom land was listed for sale, finding that the owner did not know there was a large producing well on adjacent land warranted.

5. Specific performance §123—Special finding not open to attack as inconsistent with another finding.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract to convey land which had greatly enhanced in value because of the discovery of oil on adjacent property, the jury's finding that the vendor did not know there was a producing well on adjacent land held not open to attack, because it was also found he knew there was a derrick, etc., on the adjacent property.

6. Specific performance §121(8)—Evidence held to warrant finding that purchaser and broker colluded to defraud owner.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract to convey land, entered into by the vendor's broker, evidence held to warrant finding that the broker and purchaser colluded to defraud the vendor, who was ignorant, when the contract was made, that oil had been struck on adjacent property.

7. Brokers §19—Broker must disclose to his principal all facts relating to the value of principal's property.

It is the duty of a real estate broker to disclose to his principal the facts as to the value of the principal's property, and it is a breach of duty for broker to conceal from principal fact that oil had been struck on adjacent premises, which would greatly increase the value of the principal's property.

8. Specific performance §53—Purchaser cannot take advantage of real estate broker's fraud and have specific performance.

Purchaser cannot take advantage of broker's fraud on his principal and secure specific performance of a contract to convey land made by the broker.

9. Specific performance §53—Contract secured by sharp practices will not be enforced.

Specific performance of a contract to convey land secured by sharp practices or trickery will not be granted.

Appeal from District Court, Wichita County; Edgar Scurry, Judge.

Action by W. J. Brown against G. W. Musgrave. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Chauncey, of Wichita Falls, and Miller & Miller, of Ft. Worth, for appellant.

Martin, Bullington, Boone & Humphrey and Martin & Oneal, all of Wichita Falls, for appellee.

HUFF, C. J. The appellant, Brown, sued Musgrave to specifically perform a contract to convey $13\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land, situated in Wichita county, near Burkburnett, and close to land on which the Fowler well No. 1 was brought in. It is alleged, substantially, that Musgrave listed the land with J. S. Nichols, a member of the firm of Jackson & Nichols, being in a general real estate and brokerage business in the city of Wichita Falls; that Nichols was, and the partnership were, authorized to sell the land at and for the sum and price of \$3,000 for the whole of the land or for \$2,000 for $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres thereof; that it was implied thereby if the whole of the land should be sold \$3,000 should be paid by the defendant upon his execution and tender of a proper warranty deed conveying the land to the purchaser, and thereby Nichols became and was by the defendant legally authorized to enter into a binding contract of sale of the land in the name of appellee; that on the 25th day of July, 1918, Nichols, so authorized, negotiated a sale of it to the appellant at and for the sum and price of \$3,000; that the appellee, through his agent, Nichols, entered into a written contract with appellant for the sale of the land, by the terms of which appellee agreed to sell and convey to appellant, by good and sufficient warranty deed, the land, and to furnish a complete abstract of title to the land within a reasonable time, not later than 20 days from the date of the contract, July 25, 1918. The appellant agreed to report in writing his objections to the defects in the title, if any, within — days thereafter, which means a reasonable time from the furnishing of the abstract, and it was provided appellee should have a reasonable time to cure the defects and objections, and if not urged within the time should be deemed waived. Appellant bound himself to pay \$3,000 cash, which was to be paid and the papers delivered at the office of the First National Bank of Wichita Falls, Tex.; that the contract should be consummated and all things done and performed on the part of each party on or before the 15th day of August, 1918; that to insure the faithful performance of the contract appellant deposited with said bank the sum of \$500, with the understanding that, if the title of said land should prove to be good and appellant complied with his part of the contract, the money should be applied as part of the cash payment for the land, but if appellant should fail or refuse to comply with his part of the agreement, if the title to the land proved good, the sum paid to the bank should be forfeited to defendant as liquidated damages; that the contract was made upon condition that the title to the land should be good and marketable, and in case there was an incurable defect the contract was to be null and void and the money deposited returned to appellant and the whole agreement canceled. It is alleged the appellant offered to comply and that he was ready, willing, and able to comply with his contract; that the appellee failed and refused to comply therewith. It is alleged the title is good and appellee is able to make a good title. The value of the land is alleged to be \$50,000. The prayer is for specific performance and, in case the land or any portion could not be conveyed, then for damages.

The appellee alleged that the broker had no authority, either verbal or in writing, to execute the contract declared on in the name of the appellee; that the extent of his authority was to exercise the usual and customary services of the broker, which was to find a purchaser and submit the proposition of the purchaser to the appellee. It is also urged, in effect, that between the listing of the land with the agent and the purported contract, an oil well, known as the Fowler well No. 1, was brought in, which proved to be a large producer, and which immediately advanced the market value of appellee's land, which was adjoining the land on which the Fowler well was situated; that Nichols, the agent, knew this fact, but did not report the changed condition to appellee, who was then in Oklahoma, but, on the contrary, Nichols acted as if he were the agent of the appellant; that appellant knew of such well, but, colluding with the agent, secured the contract, and with intent to defraud appellee made the contract declared upon, setting out in detail some of the facts or badges of fraud on the part of appellant and the agent. By supplemental petition it is alleged that the reason given for refusing to keep and perform the contract was that another agent, F. M. Tollett, had sold the land to another purchaser prior to the time Nichols sold the same to appellant; thereby appellee is estopped to set up any other or further defense.

The findings of the jury in effect established that appellee listed the land with Nichols to sell subject to the appellee's approval; that at the time of making the contract Nichols knew the Fowler well was an oil well; that there was a material advance above $3,000, at which the land was listed, in the market value of the land from the price it was listed to the time the contract sued upon was made, and that Nichols knew of such advance when the contract was made; that a man of ordinary prudence, with land so listed with him as agent, would have notified his principal before making such contract; that appellee had no knowledge or information about the Fowler well on the morning he left Texas; that this information was such that it would not put him upon inquiry as to the condition of the well at that time; that when appellee paid $150 commission to Nichols he then knew that Nichols had executed the contract with appellant; that the land was of a greater market value on July 25, 1918, than $3,000; that on July 22, 1918, the land was not of the value of $3,000 for any other purpose than its value as prospective oil lands; that it was listed and its value placed by appellee at the time of listing on account of its being prospective oil land; that appellee's reason for not carrying out the contract was because there was an advance in the land and a prospective advance; that appellant and Nichols colluded together and with each other in the making of the contract to bind the appellee on a contract of sale and at a less price than the appellee could have sold it for at the time.

[1] The first assignment asserts that there was error in refusing a peremptory instruction for appellant for the reason that the testimony of appellee and Nichols showed that on January 22, 1918, appellee listed the land with Nichols for sale at $3,000, which was sufficient authority to the agent to enter into a contract at that price, and without controversy the evidence shows the agent executed the written contract sued upon; that it was breached without cause, which entitled appellants to specific performance. The propositions under this assignment may properly be treated, in so far as necessary to dispose of the case, under other assignments, except the third proposition, which is to the effect when a party gives a reason for his conduct as to anything involved in controversy he cannot, after litigation begun, change and put his conduct upon another ground. The appellee assails this proposition as not being relevant to the assignment or included therein, and asserts that the trial court was not put upon notice by motion for new trial that the appellant was relying upon the estoppel for an instructed verdict. It is very doubtful whether the assignment will admit the consideration of the proposition. However, we think the testimony is not conclusive that appellee asserted at the time he refused to carry out the contract, as his only ground therefor, that the land was sold by another agent. The appellant quotes appellee as testifying:

"My excuse for not desiring to close up this deal, Mr. Tollett sold it first; that is, he found a purchaser for it and I paid Tollett $80 and he released it back to me. Both of them, Tollett, Mr. Lipscomb, and I, believed that I had a right to buy my own land back."

This excerpt is taken from the ex parte deposition of the appellee, given November 23, 1918. Suit was then pending and was filed August 9, 1918. The breach was alleged to have occurred July 29, 1918. In this deposition the appellee was asked if it was not a fact that his only reason for refusing to make a deed was that oil was struck on land near his tract and he answered: "I guess so. Tollett sold it first and he released me." He also answered if no oil had been struck he would have sold the land for $3,000, but that if oil had not been struck he could not have sold it to appellant; that he had offered it to appellant some time in May and he would not buy it at any price. Nichols testified that on July 29, the first time appellant visited him after the contract, he stated if an oil well had not come in that he would have accepted Nichols' proposition. The facts generally show that appellee declined to make the deed because the fact of an oil well having been brought in was concealed from him by appellant and the agent until after the contract. The assertions of the bringing in of the oil well and that another agent had purported to convey the land were not so inconsistent as to preclude both as grounds for refusing to convey the land, or to estop the appellee to rely upon the fraud and deceit in making the sale. The appellant could not have been injured by the assertion that the two reasons existed and were asserted as reasons for not completing the sale. It is not shown that appellant would have acted differently or could have remedied the complaint made as to deceit, and the breach of trust reposed in the agent. Barnett v. Kemp, 258 Mo. 139, 167 S. W. 551, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1185; Hutchings v. Binford, 206 S. W. 557; Ault v. Dustin, 100 Tenn. 366, 45 S. W. 984.

[2] The second and third assignments are to the effect that the answer to the first special issue is not responsive and fails to answer directly the special issue as the issue was submitted. The proposition under these two assignments is that a verdict not responsive to an issue will not support a judgment. The issue submitted is:

"Did, or not, the defendant, G. W. Musgrave, list the land in controversy with J. S. Nichols for sale, or did he list it with Nichols for the purpose of having Nichols find a purchaser? Answer as you find the facts to be."

The jury answered:

"He, Musgrave, listed it for sale, subject to his approval."

The assignment is, not that the pleadings and evidence do not support the finding, but that the finding of the jury is not responsive to the issue. The appellant, by his statement, seems to contend the pleadings and evidence are not sufficient. The pleadings presented the issue submitted, and there is some evidence by the appellee that he did not authorize the execution of the contract as made, and that the appellee had sold land in that country by agents and they always asked him about the land before the contract was put up; and he also testified that he told Nichols as quick as he got a buyer to let him know. It also seems that the agent wired to appellee he had made the sale, and that the appellee wired in reply to hold the trade open, inferably until he could get there. We have not tried to determine definitely whether the evidence was sufficient to support the answer of the jury to the issue. The question upon which we are called to determine is, was the answer responsive to the issue? The first part of the issue is, Did, or not, the appellee list the land with the agent for sale? And the jury were admonished by the court to answer as they found the facts to be. We are inclined to think the answer is responsive to this issue under the admonition; that is, appellee listed it for sale, subject to his approval. If they found the fact to be that the authority to sell was subject to approval, they could not comply with the request of the court to answer as they found the facts to be by leaving off the latter part of their answer. They evidently understood they should give the right to make the sale as the facts showed that authority to be, and that they were justified in attaching the limitation to the power to sell. However, this would not prevent the rendition of a judgment if the other issues established fraud and collusion.

[3] The fourth, fifth, ninth, and tenth assignments assert that the findings of the jury in answer to issues Nos. 8 and 10, both of which were answered in the affirmative, are without evidence to support them. No. 3 is:

"Was there, or not, a material advance above $3,000 at which the land was listed in the market value of the land in controversy from the time same was listed with J. S. Nichols and the time the contract sued upon was made?"

No. 10 is:

"Was, or not, the land in controversy of greater market value than $3,000 on July 25, at the time of the execution of the contract in controversy?"

These assignments also assail the finding that Nichols knew at the time of the execution of the contract that the market value of the land was greater than $3,000. It is asserted that there is no evidence to support such findings. We are inclined to think there is. The evidence shows that the land was listed about July 22, 1918, and between that date and July 25, 1918, the Fowler well came in as a large producer. One witness testified before July 24 leases out there had practically no value; that on July 24 leases between the Musgrave land and the Fowler land were selling at $1,000 an acre. Another witness, who appears to have been a dealer in oil lands, testified:

"If July is the proper date the royalty value would be to the lease value as two is to three. That is the basis upon which oil men figure these values. The surface of the land, if there is production on it, would not be worth anything at all."

He further testified:

"Leases out there went up in value, commencing on the morning of the 24th, and they quadrupled in value before noon and keep going—everybody was crazy as they are now."

At the time of leasing the land and at the time of the contract the appellee had leased the land for one-eighth royalty, and, as we understand, the lease was then in effect. The facts, we think, warranted the jury in finding that Nichols knew, or should have known, of the advance in the price of the land when he contracted to sell to appellant. His office was in the very center of oil dealers and brokers in the city of Wichita, and the appellant admits that Nichols said something about the oil well and the excitement around the well before the contract was signed. The Wichita daily papers July 24 announced a big oil well on the Fowler farm. Nichols testified he did not think that he was under obligations to notify appellee of any increase of value by reason of the discovery of oil. There are several circumstances pointing to Nichols' knowledge of the condition of the well and of the increased value of the land. These assignments will be overruled.

[4, 5] The seventh and eighth assignments assail the findings of the jury to the effect that appellee did not know the Fowler well was producing before he left Texas for Oklahoma on the 23d of July. The facts are sufficient to support the verdict. Certain acts and the appellee's knowledge that there was a derrick on the Fowler land and that he had passed near it are relied upon by appellee as rebutting the finding of the jury. We think these matters only went to the weight of the appellee's testimony, all of which were for the jury. The jury's findings are criticized for having found that appellee had no "knowledge or information about the Fowler well." It is asserted that appellee admitted he knew the well was being drilled on the land. The jury evidently understood the issue as an inquiry if appellee knew the well was then an oil well. The next issue answered by the jury shows that to have been their understanding; that is, if his knowledge and information were such as to put him upon inquiry as to the "condition of the well." It would be technical in the extreme to hold the jury intended to find that appellee did not know of the derrick, or that there was being put down a well on the Fowler land. It is manifest they understood the issue to mean an oil well—a producer.

[8-9] The eleventh assignment assails the finding of the jury that appellant and Nichols colluded together and with each other in the making of a contract to bind the appellee on a contract to sell the land at a less price than the appellee could have sold it for at the time. The facts in this case make it certain that appellant knew the well was a large producer when he made the contract. Before that time appellee had tried to sell the land to appellant, who would not consider the proposition. On July 24 appellant sent a telegram to the appellee that he had sold his place and wanted to buy the land for a home. The evidence is sufficient to show it was not valuable as a home with parties drilling for oil. The jury, we think, had ample evidence to find that this telegram was sent after he had talked to Nichols. He finally admitted that it looked like he did not want appellee to know that he was buying the land because of the oil excitement. We think the evidence amply warranted the jury in finding that Nichols knew appellant was purchasing because of the oil discovery and that he was assisting him in getting the land; that there were several parties, in addition to appellant, wanting the land at that time; and that as many as four or five wired appellee on the 25th of July. Nichols never notified the appellee that there was a discovery of oil in the well, and we think his testimony indicates that he knew that appellant had wired to the appellee as above stated; at least that he instructed him to wire for a price. On the 25th day of July the contract was drawn, signed, and placed in the bank as an escrow. The appellee wired to Nichols to hold the trade open, evidently in answer to Nichols' wire that he had sold. There is some evidence or circumstances, taken together with the uncertain manner of Nichols and appellant in testifying, which would justify the jury in believing that this wire from appellee was received by Nichols before Nichols went to the bank and took out the contract and placed it of record. This land had been leased by appellee for oil and gas, but Nichols said he knew nothing of this. In order to protect appellant Nichols indorsed on the margin of the contract: "It is agreed that this land is not leased for oil and gas." Nichols and appellant somewhat crossed each other as to when this indorsement was made. Nichols thinks, or seems to say, it was before the contract was placed in the bank; appellant says it was afterwards, when the contract was taken out to record. Nichols and appellant were friends of several years' standing, and Nichols says in effect he did not think it to be his duty to report the condition of the well with reference to oil to his principal. We believe it is evident from all the circumstances in this case that Nichols and appellant knew if appellee learned of the condition of the Fowler well he would not sell for $3,000. It seems to have been their purpose to put the contract of record and thereby hold the land, and in this they were acting together. Nichols was giving the appellant ample time and opportunity to secure this land and to fully inform himself, while he permitted his principal to remain in the dark and sought to bind him by an irrevocable contract. He certainly manifested but little solicitude for appellee's interest when land values were quadrupling in that neighborhood in a half day's time. It was Nichols' duty to disclose all the facts affecting the rights of appellee. He did not fulfill the measure of the legal requirements by merely selling at the specific price listed under the circumstances of this case. R. C. L. vol. 4, § 22, p. 272; Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 3, § 1077. The appellant could not avail himself of the breach of trust on the part of Nichols and knowingly take advantage of the appellee's ignorance and act with the agent in securing the land at a grossly inadequate price, under the circumstances of this case. The facts found by the jury and the legitimate deduction to be made from the record in this case rendered the contract such that a court of equity will not specifically perform. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 2, § 905, also section 901; Black on Rescissions and Cancellation, vol. 1, §§ 62 and 63.

"If the plaintiff had obtained it by sharp and unscrupulous practices, by overreaching, by trickery, by taking undue advantage of his position, by nondisclosure of material facts, or by any other unconscientious means, then a specific performance will be refused. It necessarily follows that a less strong case is sufficient to defeat a suit for specific performance than is required to obtain the remedy." Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) §§ 2207, 2208.

We believe the case should be affirmed.

MARTINEZ v. LOGAN. (No. 1654.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
April 28, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 9, 1920.)

1. Adverse possession \S 76 — Title acquired not "title by regular chain of transfer from or under the sovereignty of the soil."

A grantee of a purchaser at a sale under a trust deed did not have a title acquired "by a regular chain of transfer from or under the sovereignty of the soil," supporting limitation under the three-year statute, where the holder of the legal title to the land before the mortgage lien was foreclosed was not a party to the suit to foreclose.

2. Mortgages \S 497(2)—Legal owner not affected by foreclosure unless party.

Unless a party to a suit for foreclosure of a mortgage, the holder of the legal title to the land is unaffected by the foreclosure.

3. Adverse possession \S 89—Annual payment of taxes necessary under five-year statute.

Under the five-year statute of limitations adverse possession must be for a consecutive period of five years, coupled with concurrent payment of annual taxes for such consecutive period.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; Kenneth Foree, Judge.

Suit by P. P. Martinez against Wm. O. Logan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Kemp and Muse & Muse, all of Dallas, for appellant.

Hatcher & Zumwalt, of Dallas, for appellee.

HALL, J. This is a suit in trespass to try title filed by appellant, Martinez, against appellee, Logan, July 28, 1916, to recover certain land described in the petition. By answer appellee pleaded a general demurrer, general denial, and plea of not guilty, and by amended answer disclaimed as to 25 acres of land and set up title by limitation under the statutes of 3, 5, and 10 years. The cause was submitted to the jury upon the issues of limitation. The answers to the special issues were in favor of appellee upon all three issues. By written stipulation, signed by the attorneys and filed, it was agreed that Harry Boswell is the common source of title; that plaintiff's title is under a valid judgment rendered in the justice court of precinct No. 1, Dallas county, Tex., on the 3d day of February, 1891, in the case of Harry Boswell v. James Alexander, No. 162 on the docket of said court, in which cause judgment was rendered for defendant and against plaintiff that execution issue against Harry Boswell, said common source, on which executions were issued in due order; that under the last alias execution a levy was made on April 29, 1901; that on the first Tuesday in June, 1901, the property in controversy was sold to plaintiff and conveyed to him by deed dated June 4, 1901, which was filed for record the same day; that an execution under such judgment was issued July 20, 1891, returned nulla bona by W. F. Marton, constable. The last alias execution was issued on the 24th day of April, 1901, under which the above sale was made. This statement is the basis of appellant's title.

The appellee deraigns title as follows: A deed of trust dated January 8, 1897, and duly acknowledged, from Harry and Scott Boswell, R. H. Woody, trustee, to secure a note for $100 in favor of Cullen & Woody and assigned to H. H. Jacoby, filed for record January 12, 1897. A suit by Harry Boswell v. M. C. Cullen and H. H. Jacoby, numbered 2550, in the district court of Dallas county, filed August 6, 1901, to enjoin said Cullen and Jacoby from foreclosing the above-described deed of trust lien on the property involved in this suit. Judgment in said cause of date October 8, 1901, denying the injunction and decreeing recovery for Jacoby against Boswell and foreclosing the lien on said property. Order of sale under the above judgment was executed on the 16th day of December, 1901, by levying on the premises therein described, and the return of the sheriff shows that the property was sold on the 7th day of January, 1902, to H. H. Jacoby, for the sum of $50. The sheriff's deed conveying the property to Jacoby is dated January 22, 1902, and filed for record June 2, 1902. The appellee herein deraigns title through H. H. Jacoby by mesne conveyances. A detailed statement thereof is not necessary.

[1, 2] It is first contended by appellant that the court erred in instructing the jury as to the three-year statute of limitation and that the affirmative finding of the jury upon this issue is not supported by the evidence. This assignment is sustained. According to the rule announced by the Supreme Court in Burnham et al. v. Hardy Oil Co., 108 Tex. 555, 195 S. W. 1139, appellee did not have "title by a regular chain of transfer from or under the sovereignty of the soil," as required by the statute, and which would enable him to claim under this article of the statute. The sale of the premises by appellant under the justice court judgment and its purchase at said sale, as shown by the stipulation quoted above, divested Harry Boswell of his title. In the foreclosure proceeding, effected in the injunction suit, brought by Boswell against Cullen and Jacoby, appellant was not made a party, and appellant's title was not affected thereby. Browne v. King, 196 S. W. 884; V. S. C. S. arts. 5672-5675. As said in the Browne Case, appellant held the legal title to the land before the mortgage lien was foreclosed and not having been a party to the suit his title was afterwards unaffected by the foreclosure.

[3] It is further contended that the court erred in submitting to the jury the issue made by defendant's plea of limitation of five years. This assignment must also be sustained. It is shown without contradiction that the adverse possession of appellee for a consecutive period of five years was not coupled with concurrent payment of annual taxes for any such consecutive period. This has been frequently held to be a necessary element to enable one to hold under the five-year statute.

The contention under the fourth assignment of error is that the evidence does not show clearly and positively that defendant had been in continuous, peaceable, adverse possession of the premises sued for for such time as to enable him to defend under the ten-year statute. The evidence upon this issue is conflicting. That of the several witnesses who testified for plaintiff with reference to the condition of the fences and possession of the land and its cultivation by tenants is unsatisfactory. The testimony for the appellees as to such use and occupancy and as to fences is sufficient to sustain the verdict.

Upon this issue alone, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Error from District Court, Orange County; W. T. Davis, Judge.

Suit by the Southwestern Settlement & Development Company and others against A. L. Ponder and others, in which Mrs. S. N. Conn intervened, and in which named defendant interposed cross-action against intervenor. Judgment for named defendant against intervenor, and she brings error. Affirmed.

Warren & Conn, of Houston, for plaintiff in error.

Kennerly, Williams, Lee & Hill, of Houston, John Hancock, of Thurber, and Smith & Crawford, of Beaumont, for defendants in error.

WALKER, J. This suit was instituted by the Southwestern Settlement & Development Company and others, as plaintiffs, against Amos L. Ponder and others, as defendants, in an action of trespass to try title to recover the title and possession of the Samuel J. Withey survey in Orange county, Tex. As sole devisee and independent executrix of the estate of R. C. Conn, deceased, Mrs. S. N. Conn made herself a party to this suit. Amos L. Ponder answered by a cross-action against Mrs. Conn, claiming to own the southwest one-fourth of this survey. She answered this cross-action, as cross-defendant. The case was tried on the following agreement:

"Come now the parties here by and through their attorneys of record, and agree that the plaintiffs herein own all of the S. J. Withey survey in Orange county, Texas (described in the pleadings of the parties herein) unless the defendants or some one or more of them have acquired title to said survey or a part thereof under the statutes of limitation of this state."

All the matters in controversy were settled by agreement, except the contest between Ponder and Mrs. Conn over the southwest one-fourth. This was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered for Amos L. Ponder against Mrs. Conn for the title and possession of the said southwest one-fourth. From this judgment she has duly perfected her appeal by writ of error.

In our discussion of this case we will refer to Mrs. Conn as appellant, and to Amos L. Ponder as appellee.

On motion of appellant, the trial court filed the following conclusions of fact:

"1. That the land in controversy, being the southwest one-fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) of the Samuel J. Withey survey, in Orange county, Texas, was known throughout all of the period of the transactions before the court in this cause by all of the parties dealing therewith and by the public generally as the Jack Ballard survey of 160 acres.

"2. That the land in controversy was pat-

CONN v. SOUTHWESTERN SETTLEMENT & DEVELOPMENT CO. et al. (No. 526.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont. May 4, 1920.)

1. Names \S 16(3) — Sam J. Whitney and Samuel J. Withey held not idem sonans.

Deed describing land as the "Sam J. Whitney survey" held insufficient to vest grantee with title to land in the "Samuel J. Withey survey," as against subsequent innocent purchaser for value from grantor; such names not being idem sonans.

2. Vendor and purchaser \S 236—To be protected as bona fide purchaser, purchaser must pay value.

To be protected as a bona fide purchaser, purchaser must have paid value for the land.

3. Adverse possession \S 115(1) — Evidence held to raise issue as to who matured title by limitations.

In an action of trespass to try title to recover the title and possession of land, evidence held to raise an issue as to whether defendant's remote grantor or intervenor's testator's grantor matured limitation title.

4. Appeal and error \S 101(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where the evidence was sufficient to clearly raise an issue of fact, court's finding thereon will not be disturbed on appeal.

ented by the state of Texas to Samuel J. Withey on April 3, A. D. 1841.

"3. That in the year 1894 Ben Hollis purchased the southwest one-fourth of the Samuel J. Withey survey known as the Jack Ballard 160-acre survey, and immediately moved his family onto the same; there being a good house and 15 or 20 acres of land in a state of cultivation on said survey.

"4. That Ben Hollis resided upon said land, claiming, cultivating, using, and enjoying the same from the date he purchased the same until about November, A. D. 1895, when he sold the same to Jesse Gentry, Sr., which sale was subsequently evidenced by a conveyance executed Ben Hollis and wife to Jesse Gentry, Sr., dated July 26, A. D. 1906.

"5. That Jesse Gentry, Sr., resided upon, cultivated, used, and enjoyed said land, claiming the same from November, 1895, to and including the year 1908, when he conveyed the same to his son, Jesse Gentry, Jr.

"6. That after 1908 up to 1916 the said Jesse Gentry, Sr., continued to reside upon said land, cultivating, using, and enjoying the same, believing the same to be his property, but in the name of his son, Jesse.

"7. That during the period from 1895 to 1916 the said Jesse Gentry, Sr., paid all taxes due on the land in controversy.

"8. That on September 26, 1908, Jesse Gentry, Sr., conveyed the Withey survey to Jesse Gentry, Jr., which deed was filed on the same day.

"9. That on December 15, 1908, Jesse Gentry, Jr., conveyed the Sam J. Whitney section No. 11 to W. H. Gentry, which deed was filed for record October 15, 1914.

"10. That on September 21, 1911, Jesse Gentry, Jr., by his duly authorized attorney, Leslie B. Ponder, conveyed to Amos L. Ponder the southwest one-fourth of Samuel J. Withey survey. This deed was first filed for record September 22, 1911, and recorded in Book 9, page 304, Deed Records of Orange County, Texas, at which time the same was not acknowledged. Subsequently this deed was properly acknowledged, and again filed for record on May 10, 1918, and recorded in Book 28, page 21, Deed Records of Orange County, Texas.

"11. That the said Amos L. Ponder paid the sum of $2,000 for said land, and made inquiry at the time of the clerk of the county court of Orange county, Texas, who informed him that the records of his office showed the title to said land to be in Jesse Gentry, Jr.

"12. That the said Amos L. Ponder was an innocent purchaser for value and without notice of the said deed from Jesse Gentry, Jr., to W. H. Gentry, dated December 15, 1908, and knew nothing of the claim of said W. H. Gentry or any other person, to said land.

"13. That during the year 1911, the said W. H. Gentry resided at Vidor, Texas, and not upon the land in controversy. During said year Jesse Gentry, Sr., and a Mr. Chapman, who was a tenant of Jesse Gentry, Sr., were the only ones residing upon said land.

"14. That during 1912, and subsequent thereto, W. H. Gentry resided upon the northeast one-fourth of the S. J. Withey survey, and has not been in possession of any portion of the southwest one-fourth of the Withey survey.

"15. That during a portion of the time prior to 1908, the said W. H. Gentry lived with his father, Jesse Gentry, Sr., on this land. During this time he was a member of his father's family, and made no claim as against his father to any portion of this land.

"16. That from the year 1906 to 1909, inclusive, W. H. Gentry was away from said land and had no tenant on the same.

"17. That on January 28, 1913, by deed filed March 4, 1913, W. H. Gentry conveyed to R. C. Conn the land in controversy. The only consideration paid for this conveyance was a load of wire fencing which was to be used in building a fence on said land, which was for the use and benefit of R. C. Conn.

"18. That on August 15, 1913, by deed filed August 27, 1913, W. H. Gentry conveyed to R. C. Conn the entire S. J. Withey survey of 640 acres, less the land of the northeast one-fourth. The only consideration paid for this conveyance was $100.

"19. That the deed offered in evidence from Jesse Gentry, Sr., to W. H. Gentry, purporting to convey the Withey survey dated August 12, 1913, and filed for record August 27, 1913, was not executed by Jesse Gentry, Sr., nor under or by virtue of his authority or consent.

"20. That the S. J. Withey survey would cut 4,000 feet of pine timber per acre, and the southwest one-fourth of said survey would cut 300,000 feet of pine timber valued at $2.50 per thousand in 1913, and the land was valued at $2 per acre."

[1, 2] From these conclusions of fact, it results that judgment was properly rendered for Amos L. Ponder for two reasons: First. Because the deed from Jesse Gentry, Jr., to W. H. Gentry, dated December 15, 1908, conveyed the Sam J. Whitney survey, and not the Samuel J. Withey survey. These names are not idem sonans, and there was no testimony in the record that the Withey was commonly or generally known as the Whitney survey, nor is there any testimony that any of the parties to this suit so recognized it. Had this deed been of record, it would not have been notice to Amos L. Ponder when he purchased from Jesse Gentry, Jr., in 1911. Second. Because the deed from W. H. Gentry to R. C. Conn, of date January 28, 1913, was without consideration. Under the rule announced in White v. McGregor, 92 Tex. 556, 50 S. W. 564, 71 Am. St. Rep. 875, as between W. H. Gentry and Amos L. Ponder, Ponder acquired the superior title. Then, in order to defeat the Ponder title, a subsequent purchaser under W. H. Gentry must pay value. On this issue the judgment of the trial court was against Mrs. Conn and in favor of Ponder.

However, by her third assignment of error, she challenges the court's conclusions of fact that Jesse Gentry, Sr., acquired title to this land by limitation, asserting that this limitation title matured in W. H. Gentry, and that Jesse Gentry, Sr., never had any interest in it. In favor of the title of Jesse Gentry, Sr., his daughter, Mrs. Alice McGee, testified as follows:

"My name is Mrs. Alice McGee. Jesse Gentry, Sr., is my father. I have been married, Mack McGee was my husband. He is not my husband now. I am now a single woman. I was single for a year before I was served with citation here in this suit. I was a single woman at that time. I know where the Samuel J. Withey survey in this county is. I used to live there. I said I know where that survey of land is. I lived on it at one time; that was our old home once. When I say 'our' I mean when I lived with my father. We called that land at that time the Jack Ballard place. The part we bought for the Jack Ballard was 160 acres. As to whether or not that was the southwest quarter of the Withey survey, will say it was right near the Jasper county line, on the Orange county north line.

"I said my father, and his family moved on this land in August, 1895; that is, on the Jack Ballard 160 acres. Ben Hollis was living there when we moved there. We moved into the house with him. We bought it from him. My father bought the place from Mr. Hollis. He traded him some oxen for it. That was in August, 1895. Mr. Hollis was living there on the place at that time. We lived there in the house with him a week or more before he ever moved out. My father claimed 160 acres of land there then. The house on that land was a log house with a plank room on the back and a front gallery and back gallery. There were two fields on the land, one by the house and one northeast of the house. I don't know how many acres were in cultivation in all. There must have been about 30 acres in the two fields. In about a week after we moved there, Mr. Hollis moved away. I don't remember just how long it was, but it was a week, I am sure, before he moved away. We lived there a long time. My father continued to live there all the time. He never did move away from there until they sorter moved him away, which was year before last now. He cultivated those fields there around the house; they farmed there every year; he helped; he didn't do it all. My father never moved away from that place at all from the time he moved there until year before last. He would go off and come back. He left his things there; he never did give the place up. They cultivated these fields right straight along every year; they never did lay out as I know of."

"I know who those oxen belonged to that were traded for this place. My father had a big old yoke of steers, and they ran off of a bridge, and he traded them for another yoke, and traded them for the place. The oxen belonged to my father that were traded for this place. My father had control of that property after we moved down there in 1895. I did the most of the superintending, and my father did the providing. Hamp did not stay there all the time. He worked off some. He never worked much in the crop. My husband and my father built the house that he said he built."

Jesse Gentry, Sr., testified by deposition as follows:

"My name is Jesse Gentry. I will be 80 years of age on the 10th of May, 1917. I first moved on my present Texas home about 22 years ago. To the best of my recollection it was in October or November, 1895, that I first moved on the land now occupied by me as my home in Texas.

"Int. 5. Please state whether or not you purchased any land in the Samuel Withey survey in Orange county where you now reside in Texas, and, if so, from whom you purchased the same. A. Yes; I purchased 160 acres of land from one Ben Hollis in the Samuel Withey survey in Orange county, Tex."

In answer to the sixth, tenth, eleventh direct interrogatories and the thirteenth and nineteenth cross-interrogatories, he testified as follows:

"There was a good double log house on the land when I bought it, and I built a barn, cleared about 30 acres of land and fenced and cultivated it, and cut three ditches a year ago this spring. I also reset all the fencing, putting in new rails where necessary, about a year ago. I built the barn about the third or fourth year after I purchased the place, and did most of the clearing the first winter I was on the place. I was engaged in clearing the most of the first three winters that I was on the place. Yes, while I have resided upon, used, and cultivated and enjoyed the Samuel Withey survey in Orange county, Tex., I have claimed to own the same as my own property."

[3, 4] W. H. Gentry testified that he bought the land from Ben Hollis and gave Hollis a yoke of oxen in payment for it, and had always claimed the land and had lived on it. Ben Hollis testified that he sold the land to W. H. Gentry in 1895, Gentry being a minor at that time, that he sold it to him at the request of Jesse Gentry, Sr., and that W. H. Gentry gave him a yoke of oxen for the land. This testimony clearly raised an issue as to who matured the limitation title. The court having resolved this in favor of Jesse Gentry, Sr., we will not disturb it.

By her fourth assignment of error, appellant complains of the finding that R. C. Conn did not pay value for the deed made to him by W. H. Gentry, dated January 28, 1913.

On the question of value, W. H. Gentry testified as follows:

"I don't recollect exactly what the consideration was for the deed from myself and wife to R. C. Conn for the southwest quarter, dated the 28th of January, 1913, reciting the consideration of $10 and other valuable considerations. I can't remember now how much money Mr. Conn paid me for that deed. I remember the circumstance of Mr. Conn buying some wire for me and shipping it up there. That was part of the consideration for that deed. The consideration was something like $300, I am pretty sure. One hundred dollars was the consideration for the deed from myself and wife to R. C. Conn for the entire section, excepting the northeast quarter. Mr. Conn paid me $100 for that deed.

"I don't really know how much Mr. Conn gave me for it. I sold it to him in order to get able to stay there to help me out in living. I made Mr. Conn the deeds; I borrowed money from him sometimes. I made him several deeds. I got the deed from my father on August 12th, and on the 15th of August I made Mr. Conn the last deed. I did not make that deed for the purpose of getting his title straightened out. Mr. Conn paid me $100 when I made him the last deed. It was before that that Mr. Conn sent me some wire up there. I know it was before that that he sent me the wire because I had a crop growing on my land at the time this last deed was made. I put some of that wire on the southwest quarter. It is scattered around there over this whole section; that is, where there is a field. I put some of this wire that Mr. Conn sent me down there on this identical land I sold to Mr. Conn, and it is there yet; I put some of it on the old place, on the southwest quarter. Mr. Conn gave me $100 for this last deed after I got a deed from my father. He paid that to me in money, and I gave my father $50 of that. Mr. Conn gave me that $100 for this deed that I made him in August, 1913, and I gave my father $50 of it; he was talking about going to Alabama then, and he didn't go. During the time I was making these transactions, I thought my title to this land was questionable, but I had bought it, and I thought it would be mine some time if I ever got it cleared up.

"Mr. Conn shipped to me the net wire, and we had been talking about it in the spring of 1913. Prior to that time I had executed to him deeds to the northwest one-fourth, the northeast one-fourth, and the southeast one-fourth. I reserved to myself the land on the northeast one-fourth.

"Q. These various deeds that Mr. Conn had obtained from you for the quarter sections—state whether or not he had paid you for those deeds. A. Yes, sir; he paid me for the deeds. He paid me for each deed that he obtained from me. At the time I executed to him the deed for the entire section after I had obtained the deed from the old man, Mr. Conn owned by deeds from me the entire section of land except the land in the northeast quarter, and that is the time he paid me the $100. When the old man told me to sign his name to that deed in the presence of these witnesses Burrell and Wright, Burrell and Wright and myself went to the Jasper county line and met Preston Bond there, and had Preston Bond to take the acknowledgment of the witness Wright. We went about 400 yards from the house up to the county line. Preston Bond was a notary in Jasper county."

He also testified that he could not tell exactly what consideration was paid him for the land. He estimated it at about $300. In view of the fact that the trial court found him guilty of forgery, in that he forged the deed from his father, dated August 12, 1913, his testimony was not conclusive. As he was thoroughly discredited by the findings of the trial court, we cannot disturb the conclusion that no value was paid to him for the deed of date January 23, 1913.

Our discussion of this case has disposed of all the legal propositions raised under the other assignments. As we find no error in this record, the judgment of the trial court is in all things affirmed.

GALVESTON-HOUSTON ELECTRIC RY. CO. v. PATELLA et al. (No. 468.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont.
May 30, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 9, 1920.)

1. Railroads \S 350(22) — Automobile driver's contributory negligence held question for jury.

In an action for the death of an automobile driver at an interurban railroad crossing, evidence which showed that the driver neither looked nor listened for an approaching car, but that his view was somewhat obstructed in the direction from which the car came, held not to establish contributory negligence as a matter of law.

2. Railroads \S 301 — Public and interurban company have equal rights at crossing.

An interurban railroad company has no right to the exclusive use of that part of the street upon which its track is laid, but all persons have an equal right to the use thereof for traveling over and across the street.

3. Trial \S 252(9) — Correct abstract charge as to rights at crossing held misleading.

In an action for the death of an automobile driver at an interurban railroad crossing, where there was no contention that the driver did not have a right to be where he was and the evidence barely supported an inference of freedom from contributory negligence, it was misleading to give a correct charge that the driver had a right equal to the interurban company to use the street, from which the jury might have inferred it was not negligence for him to go upon the crossing as he did.

4. Railroads \S 338 — Failure of autoist to show motorman he heard whistle does not indicate peril.

The failure of occupants of an automobile to indicate to the motorman of an approaching interurban car that they heard his warning whistle does not show that he knew they were in peril, so that he should have stopped or checked his car, where the speed of the automobile was such that he inferred it would stop before going on the crossing.

5. Railroads \S 350(7) — Submission of issue as to sufficiency of whistle of interurban car held not warranted by evidence.

Where the evidence was undisputed that an interurban car had a whistle that could be heard for more than a mile, and which was heard by others when the car was 800 yards from the crossing where the accident occurred, there was no evidence to warrant submitting the issue of negligence in failing to equip the car with a sufficient whistle, though there was testimony that the whistle was less efficient than a locomotive whistle.

6. Railroads \S 350(12) — Submission of special issue as to control of interurban car on approaching crossing held proper.

In an action for the death of an automobile driver at an interurban railroad crossing, the submission of a special issue raised by the pleadings and evidence whether it was negligence not to have the car under control after the motorman discovered the automobile approaching the crossing was not error, though there was no evidence to sustain an issue of discovered peril.

7. Railroads — 348(1) — Evidence held to show no special danger, requiring watchman or warning at crossing.

In an action for the death of an automobile driver, evidence held not to show that the interurban crossing at which the accident occurred was one of special danger, though it was in a small incorporated town, and there was some obstruction to the view, so that it was error to admit evidence that there was no watchman or automatic crossing warning maintained there.

8. Railroads — 351(22) — Charge on discovered peril held incorrect.

A requested charge that, before the jury could determine the issue of discovered peril in favor of plaintiffs, they must find the motorman actually discovered and realized the peril, and knew that plaintiffs' decedent would go on the crossing ahead of the approaching car and be injured, before any duty would arise to stop the interurban car or check its speed, was incorrect.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; J. D. Harvey, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Annie Patella and others against the Galveston-Houston Electric Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

C. R. Wharton and R. C. Patterson, both of Houston, for appellant.

W. J. Howard, Clarence Kendall, and Louis, Campbell & Nicholson, all of Houston, for appellees.

HIGHTOWER, C. J. This suit was filed by Mrs. Annie Patella in her own behalf and for the benefit of her minor daughter, Antoinette Patella, widow and daughter, respectively, of Phillip Patella, deceased, and by Bernardo Patella and wife, parents of said deceased. The object of the suit was to recover damages because of the death of Phillip Patella, alleged to have been negligently caused by the defendant. The plaintiffs alleged that on or about the 18th day of November, 1916, the defendant, Galveston-Houston Electric Railway Company, was the owner of and was engaged in operating an interurban railway line between the cities of Houston and Galveston in Harris county, which line passed through various towns, villages, and stations, one of which was Park Place, and that on said date the said Phillip Patella was driving an automobile along one of the main boulevards of the town of Park Place, and that when he undertook to cross the tracks of the defendant, where they intersected said boulevard or street upon which Patella was driving, his automobile was struck by one of the cars of defendant, and that in such collision Phillip Patella received injuries which resulted in his death. The grounds of negligence alleged were as follows:

(1) The defendant was negligent in failing to have at the said crossing an electric bell, gate, or other device to warn persons, traveling along said boulevard and across the defendant's tracks, of the approach of its cars.

(2) The defendant was negligent in operating its car, which struck the automobile and killed Phillip Patella, over said crossing at an excessive rate of speed, to wit: 45 or 50 miles an hour.

(3) The defendant was negligent in not having its car, which struck the automobile, equipped with a proper whistle or other warning device, that is, a whistle or device that would give reasonable notice or warning to the said Phillip Patella, or other persons having occasion to pass over said crossing, of the approach of said car.

(4) The defendant was negligent in failing to keep a watchman at the crossing, which was a much-used and dangerous crossing, in order to warn persons, who had occasion to pass over the track of defendant at that point, of the approach of its cars.

(5) The defendant was negligent in that it discovered Phillip Patella, at a considerable distance from the point at which the collision occurred, approaching the track of said defendant at a speed of 10 to 15 miles an hour, after he apparently did not hear the warnings given him by the defendant, and continued on his course, and at the same rate of speed approached said railroad track and the point of a collision under such conditions that made it appear that it was likely, possible, and probable that he would go upon said track, in front of the rapidly moving interurban car, and the defendant and its operatives in charge of the car saw Phillip Patella in such position and under such circumstances in time to have stopped the interurban car or lessened its speed and brought it under control so as to have avoided the collision and the killing of said Phillip Patella, but made no effort to stop the car or slow the speed thereof, when by exercising ordinary care the interurban could have been stopped and the collision avoided.

(6) That defendant was negligent, in that it discovered Phillip Patella in a position of peril or danger on, or near to, and approaching the track, in time to have stopped the car or lessened its speed and have avoided the collision; and it failed to stop the car in time to avoid such injury and death, although it could have done so with the means at hand, in the exercise of ordinary care.

(7) That if the defendant, its servants and agents, did not discover Phillip Patella in a position of danger at or near the track in time to have stopped the car before striking him, it was negligent in not discovering him, in that it failed to exercise ordinary care to have so discovered him, and the defendant and its servants in charge of the car failed to keep a lookout for persons who might have occasion to cross the track of the defendant company at that point, the company well knowing that the crossing was a dangerous one, where the view of persons having occasion to pass over the track was cut off and obstructed by many objects; the crossing being a frequently and much-used crossing.

Damages were claimed by the plaintiffs in the sum of $40,000.

Defendant answered by a general demurrer and a special exception unnecessary to here mention, and by general denial and plea of contributory negligence upon the part of said Phillip Patella.

The trial resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and was apportioned as follows: $18,000 to Mrs. Annie Patella, $3,000 to the minor, Antoinette Patella, $1.00 to the father, Bernardo Patella, and $1.00 to the mother, Mrs. Bernardo Patella. From this judgment the defendant appealed, after its motion for new trial had been overruled.

The special issues which were submitted to the jury, and their answers thereto were as follows:

Issue No. 1: "Was or was not the defendant negligent in operating its car under the circumstances at the rate of speed it was operating same at the time it neared the crossing at which the collision with the automobile occurred? You will answer, 'It was,' or, 'It was not,' according as you find the fact to be." The jury answered: "It was."

Issue No. 2: "If you have answered special issue No. 1 in the affirmative, then you will answer, Was or was not such negligence a proximate cause of the injury? You will answer, 'It was,' or, 'It was not,' as you may find the fact to be." The jury answered: "It was."

Issue No. 3: "Was or was not the defendant negligent in not sounding the gong of said car as it approached the said crossing? You will answer, 'It was,' or 'It was not,' according as you find the fact to be." The jury answered: "It was."

Issue No. 4: "If you have answered the foregoing special issue No. 3 in the affirmative, then you will answer special issue No. 4. Was or was not such negligence a proximate cause of the collision? You will answer, 'It was,' or, 'It was not,' according as you find the fact to be." The jury answered: "It was."

Issue No. 5: "Was or was not the interurban car in question, under the circumstances, equipped with a whistle or other device that would have emitted or carried sufficient sound to properly warn people using such crossing? You will answer, 'It was,' or, 'It was not,' according as you find the fact to be." The jury answered: "It was not."

Issue No. 6: "If you have answered the foregoing special issue No. 5, then you will answer special issue No. 6. Was or was not such omission, if any, on the part of the defendant negligence, as that term has been hereinbe-fore defined? You will answer, 'It was,' or, 'It was not,' according as you find the fact to be." The jury answered: "It was."

Issue No. 7: "If you have answered the foregoing special issue No. 6 in the affirmative, then you will answer special issue No. 7. Was or was not such negligence, if any, the proximate cause of the collision in question? You will answer, 'It was,' or 'It was not,' according as you find the fact to be." The jury answered: "It was."

Issue No. 8: "Was or was not Phillip Patella guilty of contributory negligence, as that term has been hereinbefore defined, in approaching the crossing on the occasion in question in the manner he did? You will answer, 'He was,' or, 'He was not,' according as you find the fact to be." The jury answered: "He was not."

Issue No. 9: "If you have answered the foregoing special issue No. 8 in the affirmative, and only in such event, then you will answer special issue No. 9. Was or was not such contributory negligence, if any, the proximate cause of the collision in question? You will answer, 'It was,' or, 'It was not,' according as you find the fact to be." There was no answer to this question.

Issue No. 10: "Did or did not the motorman in charge of the defendant's interurban car actually discover Phillip Patella approaching the crossing under conditions that made it appear probable or likely that he would go onto the track ahead of the interurban car at a time when said interurban car was at a sufficient distance from said crossing to have enabled the motorman to have stopped same or lessened its speed, so as to avoid a collision by using the means at hand, consistent with the safety of its passengers? Answer, 'He did,' or, 'He did not,' according as you find the fact to be." The jury answered: "He did."

Issue No. 11: "Was or was not the defendant negligent under the circumstances in not having the interurban car under control after the motorman discovered the said Phillip Patella approaching the crossing? You will answer, 'It was,' or, 'It was not,' according as you find the fact to be." The jury answered: "It was."

Issue No. 12: "If you have answered the foregoing special issue No. 11 in the affirmative, then you will answer special issue No. 12. Was or was not such negligence a proximate cause of the injury and death of the said Phillip Patella? The jury answered: "It was."

Issue No. 13 related to the measure of damages, which was determined as above shown.

From the foregoing findings, it is obvious that the jury found that appellant was guilty of negligence in every particular as alleged by the appellees, but acquitted Phillip Patella, deceased, of contributory negligence, as pleaded by appellant.

By its first assignment of error, appellant complains of the refusal of the trial court to peremptorily instruct the jury in its favor. This assignment is followed by several propositions showing the reasons of appellant for this contention. We shall not mention these propositions in detail, but it will suffice to say that appellant's main contentions in this connection are that the evidence, as a whole, showed that Phillip Patella, deceased, was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, which barred any recovery in favor of the appellees, and also that the issue of discovered peril, determined against it by the jury, was not in the case upon the evidence.

[1] We shall first dispose of the contention that contributory negligence on the part of the deceased was shown as a matter of law.

At the time of his death, Phillip Patella resided in the city of Houston, and was an employé of the Gulf Refining Company in that city. In the afternoon of the 18th day of November, 1916, about 2 o'clock, Phillip Patella and three of his companions and co-employés, O. C. Herzog, S. G. Herring, and C. H. Wetzel, all young men, left the city of Houston in an automobile owned by Phillip Patella's father, and went to Park Place, a little town south of the city of Houston, through which appellant's interurban railway track runs between that city and the city of Galveston. Deceased and his companions reached the town of Park Place about 3 o'clock, or a very few minutes thereafter, and upon reaching there, drove at once to the house of S. P. Mott, who was also an employé of the Gulf Refining Company in the city of Houston, but who lived with his family at Park Place. The purpose of these young men in going down to Park Place on said afternoon was to look at the town and drive around for pleasure generally. Being unacquainted with the town of Park Place they requested Mott, upon reaching his house, to get in the automobile with them and show them around the town, which Mott agreed to do, and got in the automobile with Patella and his companions, and they started out to see the town. After driving away from Mott's house, they in a few minutes reached what is known as Broadway boulevard, one of the principal streets of the town of Park Place, and which, as we gather from the record, runs practically north and south through the town. After driving into Broadway boulevard, the automobile, which was driven by Patella, turned north and proceeded in the direction of the crossing, where the accident, which resulted in Patella's death, occurred. Herring was on the front seat with Patella, sitting to his left, and Herzog, Wetzel, and Mott were sitting in the rear seat of the automobile.

Appellant's interurban railway track, as best we can gather from the record, runs practically north and south through the town of Park Place, and at the time these young men left Mott's house for the purpose of driving over the town, appellant's interurban car, coming from Galveston, was, according to its schedule, due at the station at Park Place between five and eight minutes thereafter. These young men drove several blocks, perhaps some four or five blocks, after leaving Mott's house, before they drove into Broadway boulevard, but at the time they drove into Broadway, appellant's interurban car was not in sight of them, nor did they hear any signals of the approach of the car at that time, and they proceeded along Broadway north, in the direction of the crossing, where the accident occurred, the automobile traveling at a speed between 8 and 10 miles an hour. When the automobile reached a point on Broadway approximately 250 feet from the crossing where the accident occurred, appellant's interurban car had approached from Galveston, and was somewhere between, as best we can gather, 800 and 900 feet south of the crossing where the accident occurred, when the motorman on the interurban car discovered the automobile on Broadway, traveling in the direction of the crossing, and the motorman blew the whistle on the interurban for the crossing, and gave the usual crossing signals, but, according to the testimony of Mott, Herzog, Herring, and Wetzel, they did not hear the signal whistle, and did not hear any other signal or sound of the approaching interurban car, and did not see it, and were unaware of its approach to the crossing. About 250 feet from the crossing in question, that is, where appellant's track crosses Broadway boulevard, there was a small park, situated practically in the middle of Broadway boulevard, and for that reason the boulevard forks right at the south end of this little park, and one fork of the street turns to the left around the park, and the other fork to the right. On this occasion, when the park was reached, and upon seeing the forks in the street, Patella asked Mott which way they should go, and Mott directed him to take the left fork, leaving the little park on the right as they drove in the direction of the crossing. This direction was complied with, and Patella drove the automobile around the little park to the left, and continued in the direction of the crossing without change in the speed of the automobile, and during the time Patella was thus driving around the park the automobile was observed by appellant's motorman, and he, as we find the fact to be, was sounding the whistle on the interurban car to warn persons of the approach of the same to the crossing; but, according to the testimony of all the occupants of the car, other than Patella, they did not hear any of the signals, and did not know of the approach of the interurban car, and were not thinking about the interurban car, and did not look in the direction from which the interurban was coming. All of the occupants of the car who testified on the point stated that they were driving along at the rate of speed of between 8 and 10 miles an hour from the time the car came into Broadway boulevard until about the time the crossing was reached, and that they did not change the speed of the automobile, and that they never thought of the approach of an interurban car, though some of them stated that they were aware that the car passed through the town of Park Place every hour.

One of the young men in the automobile testified that when the automobile was something like 50 feet from the crossing where the accident occurred, he did look in the direction of Houston, and saw no interurban approaching, and he thought that about at the same time Patella also looked in the same direction, but that none of them looked in the direction of Galveston, from which the interurban was approaching, until the automobile was within a few feet of the track at the crossing, and that when this witness, who was Herzog, did look in that direction he observed the interurban, which was then not over 30 feet distant from where Herzog was sitting in the rear seat of the automobile, and that he, upon seeing the interurban, said, "There is the interurban," and that he was the first man who discovered the interurban, and that within two seconds thereafter the collision occurred. This testimony on the part of Herzog is practically corroborated by Mott, Wetzel, and Herring. These same companions of Patella testified, however, that the view of the approach of the interurban car to the crossing, while the automobile was traveling up Broadway and around the little park, was to some extent obstructed by palms, which were growing in the park for ornamental purposes, and also they testified that as they approached near to the crossing, within 25 or 30 feet perhaps, the view of the approaching car was also obstructed by the trolley poles placed along the right of way, which were some 150 feet apart. There are photographs in the record before us which were used on the trial below, showing the location of the little park we have mentioned, and showing the palms growing therein, and also showing the trolley poles along the right of way, but the photographs do not show all palms that were growing in the park at the time the accident in question occurred, the undisputed evidence being that some of the palms that were growing at the time of the accident had been removed. The evidence further shows that the palms in the park averaged about 5 feet in height, though some of them were as high as 7½ feet, and the grade of appellant's track at that immediate vicinity was more than 4 feet higher than the street upon which the automobile was traveling. We are unable to tell from the photographs sent up with the record just what the extent of the obstructions to the view of an approaching car on the occasion in question was; that is, such obstructions as were caused by the palms and trolley poles, and from the whole evidence on that point we are not able to say that there was no obstruction to the view of an approaching car on the occasion in question, but must assume from the evidence that the view of the approaching car was to some extent obstructed, as claimed by the appellees. And while we conclude from the evidence in the record before us that deceased and his companions did not look or listen for appellant's interurban car, as it approached the crossing in question, and as the occupants of the automobile were approaching the crossing and before going on same, still, because of the fact that the view of an approaching car to the crossing was to some extent obstructed, and being unable to tell to what extent obstructed, we have concluded that we would not be authorized to hold that Phillip Patella was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

We shall not go into a lengthy discussion of the law as we understand it on this question, but feel bound by the expression of the Supreme Court of this state in the recent case of Trochta v. M., K. & T. Ry. Co., 218 S. W. 1038. The facts in that case will be found in the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals at Austin, reported in 181 S. W. 761. The plaintiffs in that case, claiming damages in consequence of the death of Trochta, recovered judgment in the trial court against the railroad company because of Trochta's death, which was occasioned by a collision between the railroad company's train and Trochta's wagon at a public road crossing. The railroad company pleaded contributory negligence on the part of Trochta in approaching and going over the crossing as he did without looking or listening for the approach of a train to the crossing, and the jury, in response to a special issue submitted by the trial court, expressly found that Trochta neither looked nor listened for the approach of a train to the crossing, and also that he made no effort whatever to ascertain whether a train might be approaching the crossing before going upon the same, where he met his death; but the jury also found that his failure to look or listen, or to use any effort whatever to ascertain whether a train might be approaching the crossing, was not negligence on his part, and the trial court permitted such verdict to stand, but the Court of Civil Appeals said, substantially, that the jury was not authorized to infer that Trochta was not guilty of negligence which contributed to his death after expressly finding that he neither looked nor listened, nor made any other effort to ascertain whether a train might be approaching before he went upon the railroad crossing. A writ of error was granted in that case, and the Commission of Appeals, in an opinion by Justice Strong, declined to discuss or pass upon the action of the Court of Civil Appeals in holding as it did on the issue of contributory negligence, but disposed of the case upon the issue of discovered peril. Chief Justice Phillips, in approving the disposition made by the commission, took occasion to say:

"Under the facts of this case there is in our opinion no warrant for not applying to it the general rule prevailing in this state, that the failure of one about to go over a public railway crossing to look and listen for an approaching train, does not, of itself, constitute negligence as a matter of law. Here, the question as to whether, under all the circumstances, Trochta was guilty of negligence in not looking or listening for the train, was for the jury. The jury determined it against the defendant.

"For this reason, as well as that announced in the opinion of the Commission of Appeals, the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is reversed and the judgment of the district court is affirmed."

It will be seen from the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals in that case that there was some evidence to the effect that the view of an approaching train to the crossing where Trochta was killed was to some extent obscured by trees, some of which, as many as two small trees, were on the railroad company's right of way, and others on contiguous land.

We assume that Chief Justice Phillips had in mind, when he used the language just quoted, the fact that the evidence in the Trochta Case showed that the view of the railroad company's approaching train was to some extent obstructed, and that, therefore, the fact that Trochta neither looked nor listened nor made any other effort to ascertain whether he might go over the crossing with safety would not make him guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and so, in this case, there being evidence regarding obstructions to the crossing, which we consider equally as strong as that shown in the Trochta Case, we could not consistently, in view of the expression of Judge Phillips, hold that Patella was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, although we conclude as a fact, from all the evidence of his companions who testified on the trial, that neither he nor any of them looked or listened for an interurban car that might be approaching the crossing at the time Patella and his companions were approaching and attempting to make the same, nor did they use any other efforts to ascertain whether they might approach and make said crossing with safety to themselves. We think such conclusion cannot be escaped by any fair and reasonable mind. The writer, before the decision in the Trochta Case, had been of the opinion that all persons were required to use ordinary care for their own safety in going over railroad crossings, which every one knows are places of inherent danger, and that in the nature of things such care could only be used by the exercise of the senses of seeing and hearing, and that where it was admitted or proved beyond contradiction that a person neither looked nor listened for the approach of a train to a railroad crossing before attempting to make the same, and met his death in consequence of such failure, then no liability would attach because of such death.

In the case of Railway Co. v. Moy, 174 S. W. 697, it was held by the Galveston Court of Civil Appeals, upon facts similar to the facts of this case, as regards obstructions, etc., that the deceased, Moy, was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, but the Supreme Court also reversed the Court of Civil Appeals in that case.

Also, in the case of Southern Traction Co. v. Kirksey, 181 S. W. 545, the Court of Civil Appeals for the Third District held that Kirksey was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and reversed and rendered a judgment of the trial court, which was in favor of the plaintiff. The Supreme Court granted a writ of error in that case, and reversed and rendered the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, and affirmed that of the district court, basing its action largely upon the fact that there were some obstructions to the view of an approaching car to the crossing where Kirksey was injured, but also laid some stress upon the fact that Kirksey's attention was diverted about the time he started over the crossing.

In view of the holding of the Supreme Court in the three cases mentioned, we have concluded, without discussing the matter further, that we would not be authorized to hold that Phillip Patella was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and therefore the assignment upon that point is overruled.

Passing for the present the second, third, and fourth assignments of error, we shall proceed to dispose of the fifth assignment. This assignment complains of paragraph 5 of the trial court's charge to the jury, which was as follows:

"You are further instructed that a street car company or interurban company has no right to the exclusive use of that part of the street upon which its track is laid, but all persons have an equal right to the use of same for traveling over and across the street."

By appropriate propositions under this assignment, appellant contends:

(1) That this charge was misleading, and calculated to cause the jury to give undue emphasis and prominence to the right of deceased to use the street and crossing in question, and that any charge upon the subject, in a case of this character, should instruct the jury that the railway company had, in a sense, the paramount right, to the extent, at least, that public necessity and convenience required that it take precedence at such crossings over the right of way of the ordinary traveler by vehicle or on foot; and

(2) That in a case of this character, where the deceased was not charged with being a trespasser, it was improper to give such charge to the jury; that it could serve no good purpose, but was calculated to confuse and mislead the jury in determining the duties of the respective parties; and

(3) That even if the charge could be said to announce a correct proposition of law in the abstract, it was, nevertheless, error in this case, because it was calculated to confuse and mislead the jury in considering the vital questions involved under the issue of discovered peril; and

(4) That even if it could be held that the charge announced a correct proposition of law in the abstract, it was, nevertheless, error to give it to the jury in this case, because it was calculated to make the jury believe that the deceased had the right to be on the crossing at the time and under the circumstances in question, and that the charge was clearly calculated to nullify the defense of contributory negligence, because it was calculated to give the jury the understanding that the deceased had the right to be on the crossing at the time, and was therefore rightfully there at the very time and under the very circumstances in question, and that, being rightfully there, he was not guilty of negligence in being there.

Counsel for the appellees, by one of their counter propositions in this connection, reply to the contention of appellant by saying that the charge complained of announced a correct abstract principle of law, and that, as far as the charge went, it did not involve any affirmative error, and that if appellant desired to have the charge amplified or explained in any way touching its application to the facts in this case, appellant should have presented a special charge embracing such explanation. Appellees' counsel also seek to answer appellant's contention in this connection by other counter propositions, which we think are not tenable.

[2] As to whether the charge complained of announced a correct abstract principle of law, it is unnecessary for us to determine, but if we were called upon to do so, we would feel compelled to hold that it did so, following San Antonio Street Railway Co. v. Melcher, 87 Tex. 632, 30 S. W. 899, San Antonio Traction Co. v. Haines, 100 S. W. 791, and San Antonio Traction Co. v. Kumpf, 99 S. W. 864.

[3] There was no issue between the parties below as to their rights to the use of the crossing where the accident occurred, but the issues were whether appellant was guilty of negligence in any of the particulars charged by appellees, and whether Phillip Patella was guilty of contributory negligence, as charged by appellant, and, if so, then whether appellant discovered the perilous position in which Patella's negligence had placed him in time for appellant's motorman to have avoided injuring him by the use of such means as were then at the motorman's command, consistent with the safety of appellant's car and the persons thereon. Such being the only issues between the parties, we have searched this record in vain to find anything that might have suggested to the trial court the propriety of giving the charge complained of. If Phillip Patella was not guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and we have concluded he was not, yet it must be admitted, upon the practically undisputed evidence in this record bearing upon that issue, that the jury had a very narrow margin upon which to determine that Patella was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of fact, and such was the main defense relied upon by appellant in the trial before the jury. If the charge was correct as an abstract proposition of law, still it does not follow that the trial court may always properly give in charge to a jury some correct abstract principle of law, but, on the contrary, the reports of adjudicated cases in this state are replete with instances where such charges have been condemned on the ground that, being mere abstract propositions of law, they were confusing and misleading, and in some of the cases they were held to be reversible error.

In our judgment, it would be difficult to suppose any case where a charge along the lines of that complained of here would be calculated to be more prejudicial to the defendant than was this charge, upon the facts adduced upon the trial below.

Let us look at the probable effect of this charge upon the jury, composed of laymen, though supposed to be men of average intelligence and understanding, and see how they would probably construe the charge complained of. The defendant in this case was contending before the jury, in effect, that, even if it was guilty of negligence, as claimed by the plaintiffs, still the deceased, Phillip Patella, was also guilty of negligence at the very time and place when and where he met his death in approaching and going upon the crossing in question, without first using proper care to ascertain whether defendant's interurban car might be approaching such crossing, and that Phillip Patella did not use such care, and did not look or listen for the approach of appellant's car to such crossing, but, on the contrary, attempted to drive his automobile over said crossing when defendant's car was in plain view of Patella, and when he knew, or by the exercise of proper care ought to have known, that fact, and that under such circumstances Phillip Patella was not justified in so driving upon the crossing, and that his act in so doing barred any recovery by his family for his death. Presumably, this theory and position of the defendant below was strenuously argued by its counsel before the jury, which theory and position was, of course, denied by counsel in their argument for the plaintiffs. Now, when the jury retired to consider of their verdict, bearing in mind the evidence admitted upon the defendant's plea of contributory negligence and the argument of counsel on that issue, when they reached that issue for determination, they were confronted by this charge and admonition coming from the trial judge:

With this charge before them, telling them in unmistakable language that Phillip Patella's right upon the crossing was equal to that of appellant's interurban car, was it not most natural for the jury to conclude that, Phillip Patella having the same legal right as the defendant to use the crossing as the defendant had, he could not be guilty of negligence which would have prevented a recovery by his wife and baby for his death, even if he did not look or listen for the approach of appellant's car to the crossing, and did not use any effort to ascertain whether an interurban car might be approaching the crossing at that time? Presumably, the jury tried to be guided, and were guided, by the court's charge as to the law applicable to the case before them; and when they were told by the charge complained of, in effect, that Phillip Patella had just as much right upon the crossing where he met his death as did the defendant, the jury very probably got the idea, and acted upon it, that Phillip Patella had the right to be upon that crossing at the very time he was struck and killed, regardless of the circumstances surrounding him at the time he went upon the crossing.

When it was said in some of the cases above mentioned that the rights of railroad companies and street car companies and the rights of the public to the use of crossings on public roads and streets are equal, it was certainly not meant that such companies and the public had the right to use and occupy such crossings at the same moment, because such a use would be unreasonable and impossible, and therefore the opinions in those cases did not intend to announce any such rule, but, on the contrary, meant to say only that the public had just as much right to pass over the railroad track at such public road and street crossings as did the railway or street car company to run its cars along that track over such roads or streets. But, to say to a jury in a case where contributory negligence on the part of one injured or killed at the crossing was interposed as a defense, that the injured or deceased person was as much within his rights in using the crossing as was the railway company was certainly calculated to mislead and confuse the jury, and cause them to treat very lightly, at least, the defendant's plea of contributory negligence.

In the case of Baker v. Collins, 199 S. W. 519, the plaintiffs had recovered judgment below because of the alleged negligent killing of John F. Collins at a public road crossing over a railroad track, the said Collins at the time riding in an automobile which was struck by a train of the railroad company at the crossing. In that case the defendant, among other things, was relying upon the defense of contributory negligence on the part of Collins, and the trial court, at the plaintiff's request, gave to the jury this charge:

"Gentlemen of the jury, you are instructed that as a matter of law the deceased had an equal right to travel on the dirt road at the intersection with the railroad, as the railroad had to run its train on its track at that point."

The Austin Court of Civil Appeals, speaking through Chief Justice Key, in sustaining an assignment of error challenging the correctness of the trial court's action in giving the quoted charge, among other things said:

"We sustain appellant's contention that this charge was confusing and misleading, and therefore the court erred in giving it. The case involved a question of negligence from two standpoints: one, negligence on the part of the defendant in approaching the crossing without giving statutory signals, and the other on the part of Mr. Collins in driving his automobile upon the crossing while the train was near by and approaching. The court in its main charge gave all the law that was necessary upon both of those questions.

"In so far as the record shows, no one had charged that the deceased was a trespasser and had no right to travel the public road where it intersected and crossed the railroad track, and therefore it was unnecessary for the court to inform the jury of deceased's right in that respect. But the charge in question was not properly framed to give the jury correct and accurate knowledge upon that subject.

"As bearing upon the question of negligence charged against railroad companies in the operation of their trains, our Supreme Court has frequently said that railroads have no exclusive right to the use of their tracks where they cross public highways; that the public have the right to travel such highways, and in so doing to cross railroad tracks; and that the law imposes upon those operating railroad trains the duty of exercising due care to prevent injury to persons who may be so traveling. And in considering the question of negligence on the part of the railroad company, it is not improper to give such charge, if it is so framed as to limit it to that question.

"The charge now under consideration was not restricted to a consideration of the question of the defendant's negligence, and the jury had the right to consider it in determining the question of contributory negligence. And when so considered, and in view of the fact that it specifically declared that Mr. Collins had an equal right to travel on the dirt road at the intersection of the railroad as the railroad had to run its trains on its tracks at that point, the jury may have concluded that the charge meant that as Collins had such right, proof of the fact that he knowingly and willfully ran his automobile upon the track at a time when he must have known that it was very dangerous to do so would not defeat the plaintiffs' right to recover. * * * Of course, it is not true in either law or reason, that when a person is traveling a public highway which crosses a railroad track, such person and the railroad each have the right to pass the intersection at the same time. Under such circumstances, and in the very nature of things, one or the other must have the right of precedence, because they cannot both occupy the point of intersection at the same time.

"Such right of precedence is not fixed by statute in this state, but, generally speaking, common sense and public welfare dictate that it should be accorded to railroad trains; and it is a matter of common knowledge that, as a general rule, the traveling public recognize and accord such right of precedence to approaching trains. We do not state this as a rule of law to be given in charge to juries, though the writer, speaking for himself only, believes that it should be. * * *

Counsel for appellees in this case contend, among other things, that the charge condemned in Baker v. Collins was materially different from the charge here complained of by appellant, but we cannot agree with counsel for appellees that there is any material difference between the two charges as to their effect upon a jury in determining the issue of contributory negligence. After considering most carefully the evidence in this case bearing upon the issue of contributory negligence relied upon by appellant, we are unable to escape the conclusion that the charge complained of was highly calculated to cause the jury in this case to acquit Phillip Patella of contributory negligence, and that it very probably did cause the jury to so acquit him, and we, therefore, hold, after very much consideration of the question, that the giving of the charge complained of was error on the part of the trial court for which the judgment in this case should be reversed. See Stafford v. Chippewa, etc., Ry. Co., 110 Wis. 331, 85 N. W. 1036; Austin, etc., Ry. Co. v. Faust, 63 Tex. Civ. App. 91, 133 S. W. 451.

The charge complained of was not only calculated to cause the jury to render a verdict acquitting Phillip Patella of contributory negligence, but it was also highly calculated, we think, to cause the jury to find that appellant's motorman discovered Phillip Patella's perilous position in time to have prevented injuring him, and that after such discovery the motorman failed to do so, and for that reason also the charge should not have been given, even if the issue of discovered peril were in this case, as developed on the trial below. We have concluded, however, that the issue of discovered peril was not made by the evidence adduced upon the trial below, and shall now discuss that point.

Without stating the evidence of any of the witnesses separately, we shall state, substantially, what the material undisputed evidence was, as a whole, bearing upon the issue of discovered peril. Appellant's motorman, according to the undisputed testimony, saw Patella's automobile traveling north on Broadway boulevard at a distance, at least, as far as 250 feet from the crossing of that street by appellant's track where the accident occurred, and appellant's motorman could see, and did see, the automobile as it proceeded along the entire distance of 250 feet up Broadway in the direction of the crossing, and some of the testimony, especially that of Mrs. Ainsworth, was to the effect that while the automobile was traveling in the direction of the crossing, and after it had gotten within 250 feet thereof, the whistle on appellant's interurban car was sounded repeatedly and almost continuously up to the time the collision took place. Mrs. Ainsworth also testified that she saw no change in the speed of the automobile after she discovered it at the point of about 250 feet from the crossing until it practically reached the crossing, and that she did not see any of the occupants of the automobile look in the direction of the approaching interurban car. Practically the same character of testimony was given by Mrs. Langham. The automobile in which Patella and his companions were riding was a Hudson make, and the evidence shows that Hudson automobiles, in proper working order, as this car was at the time, when going at a speed of 8 or 10 miles an hour, could be stopped in 8 or 9 feet, and when going at a speed from 6 to 8 miles an hour could be stopped in 6 or 8 feet. The evidence also showed that the automobile was an open car, and there was nothing about the car itself to prevent the occupants from seeing the approach of appellant's interurban to the crossing had they looked in that direction. The evidence further shows that the occupants of the car were doing nothing out of the ordinary while driving along in the direction of the crossing, but were conversing and acting as persons usually do in driving along.

Appellant's motorman, Pennington, testified, substantially, that he first discovered the automobile traveling north on Broadway when it was about 250 feet from the crossing in question, and that in his opinion the automobile was traveling about 6 or 8 miles an hour, and that he kept his eyes on the automobile as the interurban approached the crossing, and that from the speed at which the automobile was traveling, he, the motorman, thought that the automobile was going to stop before going on the crossing, and that he never discovered anything from the actions of the occupants of the automobile that indicated anything to the contrary, or that they were unaware of the approach of the interurban car, until the automobile was within 25 or 30 feet of the crossing, at which time one of the occupants of the automobile raised up and waved his hand at the interurban car, and that at that instant the interurban car was then within 150 feet or about that distance from the crossing, and that it was impossible to then stop the interurban car or so check its speed as to prevent the collision at the crossing. The undisputed testimony further showed that the interurban car was running at a speed between 40 and 50 miles an hour as it approached the crossing in question, and the motorman testified that in going at that rate of speed it would require a distance of between 400 and 600 feet to stop the car. There was one witness who testified for appellees, to the effect that an interurban car ought to be stopped, going at a rate of speed of 35 or 40 miles an hour, within 250 or 300 feet, but he also stated that he had never operated an interurban car, but was only basing his opinion upon his experience as a locomotive engineer, and that he thought that an interurban car such as appellant's in this case could be stopped about as soon as a light train, and that from his experience as an engineer of many years, a light train could be stopped, by proper application of the air brakes, when going at a rate of 35 or 40 miles an hour, within 250 or 300 feet. This, we say, is about the substance of the testimony of appellees' witness Middleton on this point.

The collision occurred in broad open daylight, at about 3:15 in the afternoon, and the interurban car, at the time of the collision, was running on its schedule time. The motorman further testified that he had often observed persons approaching the crossing in automobiles, and that as a usual thing such persons would bring their cars to a stop when the interurban was approaching the crossing, and permit the interurban to pass, and that on a number of occasions persons driving automobiles would drive up sometimes within 5 feet of the track and then stop the automobile and permit the interurban to pass, and that on that occasion he saw nothing in the conduct of the occupants of the car that indicated to him that they would try to go over the crossing in question ahead of the interurban, or that they were unaware of the approach of the interurban to the crossing at the time, until, as stated above, some one in the automobile, when the same was within 25 or 30 feet of the crossing, raised up and waved his hand in the direction of the approaching interurban.

The testimony in the record shows, we think, without reasonable dispute, that the whistle on the interurban was capable of being heard on an ordinary day for more than a mile, and, according to the testimony of Mrs. Ainsworth and Mrs. Langham, the whistle on the interurban on the day in question was distinctly heard by them when it blew at a distance of between 400 and 600 yards south of the crossing, back near the woods in the direction of Galveston, and before the interurban was in sight.

There can be no question, from the positive evidence in this case, that the motorman on the interurban could reasonably expect that the occupants of the car heard the alarm given by the whistle as the interurban was approaching the crossing, because the positive evidence in the case makes it too plain for argument that this whistle could be heard more than a mile away.

The evidence also shows that there was the usual crossing sign at the crossing where the accident occurred, containing the words, "Railroad Crossing," and that this sign was facing the occupants of the automobile as they approached the crossing.

Now, Patella's companions in the automobile each testified, as we have stated in the beginning, that they neither heard nor saw appellant's interurban car as it approached the crossing in question until it was discovered by Herzog, who was sitting on the rear seat of the automobile, at a time when the interurban was only 25 or 30 feet from him.

Now, from this evidence, substantially stated, it is the contention of counsel for appellees that the issue of discovered peril was in the case, and that the trial court properly submitted it for the consideration of the jury, and that the evidence is sufficient to warrant the finding of the jury that appellant's motorman actually discovered Phillip Patella's peril or danger as he approached the crossing in question in time to have prevented injuring him by the means then at the command of the motorman, and that he failed to use such means, and that, therefore, the judgment should be affirmed, regardless of Patella's contributory negligence, if there was such, and regardless of any error, if any, touching the issue of contributory negligence.

Of course, if the evidence were sufficient to show that appellant's motorman actually discovered that Phillip Patella was in imminent peril as he approached the crossing in question, and that such discovery was made by appellant's motorman at such time when he could, by the use of all means then at hand, consistent with the safety of appellant's car and the persons thereon, have prevented the collision which resulted in Patella's death, and failed to do so, then appellant was liable for the death of Phillip Patella, regardless of contributory negligence on his part.

[4] Counsel for appellees base their contention of discovered peril mainly upon the fact, as shown by the undisputed evidence, that none of the occupants of the automobile indicated to the motorman on the interurban that they heard the alarm whistle which was being given as the car and the automobile were approaching the crossing. Certainly, the occupants of the automobile were in no imminent or actual peril while traveling along Broadway boulevard in the direction of the crossing, unless they were, in fact, unaware of the near approach of appellant's interurban car to that crossing, because certainly it must be presumed that they would not attempt to go upon the crossing and risk a collision with the approaching interurban if they were aware of its approach. Therefore the only thing that could have constituted peril or danger to the occupants of the automobile in approaching the crossing as they did was their ignorance of the approach of the interurban, and unless appellant's motorman was aware of or realized that the occupants of the automobile did not hear the whistle on the interurban and were not aware of its approach to the crossing, and that they would not probably stop or look or listen before going over the crossing, he did not actually know that the occupants of the automobile were in any danger or peril. Now, counsel for appellees contend that the fact that the occupants of the automobile failed to indicate to the motorman, by any action on their part, that they heard the alarm whistle was of itself sufficient to apprise the motorman and cause him to realize and know, and compel him to act upon such knowledge, that the occupants of the automobile had not heard the alarm whistle, and were ignorant and unaware of the approach of the interurban to the crossing. In this contention we cannot agree with the able counsel for appellees.

In support of their contention that the issue of discovered peril was in the case, counsel in their brief have cited several cases by the appellate courts of this state, among them H. & T. O. Ry. Co. v. Finn, 101 Tex. 511, 100 S. W. 918; Railway Co. v. Munn, 46 Tex. Civ. App. 276, 102 S. W. 442, and Galveston Electric Co. v. Antonini, 152 S. W. 845. It is the contention of counsel for appellees that these three cases specifically mentioned are practically parallel with the case at bar on the issue of discovered peril. In order to get at the facts in the Finn Case, reference must be had to the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals in that case, reported in 107 S. W. 94, because the opinion of the Supreme Court in that case does not recite the facts, but merely refers to the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals for the facts. All three of these cases, as well as all others cited by counsel for appellees, recognize the rule in this state to the effect that a recovery cannot be had against a railway or street car company upon the doctrine or principle of discovered peril in the absence of proof that such company's employes or servants actually discovered the perilous position of the person injured at such time that the operatives or servants of such company could have prevented the injury by the proper use of all means then at their command. T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Breadow, 90 Tex. 26, 36 S. W. 410; Morgan & Bros. v. M., K. & T. Ry. Co., 108 Tex. 331, 193 S. W. 134; Galveston Electric Co. v. Swank, 188 S. W. 705; San Antonio Traction Co. v. Kelleher, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 421, 107 S. W. 64; Schaff v. Gooch, 218 S. W. 783, and many other cases might be cited upon the point. But counsel for appellees do not deny the rule as we have stated it, but contend that the evidence in this case was sufficient to raise the issue of discovered peril, and to warrant the finding of the jury in appellees' favor on the issue, because they say that, when the occupants of the automobile failed to indicate, by some sign or otherwise, that they had heard the alarm whistles, which were so frequently repeated by appellant's motorman, the motorman then realized and actually knew that the occupants of the automobile were unaware of the interurban's approach, and that they would probably and likely go onto the crossing and collide with the interurban car.

If we should sustain counsel's contention in this connection, we would be virtually holding that any person, driving an automobile approaching a railroad or street car crossing, and near thereto, who fails to indicate to those in charge of an approaching railroad engine or street car, which is giving signals of its approach to the crossing, that such driver of the automobile heard such signals while approaching the crossing, was in actual peril or danger of collision at such crossing, and that if a collision at the crossing should follow, and it should be shown that the operatives of the railroad engine or street car failed to use all means then at command to prevent the collision, the injured party would be entitled to recover damages, regardless of any and all negligence on his part. We cannot subscribe to such a doctrine, because we think it would be most unreasonable, and would seriously hamper and interfere with the discharge of the duties owed by railroad and street car companies to the public. Such companies must operate their trains and cars in accordance with fixed and regular schedules, and in the very nature of things they cannot be required or expected to so run and operate their trains and cars as will permit private individuals to cross over their tracks in such manner and at such rate of speed as they may be pleased to go, and the engineer in charge of a railroad engine, or the motorman of an interurban street car, ought not to be held to have actual knowledge that the driver of an automobile approaching a public crossing was ignorant of an approaching train or car to the crossing merely because the driver of the automobile fails to respond in some way to warning signals given by the engineer or motorman. And especially should the motorman in this case not be held to have had actual knowledge of such ignorance on the part of Phillip Patella or those in the automobile with him, which ignorance alone must constitute any peril or danger that the occupants of the automobile were in, in approaching the crossing in question, because the automobile was going at a very slow rate of speed, which, according to Patella's companions who testified in the case, did not exceed 10 miles an hour, and the proof showed that the automobile going at that rate of speed could have been stopped within 8 to 10 feet, and during all the time that the automobile was approaching the crossing the proof is undisputed that the motorman on the interurban was blowing a whistle that the people in that vicinity could hear a mile or more, and there was nothing in the conduct of the occupants of the automobile, other than their failure to respond to the motorman's signals, that they were unaware of the approach of the interurban car. Pennington, appellant's motorman, in this connection, testified as follows:

"I saw the automobile as it came around the palm grove. The car (meaning the automobile) was driving slow. * * * The automobile was running 6 or 8 miles an hour as it was coming up the drive. It looked like it was going to stop at the speed it was going. * * * When I got close to the crossing one man stood up and waved his hand at me. They were 25 or 30 feet from the crossing when he did this. I was somewhere about 150 feet from them at that time, I reckon."

In the case of Austin Street Railway Co. v. Faust, 63 Tex. Civ. App. 91, 133 S. W. 449, the Court of Civil Appeals used this language:

"From the fact that people usually recognize and act upon this preferential right of the car [meaning street car], the motorman may well assume that it will be recognized and acted upon in a given instance, until there is something to reasonably indicate the contrary."

What was there in the conduct of the young men in the automobile with Phillip Patella to indicate that they intended to drive over the crossing ahead of the interurban car? In this connection see, also, Ft. Worth & Denver City Ry. Co. v. Shetter, 94 Tex. 199, 59 S. W. 533; Ft. Worth & Denver City Ry. Co. v. Harrison, 163 S. W. 332; New York Central & H. Ry. Co. v. Maidment, 168 Fed. 21, 98 C. C. A. 413, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 794.

Before concluding on this point, we will say that we have read carefully every authority cited by counsel for appellees in support of their contention that the issue of discovered peril was in this case, but, after doing so, we have concluded that neither of them is parallel in its facts to this case on the issue of discovered peril but on the contrary each of them is easily distinguishable in its facts from the present case; and we would be pleased to let this opinion show such distinction were it not for the fact that it would carry this opinion to too great length. This court is unanimously of the opinion that the issue of discovered peril was not in this case, and therefore appellant's assignment of error challenging the action of the court in submitting that issue, and the finding of the jury upon that issue, as being unsupported by the evidence, are sustained.

[5] Over objection of appellant the trial court submitted as an issue for the jury's determination this issue:

"Was or was not the interurban car in question, under the circumstances, equipped with a whistle or other device that would have emitted or carried sufficient sound to properly warn people using such crossing?"

The jury answered that appellant's car was not so equipped. The action of the court in submitting this issue is made the basis of the sixth assignment of error. The contention of appellant is that there was no evidence raising such issue and that therefore the court was unauthorized to submit it for the jury's determination. We sustain the assignment.

It is true that Patella's companions in the automobile at the time of the accident testified that none of them heard the whistle on appellant's car, but none of them testified positively that the whistle was not blown, nor did any of them undertake to state any fact from which the jury might have reasonably inferred that the whistle used on the car was insufficient to properly warn people using the crossing. On the other hand it was shown by the positive testimony of Mrs. Ainsworth and Mrs. Cunningham which was introduced by appellees that this whistle on appellant's car was capable of being heard, under ordinary conditions of weather for a mile or more and, as said by one of them, the whistle on this car was considered a clock, the car making its trips every hour, and thereby afforded to the witness a fairly accurate timepiece. Both of these witnesses, Mrs. Cunningham and Mrs. Ainsworth, lived several blocks from appellant's track in the town of Park Place, and on the very occasion in question, as the car was approaching the crossing from Galveston and while still some 500 or 600 yards south of where the accident occurred this whistle was distinctly heard. It may be true, as one of the appellees' witnesses said, that the whistle was not as strong as that of a steam whistle on a locomotive engine, and yet it would not follow from that fact that this whistle was insufficient in volume or sound to apprise persons using crossings over the interurban track of the approach of appellant's car. To require interurban cars to be equipped with such powerful whistles and bells as are usually used upon locomotive engines on railroads would perhaps constitute a source of great annoyance on many occasions. For instance, an interurban car running through the popular streets of the city of Houston and city of Galveston with a whistle shrieking like that on an ordinary locomotive engine would hardly be expected, and perhaps not tolerated, by the people of the city, and we think that because this whistle on appellant's interurban did not have the volume or carry as far as that on a locomotive engine ought to be considered no evidence that appellant's whistle on this car was insufficient for the purpose of giving warning to persons at a crossing. Of course, we would not reverse the case because of the submission of that issue, since the whole case was submitted upon special issues, but upon another trial, if the evidence as to the sufficiency of the whistle should be the same, or practically so, the court should not submit that issue to the jury.

The seventh assignment points out no prejudicial error, and it is overruled.

The eighth assignment complains of the action of the court in submitting to the jury the issue of discovered peril, and from what we have said above it follows that the assignment must be sustained, because no such issue was in the case.

The ninth assignment complains of the form of the issue of discovered peril, as submitted to the jury. It is unnecessary to discuss that matter, because the issue of discovered peril could not have properly gone to the jury in any form.

[6] There was no error in the submission of issue No. 11, which is made the basis of appellant's tenth assignment. Appellant's counsel are mistaken in what seems to be the view that issue No. 11 involved the issue of discovered peril. Without discussing that matter, owing to the length of this opinion, we simply overrule the assignment, because the issue there submitted was properly pleaded, and there was evidence in support thereof.

The eleventh assignment of error, which relates to the same matter, is overruled for the same reason.

[7] The twelfth assignment of error complains of the action of the trial court in admitting evidence, over the objection of appellant, that there was not maintained at the crossing in question a watchman or some character of an automatic crossing warning or device at the crossing where the accident happened. It is contended by appellant in this connection that there was no evidence showing that the crossing where the accident occurred was extrahazardous or extradangerous, and that therefore no negligence could be predicated upon the failure of appellant to keep a watchman or other automatic device for warning persons at that crossing. It seems to be settled by the authorities that railroad companies and street car companies can only be held negligent for failure to keep a watchman or maintain other warning devices at crossings where the circumstances surrounding the same are such as to make such crossing extrahazardous or extradangerous. We see nothing in the evidence in this record from which it could be reasonably concluded that the crossing where the accident in question occurred was extrahazardous or extradangerous. It is true, as claimed by appellees, that the little town of Park Place was incorporated, but the proof also shows that there were only about 100 families in the town, and as we see the evidence in this record, there is practically nothing at or near the crossing in question that could be said to constitute any considerable obstruction to the view of approaching cars. M., K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Magee, 92 Tex. 620, 50 S. W. 1013. Upon another trial, the matters here complained of should be obviated.

The thirteenth assignment challenges the verdict as being excessive. It is unnecessary and perhaps would be improper to pass upon this assignment, since the case must be reversed for other reasons.

The fourteenth assignment complains of the conduct of the jury in the manner in which they arrived at their verdict. It is unnecessary to determine the matter, because it will not probably occur upon another trial.

By the fifteenth assignment it is contended that the judgment should be set aside because three of the jurors in the case were alien enemies, and were not citizens of the United States, etc., and that these facts were unknown to and could not have been known, etc., by appellant at the time they were taken upon the jury. This matter will probably not occur upon another trial, and it is unnecessary to pass upon it.

[8] We now return to the second, third, and fourth assignments of error, which relate to the refusal of the trial court to give to the jury three special charges requested by appellant, designed to guide the jury in determining the issue of discovered peril, which the court had submitted over appellant's objection. The substance of the three charges was practically the same. They told the jury, in effect, that before they could determine the issue of discovered peril in favor of the plaintiffs the jury must find from the evidence that appellant's motorman actually discovered Patella in a situation of peril and realized his peril, and that the motorman actually knew and realized that Patella would go on the crossing ahead of the approaching car and be injured, before any duty would arise on the part of the motorman to stop the interurban or check its speed. Such charge did not announce a correct principle of law relative to the doctrine of discovered peril. Had the evidence been sufficient to raise such issue, it would have been proper to have instructed the jury that if the motorman actually knew that Patella was in danger, that is to say, that the motorman actually knew that Patella was unaware of the approach of the motorcar to the crossing, and that the motorman realized, under all the circumstances then attending, that Patella would probably go upon the crossing and a collision take place, and that the motorman, after having such knowledge and so realizing, could have prevented the collision, by use of means then at hand, consistent with the safety of the interurban car and its passengers, and failed to do so, then the jury would find for the plaintiffs on the issue of discovered peril, but, unless they so found the facts to be, to find for defendant on that issue. Railway Co. v. O'Donnell, 99 Tex. 636, 92 S. W. 409; Railway Co. v. Munn, 46 Tex. Civ. App. 276, 102 S. W. 442; Railway Co. v. Finn, 101 Tex. 511, 109 S. W. 918; Galveston Electric Co. v. Antonini, 152 S. W. 845.

We have said this much relative to the refused charges because it may be that the evidence on another trial will be such as to authorize the submission of the issue. Nor would we be understood to mean that the issue of discovered peril may not be raised and sustained by circumstances when sufficiently strong.

Because we are thoroughly convinced that the fifth assignment already discussed points out error which was highly prejudicial to appellant the judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded; and it is so ordered.

GALVESTON, H. & S. A. RY. CO. et al. v.
PRICE. (No. 6178.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin.
March 17, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, May 12, 1920.)

1. Railroads §350(13)—Contributory negligence ordinarily question for jury.

Ordinarily, where a person is injured on a road crossing by a railroad train, the question of contributory negligence is one for the jury.

2. Railroads §350(16)—Contributory negligence in failing to look and listen question for jury.

The mere failure to look and listen before entering on a railroad track at a public crossing is not negligence as a matter of law; but whether, under the circumstances, a reasonably prudent man would have so acted is for the jury.

3. Appeal and error §99(3)—Jury finding against contributory negligence not disturbed, if reasonable minds can differ.

Unless the appellate court can say, from all the undisputed facts and circumstances of the case, that no reasonable mind can draw any conclusion except that plaintiff was negligent in crossing a railroad track without listening or looking, the jury's finding that such act was not negligent will not be disturbed.

4. Railroads §348(10)—Jury may find freedom from negligence in reliance on signal before starting engine.

While as a general rule reliance on due care by the railroad company's servant does not excuse negligence by a person crossing the track, the jury may find absence of negligence, where the pedestrian saw a train standing near the crossing, and relied on notice of starting the train by ringing a bell or blowing the whistle.

5. Negligence §135—Jury can affirm facts negating contributory negligence, whose existence is not excluded by evidence.

Where there were any facts or circumstances excluding contributory negligence, the existence of which was not excluded by the testimony, the jury may be justified in indulging the supposition that such facts did exist.

6. Railroads §352—Special findings held not to show contributory negligence.

Special findings that a train was moving when deceased stepped on the track at a crossing without stating whether the track referred to was the one on which the train was, or another, and that deceased entered the track from a safe place, do not entitle the railroad company to judgment, notwithstanding a finding that deceased was not contributorily negligent.

7. Death §99(4)—$4,000 for death of husband held not excessive.

A verdict awarding $4,000 for the death of plaintiff's husband is not so excessive that a remittitur will be ordered to prevent reversal, since every husband has for his wife a pecuniary value beyond the amount of his earnings, which value can be assessed by the jury by the exercise of their best judgment.

8. Trial §350(3)—Special issue as to earnings properly refused as evidentiary.

In an action for death of plaintiff's husband, a special issue as to the earning capacity of deceased was properly refused, since it was only as to an evidentiary fact.

On Motion for Rehearing.

9. Railroads §350(16)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian held question for jury.

In an action for the death of a pedestrian at a railroad crossing, contributory negligence held a question for the jury, notwithstanding evidence that he stepped on the track directly in front of the moving train without looking.

Appeal from District Court, Caldwell County; M. C. Jeffrey, Judge.

Action by M. S. Price against the Galveston, Harrisburg & San Antonio Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed, and motion for rehearing overruled.

Findings of Fact.

JENKINS, J. Appellee brought this suit to recover damages on account of the death of her husband, who was run over and killed by the cars of appellant, and which was alleged to have occurred by reason of the negligence of appellant. The case was submitted upon the following special issues:

"1. Was the said W. T. Price struck by defendant's cars on a public street crossing?" To which the jury answered, "Yes."

"2. Was the bell ringing as the engine and cars approached the said street crossing?" To which the jury answered, "No."

"3. Were the parties in charge of said train of cars guilty of negligence in running said cars over and killing the said W. T. Price?" To which the jury answered, "Yes."

"4. Did the parties in charge of said train keep a lookout ahead of said train, in passing over the public street crossing where it is alleged said W. T. Price was killed, to see that no one was on said crossing and in danger of being injured by said train?" To which the jury answered, "No."

"5. If the parties in charge of said train had kept a lookout in front of said train in crossing said street crossing, could they have discovered the danger of said W. T. Price, by the exercise of ordinary care as that term has been defined, in time to have prevented killing him?" To which the jury answered, "Yes."

"6. Was there any obstruction to prevent deceased from seeing the engine and coal car ahead of it, when he approached the track from the north?" To which the jury answered, "No."

"7. Did deceased, W. T. Price, stop, look, and listen for a train of cars before entering upon defendant's track?" To which the jury answered, "No."

"8. Was the deceased, W. T. Price, guilty of contributory negligence, as that term has been defined?" To which the jury answered, "No."

"9. Did the defendants and their employees use and exercise ordinary care, as that term is herein defined, to prevent injury to persons who might be passing over said street crossing, as they were approaching said crossing?" To which the jury answered, "No."

"10. Was there a brakeman or brakemen on the west end, on the south side of the car that struck said W. T. Price, and at the time the said Price was so struck?" To which the jury answered, "No."

"11. What sum of money, if paid now, would fairly compensate the plaintiff for the pecuniary loss, if any, sustained by her by reason of the death of her husband?" To which the jury answered, "$4,000."

At the request of appellant, the court gave the following special charge:

"Gentlemen of the Jury: You are charged that if you believe from the evidence that said W. T. Price, when he was struck by said car, was west of the street crossing, then he was a trespasser on the property of defendant, and the trainmen operating said train owed said W. T. Price no duty to exercise ordinary care to prevent his injury, and if you so find you will return a verdict for the defendants."

Also, at the request of appellant, the court submitted the following special issues:

"1. Was said coal car and engine moving at the time said W. T. Price entered upon the track of defendant, and, if so, did said Price step immediately in front of said car and engine?" To which the jury answered, "Yes."

"2. Was the bell ringing just prior to the time of the accident, and just before the deceased entered upon said track?" To which the jury answered, "No."

"3. Was said train and engine stationary on said street crossing, and, if so, did they move forward just prior to said accident?" To which the jury answered, "No."

"4. Was the deceased, W. T. Price, struck by the car in front of the engine, at a point on the west of the gravel walk along the public street?" To which the jury answered, "No."

"5. Did deceased, W. T. Price, enter upon defendant's track from a safe place?" To which the jury answered, "Yes."

The evidence sustains all of the above findings by the jury. The deceased was run over and killed while crossing the principal street in the town of Caldwell, in the afternoon on a Saturday, and at a time when there was a large number of people in said town. The street runs north and south. At the place where it crosses the railroad, there are three tracks; the main track being in the center, the team track about 15 feet to the north, and the house track about the same distance to the south. The deceased was on his way to his home from the business portion of the town. He was seen by the witness Mrs. Palmer, who was crossing the street from the south side. Whether this witness saw the deceased as he stepped upon the main track, or as he stepped upon the team track, is somewhat uncertain. She states that at the time she saw him he appeared to be reading a paper; that he stepped across the north rail of the main track at a time when the coal car, which was being pushed across said street from the south, was within 2 feet of it; that she hallooed to him; and that he looked up, and as he did so was struck by the car. This is the only witness who saw the accident, except the witness Davls, who saw him as he was struck by the train.

Opinion.

The undisputed evidence in this case shows that the appellant was guilty of negligence, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the death of W. T. Price, husband of appellee. The controverted issue of fact determinative of this case is: Was the deceased guilty of negligence in entering upon the track of appellant?

[1] It has been held in some cases that a party who was injured upon a railroad track was guilty of negligence, as a matter of law, in going upon such track. In such cases it is the duty of the trial court to instruct a verdict for the defendant, and, failing to do so, if the plaintiff recovers judgment, it is the duty of the appellate court to reverse the cause, and render judgment for the appellant. Railway Co. v. Shivers, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 112, 108 S. W. 894; Railway Co. v. Kutac, 72 Tex. 651, 11 S. W. 127; Sanches v. Railway Co., 88 Tex. 117, 30 S. W. 431; Schaff v. Combs, 194 S. W. 1160; Railway Co. v. Abendroth, 55 S. W. 1122.

Ordinarily, however, the question of contributory negligence, where one is injured on a road crossing by reason of being run over by a railroad train, is a question for the determination of the jury. Trochta v. Railway Co., 218 S. W. 1038, opinion by the Supreme Court not yet [officially] published; Railway Co. v. Tinton, 117 S. W. 936; Railway v. Hilgartner, 149 S. W. 1091; Railway v. Cardena, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 300, 54 S. W. 313; Railway v. Bowles, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 118, 72 S. W. 451; Railway v. Pennington, 166 S. W. 464; Railway v. Walker, 161 S. W. 961; Railway v. Linney, 163 S. W. 1035; Railway v. Winton, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 503, 66 S. W. 483; Railway v. Tirres, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 362, 76 S. W. 806; Railway v. Anderson, 70 Tex. 244, 13 S. W. 196; Elliott on Railways, § 1163.

[2, 3] These authorities establish the doctrine that the mere failure to look and listen, before entering upon a railroad track at a public crossing, does not establish negligence as a matter of law, and that such act is not negligence, if under the facts and circumstances of the particular case a reasonably prudent man would have so acted; and this is a fact to be determined by the jury. Unless the court can say, from all of the undisputed facts and circumstances of the case, that no reasonable mind can draw any conclusion other than that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in entering upon a railroad track without listening or looking, the finding of the jury that such act was not negligence will not be disturbed.

Appellant contends that the finding of the jury herein, sustained by uncontroverted evidence, showed that the deceased, Price, was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and that for this reason the court erred in overruling its motion to enter judgment in its favor upon the findings of the jury in answer to questions Nos. 6 and 7, and to special issues Nos. 1 and 5.

By reference to questions Nos. 6 and 7, it will be seen that the jury found that the deceased did not look and listen before entering upon defendant's track, and that, had he done so, there was nothing to have prevented him from seeing the engine and coal car which ran over and killed him. A finding of the jury that the deceased did not look and listen for the train must be taken to mean that he did not do so after he was seen by the witness Mrs. Palmer, as they could not have known from the testimony whether he did so or not prior to that time. If Mrs. Palmer saw him as he entered upon the team track, she saw him in a position in which, if he had looked, he could have seen the coal car and engine on the east side of the street. It is not clear from the evidence, nor the findings of the jury, that the coal was moving at this time; but, even if it had been, there is nothing to show that the deceased did not look before reaching the team track, and, if he did so, he might have seen the car and engine standing still, with nothing to indicate that they would cross the street in front of him.

[4] While it is true that, if a party injured is guilty of negligence as a proximate cause of the injury, he will not be excused on account of the negligence of the railway company, and that he cannot, as a general rule, rely upon the fact that the railway company's servants and employes will not be negligent, still we think that if a party approach a railroad track on a public street, and a car is standing at or near the edge of the street, he may take it for granted that the car will not be pushed across the street, or, if so, that notice of same will be given by ringing a bell or blowing a whistle, and that if a party, in reliance upon such fact, should continue his journey without looking further, and the train should run over him, he would not be guilty of negligence—at least, that a jury might find absence of negligence under such circumstances.

[5, 6] We do not know upon what the jury based their answer that the defendant was not guilty of contributory negligence; but, if there were any facts or circumstances which might have existed, the existence of which was not excluded by the testimony, the jury might have been justified in indulging the supposition that such facts did exist. We cannot tell whether, by answer to special issue No. 1, the jury meant to say that the coal car and engine were moving at the time the deceased entered upon the track of defendant upon which he was killed, or at the time he entered upon the team track. If the deceased was not guilty of negligence in going upon the track of appellant, under the circumstances of this case, the mere fact that he stepped immediately in front of appellant's car would not render him guilty of such negligence. The finding of the jury that deceased entered defendant's track from a safe place is of no value in this case. Of course, so long as he was not upon appellant's track, he was in a safe place.

Perhaps the judgment in favor of appellee could be sustained upon the ground that the testimony in this case does not show that the act of the deceased in stepping upon the track of appellant was the proximate cause of his death. The evidence of the witness Jim Davis shows that when the car struck the deceased it merely bumped him over. The train at this time was moving only 3 or 4 miles an hour. The car and the engine passed over the deceased without injuring him. His clothes were caught by the cow-catcher, and he was dragged along the track some 70 feet without being injured; but at this place he was dragged over the switch frogs and was killed. Had appellant's employés been keeping a lookout, they would have seen the deceased when he was knocked over, and could have stopped the train before he was injured; so it may well be said that the failure to keep a lookout and discover the perilous situation of deceased was the real cause of his death; but for such failure he would probably not have been seriously injured. However, we rest our decision of affirmance in this case upon the ground that there were no such facts and circumstances in evidence as would prevent the jury from being the judges as to whether or not the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence under all the facts and circumstances in evidence.

[7] Appellant complains that the verdict of $4,000, in favor of appellee, is excessive. Perhaps it is a larger verdict than we would have given, had we been the jury trying the case; but it does not follow from this that it is our duty to require a remittitur in order to prevent a reversal. In Railway v. Lehmberg, 75 Tex. 61, 12 S. W. 838, in which it was insisted that the verdict was excessive, the court said:

"Every parent and husband has for his wife and children a pecuniary value beyond the amount of his earnings by his labor or vocation. That value may to some, but not to every, extent be susceptible of allegation and proof; and to the extent that it can be alleged and proved it ought to be done. * * * When no amount is fixed by law, and no rule is prescribed for making the calculation, upon facts capable of exact ascertainment, it necessarily follows, we think, that the lawmaker intended that, having reference as far as practicable to conditions existing at the time of the death, juries, from their own knowledge, experience, and sense of justice, should fix and assess the proper sum. They are expected to act uninfluenced by passion, prejudice, or partiality, and to pay due regard to the ascertained facts and conditions surrounding the subject. When it appears to the court that they have disregarded these requirements, their verdict should be set aside. On the other hand, when the court is unable to determine that these things have not been observed by the jury, and when it does not appear that the verdict is not the result of the honest endeavor of the jury to follow their own convictions, in the exercise of a power not precisely defined, we think the law intends that the jury's estimate, rather than the equally undefined one of the judges, shall prevail."

In Railway v. Hulbert, 177 S. W. 554, it was held that this doctrine applies where the surviving widow sues for the damages sustained by her, and the interest and rights of minor children are not involved.

[8] Appellant assigns error upon the refusal of the court to submit the following special issue:

"What was the average net earning capacity of deceased, W. T. Price, for the past three years?"

The refusal to submit this issue was proper, for the reason that the question was asked only as to an evidentiary fact, and an answer to the same would not have assisted the court in rendering judgment. The jury found appellee's damages to be $4,000, and the court was compelled to enter judgment in accordance with the verdict. If the jury had found that the average earning capacity of deceased for the past three years was a very small amount, this would not have justified the court in not entering judgment for the $4,000. It might have been very persuasive argument on motion for a new trial, on grounds that the verdict was excessive, but all the evidence as to this matter was before the court, and could have been considered by it, and doubtless was, on the motion for new trial on this issue.

Finding no error of record, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

We modify our findings of fact to the extent of finding that the witness, Mrs. Palmer, saw the deceased as he entered upon the switch track, and also that she saw him step upon the main track, about 2 feet in front of the moving car, and that he did not stop and look from the time that she saw him until he was struck by the car.

[9] The evidence in this case makes a strong showing of negligence on the part of the deceased, but, in view of the recent decisions of our Supreme Court in Trochta v. Railway Co., 218 S. W. 1088, and in Kirksey v. Southern Traction Co., 217 S. W. 139, neither of which has been [officially] reported, we hold that the question of contributory negligence was one for the jury.

Motion overruled.

STUBBS v. MOURSUND. (No. 6165.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin.
Feb. 4, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 2, 1920.)

1. Elections \S 293(1)—Ballot with erased lead pencil marks held ambiguous, authorizing explanation by voter.

A ballot at a general election cast for district and county clerk, whereon perpendicular lead pencil lines had been drawn through all the party tickets, one of them indicating an attempted erasure, and other horizontal pencil marks had been made through the names of certain candidates, the face of the ballot was ambiguous, and permitted the voter who cast it to explain why he voted it in that condition.

2. Elections \S 190—Mutilated ballot should be counted if voter's intent can be ascertained therefrom.

There is no statutory law prohibiting a mutilated ballot from being counted, and if the intent of the voter can be ascertained by the ballot cast, in the light of surrounding circumstances, effect should be given to the ballot in accordance with such intent.

3. Elections \S 190—Ballot containing partly erased lead pencil marks held not "mutilated."

A ballot cast for district and county clerk, containing horizontal marks through names of certain candidates, and also perpendicular lead pencil marks through all the party tickets, one of which marks, indicating an attempted erasure, held not a "mutilated" ballot; "mutilated" meaning "destitute or deprived of some essential or valuable part; greatly shortened."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mutilate.]

4. Elections \S 180(7)—Pencil mark through names of candidates held to indicate intention not to vote for them.

Where a ballot cast at an election for district and county clerk bore horizontal lead pencil marks through the initials of the names of candidates for that office, such ballot held sufficiently to indicate that the voter did not intend to vote for such candidates, but did intend to vote for those whose names were not marked in any respect.

5. Officers \S 78—Statute for contesting elections does not destroy previously existing right of litigating title to office.

The statute providing for contesting elections does not destroy the right which existed before it was enacted to litigate the title to an office.

6. Elections \S 238—Where candidate legally elected special election to determine tie will not oust him.

Where a candidate for the office of county and district clerk was legally elected at a general election, a special election ordered thereafter, on the ground that the vote was a tie, held not to deprive such candidate of his right to hold the office.

Appeal from District Court, Blanco County; Geo. Calhoun, Special Judge, by exchange with Judge Stubbs, disqualified.

Proceedings for mandamus by Albert Moursund against B. J. Stubbs. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

White, Cartledge & Wilcox and Fiset & Shelley, all of Austin, for appellant.

R. E. McKie, of San Marcos, and V. B. Goar, of Johnson City, for appellee.

KEY, C. J. At the general election held in 1918, B. J. Stubbs was elected district and county clerk of Blanco county, and qualified and served as such. At the general election held November 5, 1918, he was a candidate for re-election, and Albert Moursund was a candidate for the same office. In due time after the election the commissioners' court of Blanco county canvassed the election returns, and ascertained and declared, as the result of such election, that Stubbs and Moursund had each received 841 votes, and ordered a special election for that office, to be held on December 21, 1918. That election was held, Stubbs and Moursund being the only candidates, and the result being a majority of 78 votes for Moursund. After canvassing the returns, the commissioners' court declared Moursund duly elected, and issued to him a certificate to that effect. Thereafter, and within due time, Moursund gave the bond required by statute, which was properly approved, and he also took the oath of office required by the Constitution; also, and within due time he received a commission from the Governor of Texas, reciting that he had been duly elected, etc.

After the result of the special election had been declared, Stubbs notified the commissioners' court that he considered such election illegal, and held without authority of law, and contended that he had received a majority of the votes cast in the general election on November 5, 1918, and therefore claimed the right to such office. He also took the oath of office required by the Constitution, and tendered to the commissioners' court an official bond in due form, which the court declined to receive and approve.

After receiving his certificate of election and qualifying as stated, Moursund demanded of Stubbs possession of the office rooms, furniture, record books, papers, and paraphernalia belonging to the office, which Stubbs refused to surrender; and on February 25, 1919, Moursund brought this suit against Stubbs, praying for a writ of mandamus, compelling the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff the rooms provided by the county for the use of the county and district clerk, together with all books, papers, records, archives, and paraphernalia belonging or pertaining to the office of county and district clerk of Blanco county, etc.

The defendant Stubbs filed an answer, including a general and special exception, a general and special denial, and special answer, averring that he was duly elected county and district clerk of Blanco county at the election held on the 5th of November, 1918; and therefore the commissioners' court had no authority to order the election held on the 21st day of December following, and that the same and the proceedings connected therewith were and are wholly void. The special plea referred to alleged that while the returns sent in to the commissioners' court showed that the plaintiff and defendant each received 841 votes, a mistake was made by the election officers in tabulating and preparing the returns from one of the election precincts, by which the plaintiff Moursund was allowed one vote more than he received. The plea also alleged that several persons not entitled to vote were permitted to vote for the plaintiff, Moursund, and that, after excluding such illegal votes, he (the defendant) received a majority of the legal votes cast at the election held November 5, 1918.

The plaintiff filed his supplemental petition, demurring and excepting to the defendant's cross-action upon various grounds. It also contained a general denial and other averments, tending to show that the defendant had not complied with the statute regulating contested elections; and specially denied that the defendant received a majority of the legal votes cast at the election held November 5, 1918; and averred that, if that election did not in fact result in plaintiff and defendant each receiving an equal number of the qualified votes, then that he (plaintiff) received a majority of such votes, and that ballots were counted for the defendant in that election which should not have been so counted, because they were illegal, and ballots were not counted for the plaintiff which were legal and should have been counted; and the plea sets out with particularity the alleged legal and illegal ballots referred to.

The defendant filed a supplemental answer which contained a general and several special exceptions to the plaintiff's supplemental petition and a general denial of the allegations therein.

The plaintiff filed a second supplemental petition, in which he withdrew certain allegations in his first supplemental petition, charging that Will Crossley was not a legal voter, and alleging that the averment withdrawn was made by inadvertence, and that Crossley was a qualified voter. The plaintiff also filed a trial amendment, setting up some additional facts relating to the legality of certain votes that were cast for the defendant.

The defendant filed a second supplemental answer, which contained exceptions to the plaintiff's trial amendment, and a general denial of the allegations contained therein, and a special denial, and several averments relating to the right of certain persons to vote.

The plaintiff filed a second trial amendment, charging that certain other persons, who were not entitled to vote, were permitted to vote for the defendant; and alleging certain additional facts relating to the validity of certain votes, already put in issue by the pleadings.

There was a non-jury trial, in which the court overruled the various demurrers and exceptions presented by each party, and, after hearing and considering the case upon its merits, rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the relief prayed for, and the defendant has appealed.

The trial court filed findings of fact, which, in so far as they are challenged by appellant, this court holds are sustained by testimony.

Neither time nor reasonable regulation concerning the length of opinions will permit review and discussion of all the testimony bearing on the issues referred to. However, two of the original ballots have been sent up for the inspection of this court, and some observations concerning them are deemed appropriate.

Ballot No. 29 was voted by Edwin Bindsell, a qualified voter. It consists of five perpendicular columns, the first headed "Democratic Party"; the second, "Republican Party"; the third, "Socialist Party"; the fourth, "Independent Party"; and the fifth having no heading. The Democratic column had the names on it of Democratic nominees, no names appearing thereon for county and precinct offices, presumably because that party made no nominations for such offices. The Republican column was substantially the same, while the Socialist column had names of candidates for most, but not all, state offices, but none for county offices. The Independent column had no names on it for any office above representative in the Legislature, but had the name of one candidate for county judge; no candidate for county attorney; Albert Moursund and B. J. Stubbs, for county and district clerk; J. B. Johnson and A. J. Wagner, candidates for sheriff and tax collector; G. A. Cammack, candidate for tax assessor; J. E. Page, W. E. Stevenson, and J. C. Goar, candidates for county treasurer; and Max H. Lungwitz, candidate for county surveyor. The other column, which had no heading, had printed on it, as had all the other columns, the title of the different offices, but no names were printed in that column. The ballot shows on its face that perpendicular pencil lines were run through all the columns, and that such line on the Independent column extended through and beyond the names of both Albert Moursund and B. J. Stubbs, on through the names of both candidates for sheriff, of the candidate for tax assessor, the three candidates for county treasurer, and the candidate for county surveyor. However, an inspection of it indicates that an unsuccessful effort had been made to erase that perpendicular line, which was made with a pencil, and the same indication appears with reference to the perpendicular line which was made across the column which had no heading and no names upon it. The face of the ballot also shows quite plainly that horizontal pencil marks had been made through the name of B. J. Stubbs, candidate for county and district clerk; A. J. Wagner, candidate for sheriff and tax collector; and J. E. Page and J. C. Goar, candidates for county treasurer; while the names of Albert Moursund, candidate for county and district clerk, J. R. Johnson, candidate for sheriff and tax collector, and W. E. Stevenson, candidate for county treasurer, were not marked otherwise than by the perpendicular line, which passed through the names of all of the candidates in that column.

[1] Such being its condition, the trial court held, and we think correctly, that the face of the ballot was ambiguous, and permitted the voter who cast the same to explain why he voted it in that condition. He testified that the perpendicular pencil mark through the column headed "Independent Party" was inadvertently made, and that he undertook to erase it, but, the eraser being defective, he was unable to accomplish that result; whereupon he ran pencil lines horizontally through the names of the candidates he did not desire to vote for, and left the names of the candidates for whom he intended to vote without any such marks upon them.

The trial court held that appellee, Moursund, was entitled to have the ballot referred to counted for him, and we sustain that ruling.

In Davis v. State, 75 Tex. 430, 12 S. W. 957, the Supreme Court held that a ballot should be construed as any other written instrument, and, in the event the intention of the voter is clear, extrinsic evidence should not be admitted; but, if from the face of the ballot, the intention be doubtful, then evidence of the circumstances under which it was made out, if calculated to throw light upon the intention, should be admitted.

Counsel for appellant present the contention that the ballot referred to shows upon its face that it had been mutilated; and, therefore, inasmuch as the statute provides that when a ballot has been mutilated the voter may return the same to the election officer and receive another ballot, the ballot under consideration should not be counted for either party.

[2] There is no statutory law which prohibits a mutilated ballot from being counted, and the general trend of decisions in this respect is to hold that, if the intent of the voter can be ascertained by the ballot cast, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, effect should be given to the ballot in accordance with such intent.

In Hanscom v. State, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 638, 31 S. W. 547, Judge Williams, speaking for the Galveston Court of Appeals, said:

"It is a mistake to assume that it works any such radical change in the election laws of this state as has been wrought in other states by the adoption of a new and complete system of election laws modeled after that of Australia. Decisions of the courts of those states enforcing the minute and rigid regulations of their statutes have often very little application here, and are apt to be misleading rather than otherwise."

However, we are not prepared to hold that the ballot in question was a mutilated ballot within the purview of the statute. The Standard Dictionary defines the word "mutilated" to mean, "destitute or deprived of some essential or valuable part; greatly shortened." It defines the word "mutilate," "to cut off or deprive of a limb or essential part." The Century Dictionary gives substantially the same definitions.

[3] The ballot under consideration is complete in all respects, and is not mutilated, unless it be that the perpendicular line running through the names of all candidates, and the horizontal marks placed through the names of appellant, Stubbs, and several other candidates, constitute mutilation, and we hold that they do not.

In the case last cited the court said:

"Mere marks are not among the things which are declared to avoid the ballot, unless they are 'stamp marks.'"

There is no law in this state declaring void and prohibiting the counting of a ballot which has been inadvertently or improperly marked, and if such ballot, either upon its face or when construed in connection with surrounding circumstances, indicates, with reasonable certainty, how the elector intended to vote, it should be so construed as to give effect to such intention. Hence we hold that the trial court ruled correctly in counting the ballot in question in favor of appellee.

[4] Original ballot No. 130 is in this condition. It is printed in the same form as the one just considered, and has plain pencil marks running horizontally through the initials of B. J. Stubbs, candidate for county and district clerk; A. J. Wagner, candidate for sheriff and tax collector; W. E. Stevenson and J. C. Goar, candidates for county treasurer, leaving unmarked the names of Albert Moursund, candidate for county and district clerk; J. R. Johnson, candidate for sheriff and tax collector; and J. E. Page, candidate for county treasurer. The names of the Republican and Socialist candidates for governor, lieutenant governor, and comptroller were so marked as to indicate that the voter did not intend to vote for either of those candidates; but there are no other marks anywhere on the ballot, except those referred to as "horizontal marks" through the initials of appellant, Stubbs, and some other candidates for county offices. As both the Democratic and Republican columns had candidates' names printed on them down to and including candidates for Congress, except there were no Republican candidates for the Court of Civil Appeals and for district attorney, and as the voter did not attempt to erase any of the names in the Republican column below that of comptroller, and as the Democratic nominees were the only candidates for the Court of Civil Appeals and district attorney, it is quite evident that with the exception of United States senator, governor, lieutenant governor, and comptroller, the voter did not intend to vote except for county offices, unless it be that he intended to vote for the Democratic candidates for the Court of Civil Appeals and district attorney, whose names were printed in the Democratic column, and who had no opposition; and the question is, did the horizontal marks, which he made through the initials of certain candidates, sufficiently indicate that he did not intend to vote for such candidates, but did intend to vote for those whose names were not marked in any respect? The trial court held that it did, and we are not prepared to say that that holding was erroneous.

The law requires the voter to run a mark through the names of the candidates for whom he does not desire to vote, thereby leaving but one name unmarked to indicate the candidate for whom he intends to vote. It would be construing the law too strictly to hold that the mark referred to must extend all the way through the entire name, in order to indicate that the voter did not intend to vote for that person. To illustrate: Suppose in this case the horizontal mark, which extended through the initials "B. J.," had extended on through half, or even through the first letter, of the word "Stubbs," would any one deny that such mark failed to indicate that the voter did not intend to cast his ballot for Mr. Stubbs? Or suppose the initials had been left unmarked, and the pencil mark run through the name "Stubbs" could it reasonably be contended that such mark did not show, with sufficient certainty, that the elector intended to vote for Albert Moursund, and not for B. J. Stubbs? And the fact that the voter marked the names of three other candidates in the same manner tends strongly to show that he intended to vote for candidates for three offices, which were county and district clerk, sheriff, and treasurer; and when he marked names of candidates for all those offices, and left unmarked one name for each office, we think it appears, with sufficient certainty, that he intended to vote for those whose names were in no wise marked.

As pertinent to this ballot and the question under consideration, we quote as follows from the opinion of the Supreme Court, in Davis v. State, 75 Tex. 480, 12 S. W. 960:

"It is shown by the bill of exceptions that the court, over the objections of respondent, counted the vote of one George Rector for relator. The ground of the objection was that both names appeared upon the ballot, and that neither appeared to have been erased. The original ballot is in the record, and upon it, just above the name of Davis, which is above that of Wren, there is found a broad pencil line, obliterating a part of the first initial of the former's name, and barely touching the second. In discussing the two original ballots sent up with the record, we have spoken of erasures. We mean constructive erasures—that is to say, such lines drawn across the names as clearly show an intention to erase them. In both ballots the lines are made with a pencil, and are so faint that the printing beneath is perfectly legible. None of the names are actually erased. The line, however, is usually drawn through the name from the beginning to the end. In this case there is a broad line drawn just above the name of Davis, and very close to it, which it is to be presumed was drawn for some purpose. It does touch two letters of the name, and erases in part the first—that is to say, the distinctive legal initial. 'It is not necessary to obliterate the name entirely.' McCrary on Elec. § 411.

"We think, in the absence of proof explaining the ambiguity of the ballot, the court did not err in treating it as if Davis' name was erased, and in counting it for relator."

Appellant's challenges of most of the other votes complained of are based upon the ground that persons who cast such votes were not at that time residents of Blanco county, and therefore were not entitled to vote. We have carefully considered the testimony, which, in some respects, is conflicting, and have reached the conclusion that the findings of the trial court, in the respects complained of by appellant, are sustained by evidence.

[5, 6] Appellee has presented numerous cross-assignments, some relating to the action of the trial court in overruling demurrers and exceptions, and others complaining of the findings of fact relating to alleged illegality of votes cast for appellant, which questions it is not necessary for this court to decide, as the conclusions already announced must lead to an affirmance of the judgment in appellee's favor. However, as it is earnestly insisted in behalf of appellee that the trial court erred in not sustaining appellee's exceptions to appellant's cross-action, and as numerous authorities in other jurisdictions are cited in support of that contention, we deem it proper to say that we are inclined to agree with appellant's contention, which, in substance, is that notwithstanding the fact that we have a statute which provides for contesting elections, that statute does not destroy the right which existed before it was enacted to litigate the title to an office; and if appellant was legally elected at the general election held November 5, 1918, it seems to us that the special election ordered thereafter, together with the result of such election, should not be held to deprive him of his right to hold the office. The statute regulating contested elections did not afford him an adequate remedy. As the commissioners' court declared no one was elected at the November election, he had no right and could not institute a contest, and he does not claim to have had any right to contest the subsequent election, if it was lawfully held. Such being the case, under our liberal system of procedure we feel inclined to hold that he had the right in this case to resist the plaintiff's claim, upon the ground that he was legally elected at the general election held in November, 1918.

Appellee's other cross-assignments, relating to the legality of certain votes counted for appellant have not been passed upon, because the judgment in appellee's favor can be affirmed without doing so.

All of the questions presented in appellant's brief have been considered, and are decided against him.

In conclusion, we desire to commend counsel for both appellant and appellee for the assistance rendered this court by the helpful briefs and arguments filed by them.

Our conclusion is that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

MAGEE v. MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. OF TEXAS. (No. 6498.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. May 19, 1920.)

Carriers §328(2)—Railroad not liable for injury to one attempting to board train on side on which passengers were not being received.

Railroad company held not liable for loss of leg, through sudden movement of its train, of one who claimed he came to its depot to meet a brother coming in on a train, where the injured man was hurt by an outgoing train while seeking to enter it, not from the side where passengers were boarding it, where there was a platform, but from the other side, where there was no platform, no lights, and the doors to the train were closed.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; J. T. Sluder, Judge.

Action by Wirt Magee against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway of Texas. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Childs, of San Antonio, for appellant.

F. C. Davis, of San Antonio, C. C. Huff, of Dallas, and Marshall Butz, of San Antonio, for appellee.

FLY, C. J. Appellant instituted this suit against appellee for damages arising from the loss of a leg through the negligence of appellee in suddenly moving a train, without notice or signal, into which he was endeavoring to enter. After hearing the evidence the court instructed a verdict for appellee, which was accordingly returned by the jury, and judgment rendered thereon.

There is but one assignment which necessitates a review of all the testimony, at least that could be considered favorable to the claim of appellant. The only important witness for appellant was appellant himself, the propriety or impropriety of the peremptory instruction resting on whether his testimony could possibly form the basis for a verdict in his favor. He was corroborated in the assertion that he was a drafted soldier; that he was away from camp on a pass; and that in some way he was so injured, in the yard of appellee, on the night of December 9, 1917, that he lost one of his legs.

He stated that he went to the passenger depot of appellee between 8 and 9 o'clock on the night of December 9, 1917, to meet a sick brother, who had written him a letter. The letter was not shown, nor did the sick brother testify, although it transpired that the brother was not on the train and did not come to San Antonio for two months after the accident. He stated that he went to the depot to assist the sick brother off the train with his baggage, and went to the window and asked the agent if there was a train in, and he said, "Yes." He then went out the door of the station and saw three or four trains standing there and—

"a fellow standing there, looked to be a railroad man, and I asked him if the train was in; I asked him if he was in charge of the railroad; I told him I had a sick brother on there and I wanted to help him off with his baggage and he just says, 'Go ahead.' I asked him if it was a Katy train and I went on out. This fellow I saw standing there was telling the railroad people to do this and that around there."

He further testified:

"Yes; I asked him which was the Katy train. And I went on down the side of the train looking in the windows there, and I saw a fellow that I knew, Evans Wilkinson, a friend of mine and my brother's, and I thought by seeing him on there that maybe my brother was on there too, with him. So I started to get on the train, and just as I started to get on, got my foot up there, the train kind of moved up quick and I got unbalanced some way up there, which throwed me, and I rolled and my foot somehow got under the wheel there—I don't know just exactly how it was—and just cut it off right there. The train was standing still when I went to step on it. Just as I started to get up on the step—I had my foot up there—the train moved up and throwed me. I rolled and got my foot under the train. The train was a passenger train. My purpose in going on that train was to help my brother off and see Evans Wilkinson. I wanted to see Evans Wilkinson about some business. I wanted to see him; also I wanted to see both of them. * * * When I stepped up on the steps there was nothing occurred to indicate or warn me that the train was going to move. Nothing like a bell or whistle or the conductor or anything like that."

Appellant swore that there was no one at or near the train when he undertook to board it, and that there were no platforms. He said "a fellow" pointed out the train to him. He swore that there were no platforms "no steps, no box, or anything to get in on," and he did not know whether he was on the east or west side of the train. He also testified that he saw no one on the side of the train on which he tried to climb. When examined by the court, appellant testified:

"Yes, sir; I have been down there since the accident and I saw these platforms there where passengers get on. There are platforms there between the tracks where people get on and off. There wasn't any platform on the side of the train I attempted to get on. It wasn't up against the platform. I don't know whether the other side of the train was up against the platform or not."

He also said there were no platforms, but cement sidewalks.

The uncontradicted testimony of appellee showed that appellant was hurt by an outgoing train that left about 9 o'clock p. m. Passengers boarded the train on the west side, where there was a platform, but there was no platform on the east side. San Antonio is a terminal for appellee, and the trains go no further than the place in the yard near the depot where appellant was hurt. All trains come in from and go out in a southerly direction. The train which hurt appellant was the first section of No. 26, the "Katy Flier." An employé of appellee swore, and he was not contradicted, that when the first section moved out he was standing on the platform west of the train, and he heard a groan and scream on the east side and as soon as the train passed he crossed over the track and he and two soldiers picked appellant up, carried him across the track, and laid him on the platform. There were a large number of people on the platform at that time. There was no platform nor lights on the east side of the train and the doors were closed. Others testified to seeing blood on the east side of the track, where passengers were never received. It was made of gravel and rocks between the tracks, and was not for ingress or egress.

Appellant did not know on which side of the train he sought to enter, but he knew there were no platforms and steps there. Although a passenger train was preparing to leave, he swore that there was not a human being on the side of the train where he was hurt. He said: "I didn't see anybody there at this place where I attempted to get on—passengers or anybody else." He was looking for a train discharging passengers, yet no one was there, and to convince him that he was not at a train delivering passengers he says he saw a friend in one of the cars, who it seems was not there and consequently could not have disembarked. The man he saw must have left on the train. If he received a letter from his sick brother, it was not produced, and the brother not only did not come at that time but did not testify at the trial and no effort was made to obtain his deposition, although his residence in Texas was well known to appellant. No human being corroborated a single statement made by him except that he was hurt and had a pass on his person. No letter was found in his pocket. Wilkinson was not in San Antonio that night, nor was his brother there. No one else has intimated that the brother was sick when the accident occurred. There was no evidence as to when any train came in on the night in question. If appellant did ask any one about the train that had come in, he did not indicate who it was. He did not swear that "the fellow" wore any uniform or badge, nor how he knew the men he was ordering around were railroad men. His testimony alone shows that he could not have been on the side of the train where people entered or left the cars, and in fact he stated he saw no one entering or leaving. The only reasonable way to account for the absence of every one on the side of the train where he was hurt was that he had for some purpose of his own gone on the dark side, where there was no platform and where he was a trespasser.

If he was a licensee on the premises to help his brother off a train that had just come, that did not license him to endeavor to enter an outgoing train; and appellee would not be liable unless some agent of the company had induced him to attempt to board it, or knew of his position of danger and with such knowledge gave no notice of the intention to move. All the facts go to show that no one showed him the outgoing train and told him that it was the one which had just come in, and all the facts tend to show that he was not trying to board the train where any one would expect him to make such endeavor.

Appellant does not pretend that any one, whether connected with the train or not, knew he was trying to get on the train that was about to leave for the north. He made it impossible for any one to have seen him, for he reiterated that there was no one on that side of the train. It is utterly incredible that any one told him that train had just come in, and any one of the most ordinary intelligence should have known that if the train had just come in persons would be getting off. No one was getting off. No one was getting on, and consequently it is certain appellant was not on the side of the train where people got on. He was undoubtedly found on the east side of the train, where he had no right to be. Four trains were standing on the different tracks in the yard.

The movement of the train was not shown to be negligent. Every quick movement of a train is not negligent, and it was not shown that appellee knew that appellant was in a place where movement of the train would injure him. Appellant gave no description of the train by the time it was due or in any way identified it, but asked if the "Katy train" was in and was told it was. There may have been several that had come in.

The cases cited by appellant as to due notice to those who, he says, go to trains "to welcome the coming or speed the parting guest," refer to parties going at train time to depots to place relatives or friends on trains or to assist them off, and not to a person going on the side of a train where no one can see him, and where no one gets off or on. He was not licensed to go to any such place. If he had gone to the proper train, on the platform side, at the time when it arrived, to assist his brother to alight, he was a licensee, and appellee would have owed him ordinary care in his protection. But when he entered the yards and wandered off to a train going out, on the side where no one got off or on, without the knowledge of appellee, it owed him no duty. Appellee was under no obligation to provide a guide or bodyguard to prevent appellant from wandering into places where reason and common sense should have taught him he should not go.

The judgment is affirmed.

POSS v. KUHLMANN. (No. 6353.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. March 10, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 16, 1920.)

Wills §130—Application for probate held to show a valid holographic will.

An instrument, signed and dated, and in terms: "To Mrs. Eugenia Poss auto and $5,000," is shown by application for probate to be a valid holographic will; application alleging the instrument was wholly in the handwriting of deceased, made just before his death, and accompanied by his statement that he intended it as a gift to P., and that the auto and money described therein should be given to P. after his death, it being capable of being relieved of ambiguity by parol evidence.

Appeal from District Court, Kendall County; R. H. Burney, Judge.

Application by Mrs. Eugenia Poss to probate a will, opposed by P. Kuhlmann, administrator. Application dismissed, and appellant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. A. Wurzbach, of San Antonio, for appellant.

Davis & Long and H. B. Cline, all of San Antonio, and F. W. Schweppe, of Boerne, for appellee.

COBBS, J. This is an application to probate a will as the last will and testament of Wm. Kuhlmann, deceased. Appellant alleged in her application:

"That William Kuhlmann departed this life on the 18th day of December, A. D. 1918, leaving real and personal property of the estimated value of $30,000. That said William Kuhlmann, deceased, resided at the time of his death in Kendall county, state of Texas. That on the 17th day of December, A. D. 1918, the said William Kuhlmann made the following writing, which is wholly in the handwriting of said William Kuhlmann as follows, to wit: 'Dec 17 To Mrs. Eugenia Poss auto and $5,000 Dollars Wm. Kuhlmann 1918.' That said writing was intended by the said William Kuhlmann as his last will and testament, that he made the same about 12 hours before his death, and that a short time thereafter, and before his death, which occurred about 11:30 a. m. on December 18, 1918, he declared that he intended the same as a gift to the said Mrs. Eugenia Poss, and that the said auto and $5,000 described in said writing should be given to the said Mrs. Eugenia Poss after his death, and that your petitioner believes, and therefore alleges, the writing to be the last will and testament of said deceased, and which is herewith filed."

Phillip Kuhlmann, as the administrator of said estate, appeared, filed exceptions to the application to probate the same as the last will and testament of said decedent, and filed an answer, contesting the same. The court, after hearing argument, sustained a general exception thereto, and, appellant refusing to amend, the same was dismissed at his cost, from which action of the court in dismissing the application appellant appealed to this court.

The ruling of the court is alleged to be erroneous, and is challenged by proper assignments presented here. This was claimed to be a will written wholly in the handwriting of the testator, as provided by our statute. The demurrer, of course, admitted the allegations of the pleader, but challenged the statement as sufficient to show a valid will. Appellee cites the case of Adams v. Maris, 213 S. W. 623, in support of his contention. He cites no other case, and wholly relies on it. This opinion is delivered by the Commission of Appeals, on reversing and rendering in part, and in affirming in part, the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals of the Seventh District, reported in 166 S. W. 475.

The language of the instrument itself is very obscure to evidence a gift or devise or when to take effect. The instrument bears date the 17th day of December, 1918, and the application to probate alleges the death as of 18th day of December, 1918. It further alleges he made the same about 12 hours before his death, and that a short time thereafter and before his death, which occurred about 11:30 a. m. on December 18, 1918, he declared that he intended the same as a gift to the said Mrs. Eugenia Poss, and that the said auto and $5,000, described in said writing, should be given to the said Mrs. Eugenia Poss after his death. The statute prescribes the allegations necessary to be made in an application to probate a will. Article 3251; Bradshaw v. Roberts, 52 S. W. 574. And article 3271 prescribes facts which must be proven before admitting to probate. It is the duty of the court to require all facts to be drawn out upon the execution of a paper offered for probate. Hopf v. State, 72 Tex. 281, 10 S. W. 589.

It is important, in passing on the ruling of the court on the demurrers to the application as a whole, to ascertain the meaning, as far as possible, of the testator, to develop all the facts bearing on the question. Hopf v. State, supra. This is necessary to discover his intention. In Winfree v. Winfree, 139 S. W. p. 41, the court says:

"In the case of Hawes v. Foote, 64 Tex. 22, our Supreme Court says: 'Liberal allowance is made in construing wills to mere casualties or ignorance or awkwardness in the use of words in their exact sense and in the structure of sentences, for the purpose of attaining the paramount object—the real intention of the testator. The law will not allow the testator's intention to be defeated because he has not clothed his ideas in technical language.' * * * When the meaning of the words used in a will is ambiguous, the court, in order to arrive at the intention of the testator, must be put as near as may be in his environment, 'stand in his shoes, and look with his perspective through his eyes,' and to enable the court to do this parol evidence of the conditions and circumstances surrounding the parties and the execution of the instrument is always admissible. Peet v. Railway Co., 70 Tex. 527, 8 S. W. 206; Weller v. Weller, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 247, 54 S. W. 852; Clark v. Catron, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 51, 56 S. W. 100."

See Hunting v. Jones, 183 S. W. 860; Held-enheimer v. Bauman, 84 Tex. 182, 19 S. W. 382, 31 Am. St. Rep. 29.

Taking into consideration that this instrument was wholly in the handwriting of the testator, immediately preceding his death, and the further fact that on his deathbed he declared he intended it as a gift, is a strong circumstance to be taken into consideration in support of its validity. Lawson et al. v. Estate of J. P. Dawson, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 361, 53 S. W. 64.

The main question that can be raised against the instrument as a will is its ambiguity. It is admitted by the demurrer to be in the handwriting of the testator and bears his true signature, made shortly before his death, accompanied by a statement as to what he desired done with it. That statement relieves it of part of its ambiguity and shows his intent. This will does not from the pleading evidence an intention to make a gift inter vivos, for it was not consummated by delivery, but the facts evidence an intention to make a gift to take effect after his death. In such a case parol evidence is admissible. In Adams v. Maris, 213 S. W. 626, 627, the court has this to say:

"The words are not ambiguous to the extent that they are unmeaning, or inconsistent with themselves to the extent that parol evidence is not admissible to aid in making clear what they mean. Ferguson v. Ferguson, supra; Cyc. vol. 17, pp. 680-682; Jones on Evidence, § 473; Meyers v. Maverick, 28 S. W. 716; Page on Wills, 998; Schouler on Wills, § 581; Gardner on Wills, 388. The courts are reluctant to declare wills, as well as contracts, void for uncertainty. They have in cases in which no question of fraud arises resorted to 'every shift,' rather than declare the gift void for such reason. Doe ex dem. Winter v. Parratt, 6 Man. & G. 362. While doubtless not a wise policy to go to such extreme to effectuate an uncertain intention, it is safe to follow the rule announced in Jones on Evidence, that 'it is only when the instrument is unintelligible or uncertain after the extrinsic evidence as to the situation of the parties and the surrounding circumstances have been received, that a true patent ambiguity is established.' Jones on Evidence, vol. 1, § 474."

We believe the court erred in sustaining a general exception to appellant's application, and reverse the judgment of the court, and remand the cause for a new trial.

On Motion for Rehearing.

The application for probate of the instrument sufficiently alleges that the very instrument copied in the petition was intended by Kuhlmann as his last will and testament. The general demurrer and so-called special exceptions, which were also general demurrers, were sustained on the theory that the instrument declared on must on its face contain words evidencing a gift of some kind. In support of the contention the case of Smith v. Smith, 112 Va. 206, 70 S. E. 491, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018, is specially relied on, and some cases are cited which are not available. We do not regard said case of Smith v. Smith as sustaining the contention made. The expressions particularly relied on were made in view of the facts of that particular case, and when the opinion is considered as a whole, it appears that the court was of the opinion that the language, "Everything is Lou's," could be shown to be a will if the facts and circumstances surrounding the execution thereof showed that such instrument was intended as a will, but that evidence of expressions of an intention to make that kind of a will having no reference to the particular instrument would not be sufficient to entitle the instrument to be admitted to probate. We call attention to the court's quotation from Jarmon on Wills, and to the discussion of the attending circumstances, all of which we believe show that the opinion sustains our holding in this case.

We conclude that the motion for rehearing should be overruled.

HOLMES v. UVALDE NAT. BANK et al. (No. 6393.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. May 12, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 2, 1920.)

1. Trial \S 232(2) — General charge controlling half amount sued for in case submitted on special issues properly refused.

Where suit against a bank, its directors, and liquidating agent, to recover deposits made by plaintiff, was submitted on special issues, general charge to control the disposition of at least half the amount sued for was properly refused to plaintiff.

2. Trial \S 191(1)—Charge assuming as facts matters whereon jury could have found to contrary properly refused.

Charge for plaintiff assuming as facts matters whereon the jury could have found to the contrary, which were important and decisive in the case, was properly refused.

3. Appeal and error \S 730(2)—Assignments as to giving or refusal of charges without stating substance not considered.

Assignments of error complaining of giving of certain charges or refusal of others, without stating even substance of charges, should not be considered; a reference to bills of exceptions without giving substance of them not complying with rules of Courts of Civil Appeals, and it not being incumbent on an appellate court to search record for matters that should be supplied by appellant.

4. Trial \S 352(4) — Issue whether cashier converted plaintiff's funds held properly refused.

In suit against a bank, its directors, and liquidating agent for deposits made by plaintiff, refusal of trial court to place before jury issue whether bank's cashier had converted any money of plaintiff to his own use held proper in view of the evidence.

5. Banks and banking \S 112—Bank's knowledge cashier had authority to draw from plaintiff's loan account held not to make it liable for conversion.

If a bank had known that its cashier had authority to draw out money deposited in a loan account of plaintiff, the fact would not have charged the bank with notice the cashier was loaning or pretending to loan such money for plaintiff, nor make the bank liable for the cashier's conversion of it.

6. Banks and banking \S 108—Cashier's loans in name of bank for depositor did not bind bank.

It was not within the scope of the agency of the cashier of a bank to make loans in the name of the bank for depositors, and the bank was not bound by his acts in making such loans.

7. Principal and agent \S 180—Rule of imputation of knowledge destroyed by action adverse to principal.

Presumption that an agent has performed duty to communicate to principal knowledge possessed by him relative to subject-matter of agency, basis of rule imputing notice to principal of acts of the agent, is destroyed where the agent, nominally acting as such, in reality acts in his own or in another's interest adversely to his principal.

8. Banks and banking \S 116(6)—Bank not chargeable with knowledge of cashier acting adversely.

Though a bank knew plaintiff had deposited his money, and that its cashier had authority to draw it whenever he desired, the bank was not charged with knowledge its cashier had authority from plaintiff to lend the money for him, nor that the cashier had appropriated plaintiff's money to his own use, and had forged notes to hide his crime; any action by cashier being adverse to bank, preventing imputation of his knowledge to it.

9. Banks and banking \S 258—National bank not authorized to contract to lend money of depositor.

Under Rev. St. U. S. \S 5136 (U. S. Comp. St. \S 9661), a national bank had no authority to enter into a contract for loaning money of a depositor kept in a deposit account through its cashier authorized by the depositor to draw thereon to make loans.

10. Banks and banking \S 112—Bank not liable for moneys used by cashier in manner ultra vires as to bank.

Where money is deposited in bank, and the cashier is authorized and paid as an individual by the depositor to act for the depositor in making loans, which acts, if performed by the bank, would be ultra vires, the depositor cannot recover from the bank for the peculations and conversions of the cashier.

11. Banks and banking \S 112—Bank not liable for misappropriation of funds by cashier to make loans for depositor.

Where there has been collusion between cashier of bank and a depositor to secure services of cashier adversely to the bank, it is not liable for misappropriation by the cashier of funds drawn out under authority of the depositor to be used to detriment of bank by cashier in making individual loans for depositor.

Appeal from District Court, Uvalde County; Joseph Jones, Judge.

Suit by Daniel Holmes against the Uvalde National Bank and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. Love, of Uvalde, and Denman, Franklin & McGown, of San Antonio, for appellant.

Martin & Martin, of Uvalde, and W. B. Teagarden and Clamp, Searcy & Clamp, all of San Antonio (Boyle, Ezell & Grover, of San Antonio, of counsel), for appellees.

FLY, C. J. Appellant instituted suit against the Uvalde National Bank, T. O. Frost, J. M. Kincaid, M. B. Walcott, F. J. Rheiner, J. C. Turman, and F. T. Kincaid, as directors of the bank, and Jake Schwartz, as liquidating agent, for certain deposits made by him, amounting to $48,788.81. The cause was submitted to a jury on the following issue, given by the court:

"Was F. J. Rheiner the agent of plaintiff, Daniel Holmes, in making the loans of the money that he turned over to said Rheiner?"

The issue was answered in the affirmative, and the second issue became unimportant and, under instruction of the court, was not answered. At the request of appellees, the jury was informed that the suit against the directors had been dismissed by appellant. Judgment was rendered that appellant take nothing by his suit as to the bank and Schwartz and Turman, Walcott, and Kincaid as the liquidating committee.

The evidence showed that appellant, without the knowledge or consent of the directors of the bank, entered into a personal agreement with F. J. Rheiner, by which the latter was to make loans for appellant out of money from time to time delivered to Rheiner personally by appellant, and Rheiner placed the money in the bank, with the full authority to draw it out whenever he so desired. He dealt with Rheiner as an individual and not as cashier of the bank. The arrangement entered into as to loaning the money was concealed by appellant and Rheiner from the directors of the bank. The money was loaned at different times by Rheiner, and the securities were placed in the hands of appellant by Rheiner. About five years elapsed between the time when the last loan was made, to wit, May 24, 1914, and the date of the filing of this suit, and the notes now claimed by appellant to be worthless were taken for or indorsed and delivered to appellant by Rheiner more than five years before this suit was filed. Appellant at no time dealt with Rheiner as cashier, and in the numerous letters written to him by appellant he was addressed as "Dear Ferdie." Appellant testified:

"Yes, sir; I told Rheiner in the beginning that I wanted him to loan my money for me. Yes, sir; I trusted him to do that. Yes, sir; I gave him authority to draw my money out to make loans and investments for me. Yes, I gave him authority to make loans, and he had as much authority as I did to make loans, and I put money at his disposal for that purpose—to make loans."

In April, 1916, there was a full settlement between appellant and Rheiner. Appellant swore that he placed about $7,000 in the bank when Rheiner was absent, and when he returned appellant gave him a check for the money, to be placed in the "loan account," to be loaned by him.

The first assignment states error in the refusal to give the following charge, requested by appellant:

"In any event, you will find your verdict herein for plaintiff for the sum of $28,779.65, being the aggregate or the principal of the four notes in evidence, purporting to be the notes of T. J. Martin, and the one note in evidence, purporting to be the note of W. B. Patterson, less the sum of $2,517.04 drawn from the loan account of plaintiff and carried into the $4,600 certificate of deposit in evidence; that is to say, said $24,262.61 is the balance of the total of said above-named notes after said sum of $2,517.04 is deducted therefrom. The remainder of the case you will consider from the evidence in the case and the charge of the court, and base your verdict thereon."

[1,2] The charge was properly refused. The cause was submitted on special issues, and yet appellant sought a general charge to control the disposition of at least one-half of the amount sued for. The charge assumed that Rheiner was acting as the cashier of the bank in making the loans, that it was responsible for his lack of care and judgment or his criminal acts, when that was the crucial point in the case. It assumed that the notes were forgeries, when the jury might have found that they were genuine. In other words, it was, in effect, an instruction for appellant on the whole case and made a farce out of the issue as to Rheiner being the agent of appellant alone in negotiating the loans, and not of the bank. It assumed that loaning money for depositors was within the powers and duties of the bank and dispensed with all inquiry into the doctrine of ultra vires as applied to the acts of Rheiner, if acting for the bank.

[3,4] The second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth assignments of error should not be considered. Each of them complains of giving certain charges or refusing others without giving even the substance of the charges. A reference to bills of exception without giving the substance of them does not comply with the rules, and it is not incumbent upon an appellate court to search the record for matters that should be supplied by the appellant. However, we have consulted the bills of exception referred to in the assignments and find that the charges asked were properly refused. If Rheiner was the agent and special representative of appellant and acted in lending the money not as cashier or agent of the bank, then it did not matter that he converted the money of appellant to his own use, so far as the bank was concerned. In this connection, it may be stated that there was no adequate proof that Rheiner had converted any money of appellant to his own use. Appellant had the notes, he now wishes declared forgeries, in his possession for seven or eight years, and yet did not ascertain that they were forgeries. Appellant had colluded with Rheiner to lend money for him and deprive the bank of loans to which it was entitled, and now when his conspirator has been shown to be a defaulter and that the loans made by him for appellant are not satisfactory, he seeks to make the principal, against whom the conspiracy had been formed, responsible for the acts of the unfaithful servant. Rheiner was the agent of appellant, and not the agent of the bank, in making the loans, as found by the jury. It was not an issue as to whether the bank had notice of the relations between appellant and Rheiner. All of the testimony tended to show that appellant and Rheiner did not desire that the bank should know that Rheiner was lending money for appellant, but studiously concealed it from the bank. The evidence clearly showed that the loaning account of appellant was closed and a certificate of deposit delivered to appellant on or about April 23, 1916, and such settlement was fully accepted and agreed to by appellant, and such testimony tended to show that appellant, by his laches for more than two years, was estopped from claiming anything from the bank. There was not a particle of evidence tending to show that appellant expected or desired that Rheiner should act, in lending the money, for the bank; but, on the other hand, appellant and Rheiner did all they could to prevent the bank discovering anything about the loans. It follows that there was no such issue, and the court acted properly in refusing to place it before the jury.

[5] If the bank had known that Rheiner had authority to draw out the money deposited in the loan account of appellant, that would not charge the bank with knowledge that Rheiner was lending or pretending to lend it for appellant, nor make the bank liable for his conversion of it.

[6] The interests of the bank and appellant were directly antagonistic in the lending of money, and every loan made by Rheiner was depriving the bank of the opportunity and right to make loans. Under the circumstances if, as all the testimony shows, Rheiner was the agent of appellant in making the loans, he could not be the agent of the bank also. It was not within the scope of the agency of Rheiner to make loans in the name of the bank for depositors, and the bank was not bound by his acts in making such loans, and there was no evidence of ratification of his unauthorized acts, if such acts could be ratified. Henderson v. Railroad Co., 17 Tex. 560, 67 Am. Dec. 675; Bank v. Jones, 18 Tex. 823. Rheiner did not claim to be acting as agent for the bank, but altogether as agent of appellant.

[7] The rule imputing notice to the principal of the acts of agents is usually based upon the theory that it is the duty of the agent to communicate to his principal the knowledge possessed by him relating to the subject-matter of the agency, and the presumption that he has performed that duty. But this presumption is destroyed where the agent, though nominally acting as such, is in reality acting in his own or another's interest, and adversely to that of his principal. Mechem on Agency, § 1815; Kauffman v. Robey, 60 Tex. 811, 48 Am. Rep. 264; Texas Loan Agency v. Taylor, 88 Tex. 47, 29 S. W. 1057; Allen v. Garrison, 92 Tex. 546, 50 S. W. 335; Cooper v. Ford, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 253, 69 S. W. 487; La Brie v. Cartwright, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 144, 118 S. W. 785; Allen v. Railroad, 150 Mass. 200, 22 N. E. 917, 5 L. R. A. 716, 15 Am. St. Rep. 185.

As said in the last-cited case by the Massachusetts' court:

"The general rule is that notice to an agent, while acting for his principal, of facts affecting the character of the transaction, is constructive notice to the principal. * * * There is an exception to this rule when the agent is engaged in committing an independent fraudulent act on his own account, and the facts to be imputed relate to this fraudulent act. It is sometimes said that it cannot be presumed that an agent will communicate to his principal acts of fraud which he has committed on his own account in transacting the business of his principal, and that the doctrine of imputed knowledge rests upon a presumption that an agent will communicate to his principal whatever he knows concerning the business he is engaged in transacting as agent. It may be doubted whether the rule and the exception rest on any such reasons. It has been suggested that the true reason for the exception is that an independent fraud committed by an agent on his own account is beyond the scope of his employment, and therefore knowledge of it, as matter of law, cannot be imputed to the principal, and the principal cannot be held responsible for it. On this view, such a fraud bears some analogy to a tort willfully committed by a servant for his own purposes, and not as a means of performing the business intrusted to him by his master. Whatever the reason may be, the exception is well established."

[8] In this case we may assume that the bank knew that appellant had deposited his money in the bank, that Rheiner had the authority to draw it out whenever he desired, and still this would not charge the bank with knowledge that Rheiner had authority from appellant to lend the money for him, and certainly not that Rheiner had appropriated appellant's money to his own use and benefit and had forged notes to hide his crime. Upon no ground could the bank be charged with such knowledge. When Rheiner drew the money and loaned or misappropriated it, he clearly acted outside the scope of his authority and was not acting as the agent of the bank, but as the agent of appellant.

In the case of Brookhouse v. Union Publishing Co., 73 N. H. 368, 62 Atl. 219, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 903, the facts were that one Moore was the guardian of the plaintiff, and also treasurer of the defendant, and used the defendant corporation for his private banking purposes, depositing money with its general funds and crediting his account, and charging his account as he withdrew it. He withdrew from his guardian bank account money, for which he received drafts payable to himself as guardian or order. These he indorsed and directed the assistant treasurer of defendant to deposit to his credit. He afterwards checked out the money for his personal use. The ward sought to charge the defendant with notice of the fraudulent character of the transaction. The court held that the defendant was an innocent conduit through which the guardian temporarily passed the money, and that it could not be charged therefor.

The evidence in this case shows collusion by appellant with Rheiner to obtain services from the latter which he as agent of the bank was not authorized to perform, and which deprived the bank of making loans, and no presumption of notice can indulged for the protection of a party to such collusion. As said in a New York case:

"The rule which charges the principal with what the agent knows is for the protection of innocent third persons, and not those who use the agent to further their own frauds upon the principal." Nat. Life Ins. Co. v. Minch, 53 N. Y. 144.

[9] It was not within the scope of the agency or implied power and authority of Rheiner as cashier of a national bank to agree with a party not connected with the bank to conduct the business of lending for him, from which the bank did not and could not derive any appreciable benefit, direct or indirect. The acts of Rheiner were clearly ultra vires, and did not bind the bank. The bank had no authority under the act creating it to enter into a contract for loaning money of a depositor such as existed between appellant and Rheiner. U. S. Rev. St. § 5136 (U. S. Comp. St. § 9661). The powers granted to national banks are:

"To exercise by its board of directors, or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking; by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidence of debt, by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing and circulating notes according to the provisions of this title."

The powers are clearly defined, and, while national banks are authorized to lend money, there is no semblance of authority for lending money as the agent of its depositors. Such authority, if granted and exercised, would eventually destroy the great privilege of lending money for themselves given national banks, and involve them in complications which would almost inevitably lead to destruction. Especially would this be true when the lending is done without remuneration to the bank, and on the other hand is an expense in taking up the time of agents that should be used in the interest of the bank. No possible good could result to the bank from loans of money made for depositors. The Federal Reserve Act (38 Stat. 251) has no application, whatever, to the Uvalde National Bank, as defining its powers. The acts for which it is sought to hold that bank occurred before the enactment of the Federal Reserve Act, and, of course, it does not have any application to such acts, if it ever could apply to such bank.

[10, 11] If appellant had entered into a contract with Rheiner as cashier of the bank, and under that contract had deposited money to be invested in loans by the bank, and the cashier had embezzled the deposits, there is some authority for holding that the bank would be liable for the deposits, even though the agreement to invest was ultra vires; but where the money is deposited as in this case and the cashier is authorized and paid as an individual to act for the depositor in performance of acts, which, if performed by the bank, would be ultra vires, the depositor cannot recover. And when there has been collusion between the cashier and the depositor to secure the services of the cashier, not as representative of the bank, but adversely to it, there can be no doubt that the bank would not be liable for the misappropriation of funds drawn out of the bank under authority of the depositor to be used to the detriment of the bank.

The evidence shows clearly that appellant made Rheiner his agent, not as an agent of the bank, for he acted secretly and under cover with Rheiner and clearly indicated that he did not wish the bank to know anything about his relations with Rheiner nor have any connection with his loans. He and Rheiner sought to use the bank as a mere conduit for their schemes, and he concealed all his transactions with Rheiner from the bank until his friend had embezzled his money and absconded, and then he sought to make the victim of his scheming liable for his friend's perfidy. The trial court properly held, under the facts, that such liability would not attach.

The judgment is affirmed.

SIGNOR TIE CO. v. TEXAS IRON ASS'N.
(No. 2247.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
June 3, 1920.)

Appeal and error \S 1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

There being sufficient evidence to justify the finding, it is conclusive notwithstanding conflicting evidence.

Appeal from District Court, Cass County;
H. F. O'Neal, Judge.

Action by the Texas Iron Company against the Signor Tie Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bibb & Caven, of Marshall, for appellant.
E. A. Allday and Hugh Carney, both of Atlanta, for appellee.

HODGES, J. The appellee sued the appellant to recover the sum of $984.51 as the balance due for a lot of railroad cross-ties sold to the appellant in October, 1914, and March, 1915. In its original petition the appellee alleged that the ties were delivered to the appellant under the terms of an express contract specifying the grades and prices. In addition to exceptions and a general denial, the appellant specially pleaded that the ties sued for had been purchased by it from one Estel Vance, alleging that Vance was the sole owner and had a right to make the sale. To this special plea the appellee filed a general denial. In a trial before the court judgment was rendered in favor of the appellee for the full amount of the debt, together with legal interest thereon to the date of the trial. The court filed the following findings of fact:

"First. I find that the Texas Iron Association sold and delivered to Geo. W. Signor Tie Company, by negotiation through letters and over phone all the ties said iron association owned on or about October 15, 1914, on the right of way of the Texas & Pacific Railway near Springdale, Tex., for the following prices, to wit: 28 cents for first-class red oak ties; culls at 8 cents; 36 cents for white oak ties; 14 cents for culls; said ties subject to inspection and acceptance by Texas & Pacific inspector.

"Second. I find that the said Texas & Pacific inspector took after inspection on October 15, 1914, 1,297 first-class red oak ties and 97 culls; on March 20, 1915, 5,817 first-class red oak ties, 541 red oak culls, 2,771 first-class white oak ties, 389 white oak culls, 190 first-class red oak ties, 221 red oak culls, 1,544 first-class white oak ties, 895 white oak culls.

"Third. I find that a correct invoice of all above ties amounts to the sum of $3,847.00.

"Fourth. I find that defendant paid thereon the sum of $2,953.91, and is entitled to a further credit of $11.48 extra leading charges, leaving a balance due of $881.61 principal, with $250.07 interest to date of judgment, said principal and interest amounting to the sum of $1,131.68.

"Fifth. I find that it was claimed by defendant that it had purchased prior to the time said ties were inspected and taken up by it from Estel Vance $984.51 worth of said ties at above prices, and that said ties did not belong to plaintiff at said time; and on said contention I find that prior to the time defendant claims to have purchased this amount of said ties from said Vance the plaintiff had theretofore legally acquired title and possession of the same, and that said Vance did not have the right to sell them to defendant."

It is claimed in this appeal that the evidence shows that the appellant had purchased the ties in controversy some time before it made any contract with the appellee, and if the latter had any cause of action it was for a conversion. The testimony upon that issue is conflicting. There was sufficient evidence to justify the court in finding that the ties were sold and delivered to the appellant after the contract was made between the parties to this suit.

The remaining assignments, we think, are without merit, and the judgment will be affirmed.

TEXAS ELECTRIC RY. v. WHITMORE.
(No. 6174.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin.
April 14, 1920. Rehearing Denied
May 19, 1920.)

1. Damages \S 54—Mental suffering from disfigurement element of damages for personal injuries.

Where plaintiff in a personal injury action brought against a street railroad company alleged that he brooded over the fact that his body had been scarred and disfigured, and that he became depressed and suffered great mental and physical pain as a result of such disfigurement and the loss of the use of his arm, such mental suffering might be considered by the jury in estimating damages.

2. Appeal and error \S 1060(1)—Argument of counsel in personal injury case that defendant's attorneys were superior held not reversible error.

In a personal injury action against a street railroad company, argument of plaintiff's counsel that the case was an unequal contest because of the superior skill and ability of defendant's counsel, and that defendant had a paid claim agent and paid general attorneys, whereas plaintiff was lacking in these facilities, while irrelevant and perhaps improper, held not reversible error.

3. Street railroads \S 117(10)—Negligence in failure to keep lookout held question for jury.

In an action for injuries to a soldier in a collision between defendant's street car and a truck with a trailer, evidence as to the failure of the motorman to keep a proper lookout held sufficient to justify the submission of such issue to the jury.

4. Street railroads \S 117(34)—Whether failure to sound warning was proximate cause of injuries held for jury.

In an action for injuries to a soldier in a collision between defendant's street car and the trailer of a truck crossing the track, whether the motorman's failure to sound warning was the proximate cause of the injuries held for the jury.

5. Street railroads \S 117(34)—Whether speed of car was proximate cause of injuries in collision held for jury.

Whether the speed of defendant's car was the proximate cause of injuries in a collision with a truck crossing the track held, under the evidence, for the jury.

6. Street railroads \S 117(10)—Whether motorman saw stop signal by companions of person injured held for jury.

Whether or not defendant's motorman saw a signal to stop given by members of crew on an army truck, struck while crossing the track, held for the jury.

7. Street railroads \S 114(2)—Evidence held to show that defendant owned street car.

Evidence held to justify a finding that defendant was the owner of the tracks upon which the collision occurred, so as to warrant an inference that the street car belonged to defendant.

8. Appeal and error \S 930(1), 1004(1)—Verdict will not be disturbed unless manifestly excessive in the view most favorable to plaintiff.

A verdict will not be disturbed on appeal unless it is manifestly excessive, and the appellate court is required to take the evidence in the view most favorable to the party recovering the damages.

9. Damages \S 132(8)—$15,000 held not excessive in action for injuries in street car accident.

$15,000 damages held not excessive in an action by a soldier, 22 years old, for personal injuries sustained in street car collision, where it appeared that plaintiff's left arm and shoulder were disabled, that he had suffered great pain, that the injuries were permanent, that terrible scars were left, and that his usefulness as an expert mechanic was virtually destroyed.

Appeal from District Court, McLennan County; H. M. Richey, Judge.

Action by Don H. Whitmore against the Texas Electric Railway to recover for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Templeton, Beall, Williams & Calloway, of Dallas, and Sanford & Harris, of Waco, for appellant.

Alva Bryan and W. E. Terrell, both of Waco, for appellee.

BRADY, J. This is a suit by appellee against appellant for damages for personal injuries, alleged to have been received by appellee from a collision between a street car, alleged to have been owned and operated by appellant, and an army truck and trailer on which was loaded a wrecked airplane; appellee being on the trailer at the time of the accident. It was averred that appellee was a soldier in the mechanical branch of the aviation section of the United States army, and, in company with other soldiers, was carrying the wrecked airplane on an army truck to the camp. The accident occurred between Eighth and Ninth streets on Austin avenue, in the city of Waco; the trailer being struck by the street car while crossing the track.

Appellant answered by demurrers, general denial, and a plea of contributory negligence. The case was submitted to the jury upon a general charge, embracing the following issues of negligence: (a) The alleged failure of the motorman to keep a proper lookout. (b) The failure of the motorman to sound the gong, ring the bell, or blow the whistle on the street car. (c) The operation of the street car, at the time and place of the collision, at a high and dangerous rate of speed. (d) The failure of the motorman to stop the car and avert the collision after having seen a signal given by members of the truck crew, who had gotten off the truck or trailer onto the street. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $15,000, and judgment was rendered accordingly.

There is evidence to support a finding as to each of the grounds of negligence submitted by the court in the main charge. The pertinent facts as to the questions presented in the assignments discussed in the opinion will be there stated.

Opinion.

The first assignment of error complains of the action of the trial court in overruling a special exception to a portion of appellee's petition, alleging:

"That he broods over the fact that his body has been scarred and disfigured, and as a result thereof is depressed and suffers great mental and physical pain as a result of said disfiguration and the loss of the use of said arm."

The point is specifically made that mental anguish suffered by an injured person by reason of the fact that he broods over a scarred and disfigured body is too remote to be the subject of compensation. In appellant's brief the following testimony by appellee on this point is quoted:

"Before I was injured I was always proud of the fact that I had good-looking arms and shoulders for a young fellow, but now I have a big old bone sticking up there and a big old scar there. I participated in athletics and swam all summer long, and it does not look very good now. I always feel like I do not want anybody to see it. It is an ugly looking place. Feel like I will always have to keep it hid."

Appellant, as authority for the proposition that mental anguish of such a character is too remote, cites the case of Railway v. Dickens, 54 Tex. Civ. App. 637, 118 S. W. 612, a decision by this court. Appellant specially relies upon this statement in the opinion by Chief Justice Fisher:

"* * * Anguish of the mind, wholly sentimental, arising from the contemplation of a disfigurement of the person, cannot be considered for the purpose of swelling the damage. * * * The law regards supposed injuries to sentimental feelings of this character as too remote and speculative to allow it as an element of damages in cases where no malice exists."

The statement just quoted was made by Chief Justice Fisher in connection with an argument of counsel, and does not seem to us to be applicable to the question raised in the instant case. The cases cited in support of the doctrine seem to recognize that mental anguish, when the natural or reasonable result of the injuries sustained, is a basis for the recovery of damages, and they condemn only the allowance of damages for mental anguish wholly sentimental.

The following authorities sustain the proposition that mental suffering, which an injured person experiences as the result of contrasting his injured condition with his previous state, may be considered by the jury in estimating damages for such injuries. M. & T. Ry. Co. v. Miller, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 460, 61 S. W. 978; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Simmons, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 578, 75 S. W. 822; St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. v. Cleland, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 499, 110 S. W. 126; Decatur Cotton Seed Oil Co. v. Belew, 178 S. W. 612; Chicago, R. I. & G. R. Co. v. Smith, 197 S. W. 614; Townes on Torts, p. 162.

[1] The facts in the above cases, touching mental suffering, differ only in degree from those of the instant case, and we think announce the doctrine prevailing in this state. Therefore we hold that it was not reversible error for the trial court to overrule the special exception involved in this assignment.

The second point presented in appellant's brief is the failure of the trial court to instruct the jury not to consider a certain portion of the argument of counsel for appellee. This argument related to the statement of counsel, in substance, that the case was an unequal contest, because of the superior skill and ability of appellant's counsel, and the fact that appellant had a paid claim agent and paid general attorneys, whereas appellee was lacking in these facilities or advantages.

[2] We have carefully considered the argument in question, and while we think it was irrelevant and in the main perhaps improv-er, we are persuaded that it was not calculated to influence or prejudice the jury against appellant, and that it did not have such effect. We do not think it presents reversible error, and the assignment is overruled.

[3] The next assignments complain of the submission of the several grounds of negligence to the jury, because there was no evidence supporting any of these issues. With this contention we cannot agree. As to the first issue, it is sufficient to say that there was evidence that the motorman was standing on the front of the street car, at and before the time of the accident, and after the trailer was struck and the street car had stopped the motorman stated, "I will open the door," and he did open it, and he stated to some of the occupants of the truck and trailer that he did not see them. There was testimony that there was no obstruction between the street car and the trailer at the time and just before the accident, and nothing to prevent the motorman seeing the same had he been keeping a proper lookout. There was testimony tending to show that the motorman was looking ahead, but the conflict was sufficient to raise the issue and to take it to the jury. The motorman did not testify, and the jury were entitled to consider all the circumstances as well as the statement of the motorman above referred to.

[4] As to the second issue, the failure of the motorman to sound the gong, ring the bell, or blow the whistle on the street car, it is claimed that there was no evidence to show that such failure, if any, had any causal connection with the injuries received by appellee. While the testimony was conflicting, there was evidence that neither the bell, gong, nor whistle was sounded after the street car left Eighth street, and that the truck and trailer passed over the track from 25 to 75 feet ahead of the street car, and that the appellee had his back turned to the street car and did not see it. There was also evidence to the effect that when appellee first saw the car it was right on him, and he had no opportunity to extricate himself from danger. Under these circumstances, we think it was for the jury to say whether or not the failure to sound the warning was a proximate cause of the injuries.

[5] As to the issue of operating the car at a high and dangerous rate of speed, there was evidence that the street car was being run at a rate of speed at least 18 miles an hour, and that its speed was not slowed down before striking the trailer. The accident was on one of the principal streets of the city. As the truck had passed safely over the track and the street car struck only the trailer, it was manifestly a question for the jury, under these circumstances, to determine whether the speed of the car was a proxmate cause of the injury, and had a direct connection with the injuries.

[6] With reference to the remaining ground of negligence submitted, the failure of the motorman to heed the signal given by members of the truck crew, the evidence was conflicting as to whether the motorman saw the signal. There was evidence that he was looking straight ahead in crossing Ninth street, and that the accident was just past Ninth street, and that just before the accident occurred one of the men on the right-hand side of the truck jumped off and flagged the street car. There is no direct proof that the motorman saw the signal. He did not testify, but in view of the fact that it was a bright, sunshiny day, that there were no obstructions between the street car and truck and trailer, that the front end of the car, where the motorman was standing, was practically all glass, and the facts above recited, it was a question for the jury to say whether or not the motorman saw the signal. If he did see it in time to have stopped or sufficiently lessened the speed of the car to avert the injury, the causal connection is plain.

The next question which will be discussed is the claim that it was not shown by competent evidence that the street car which collided with the trailer was owned, operated, or controlled by appellant, and that therefore the record evidence does not connect appellant with the accident, and no legal liability has been shown. It was not specially pleaded or claimed by appellant that it did not own the street railway, or the street car in question, nor that the motorman operating the same was an employé of appellant, although these facts were peculiarly within the knowledge of appellant. It was shown that the motorman took the names and addresses of passengers on the car, and that the claim agent of appellant procured statements from these passengers and procured the personal attendance of some of them at the trial.

Appellant itself offered in evidence the following question and answer of the witness W. E. Yates:

"At the time the front end of the truck passed on the track of the defendant company just prior to the accident, did you or not at said time notice where the street car was at said time? If you say that you did, where was the street car at the time in question? State if the street car you now mention is the same street car that hit the truck or trailer on which plaintiff was riding. A. I noticed that the street car was on the east side of Eighth street at the time the front end of the truck passed on the track of defendant company just prior to the accident, and this was the same street car that hit the trailer."

[7] There was other testimony, not necessary to recite, from which the jury might reasonably have inferred that the street car belonged to appellant, and that the motorman and conductor thereon were employées of the company. The interrogatory and answer just quoted is, in the circumstances of this case, sufficient proof that the appellant was the owner of the tracks upon which the accident occurred, and brings this case within the rule stated by the Supreme Court in Railway Co. v. Miller, 98 Tex. 270, 83 S. W. 182, wherein it is said:

"It is a sound proposition, often applied, that the corporation, shown to be the owner of a railroad, in the operation of which a wrong has been done, is presumed to be in the possession and operation of its road."

This case is also affected by the rule stated by the court in Bank v. Mill Co., 207 S. W. 400, as follows:

"The force of evidence, though slight, is greatly increased by the failure of the opposite party to rebut it, where it is obvious that the means to do so are readily accessible to the party."

See, also, El Paso Electric Railway Co. v. Terrazas, 208 S. W. 387; Railway Co. v. Scholz, 209 S. W. 225.

We conclude that the evidence was sufficient to take this issue to the jury, and there was no error of the trial court in relation to the same. The assignments raising this question will be overruled.

[8] The remaining question to be discussed is the claim that the verdict was excessive, and that the case should be reversed for this reason. It is now settled law in this state that a verdict will not be disturbed upon appeal, unless it is manifestly excessive; and in deference to the verdict the appellate court is required to take the evidence in the view most favorable to the party recovering the damages. Burnett v. Anderson, 207 S. W. 540; El Paso Electric Ry. Co. v. Allen, 208 S. W. 739; Decatur Cotton Oil Co. v. Belew, 178 S. W. 607; G., H. & S. A. Ry. v. Hansen, 58 Tex. Civ. App. 584, 125 S. W. 63; T. & P. Ry. v. Williams, 196 S. W. 230; K. C., M. & O. Ry. v. Durrett, 187 S. W. 427; Batson-Milholme Co. v. Faulk, 209 S. W. 837; G., H. & S. A. Ry. v. Butts, 209 S. W. 419; G., H. & S. A. Ry. v. Still, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 169, 100 S. W. 176; Witte v. Railway Co. (Sup.) 6 S. W. 618; Cent. R. Co. v. Fisher, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 78, 43 S. W. 584; 4 Corpus Juris, p. 869 et seq.; G., C. & S. F. Ry. v. Harriett, 80 Tex. 73, 15 S. W. 556.

[9] We have carefully examined the evidence in the record as to the nature and extent of appellee's injuries and as to his pecuniary loss, and while the verdict seems large, we cannot say that it is unreasonably so, nor that we are authorized to conclude that it was the result of passion, prejudice, or other improper influence. It was shown that appellee was a young man, about 22 years of age, of strong and robust health prior to the accident; that as the result of the negligence of appellant's employes he was injured by some character of instrument, which has never been determined, entering his body under his left armpit and coming out at the base of the neck and above his left shoulder; that his left shoulder blade was cracked, and that the muscles, tissues, blood vessels, flesh, and everything, from the point of entrance to the point of exit of the instrument causing the wound, were destroyed. He suffered great pain, not only in the hospital and during the operations, but for months afterwards. He suffered great loss of blood, and a part of the pectoral muscle which controls the arm was destroyed, and the blood supply to that part of his arm permanently lost. There was evidence that his injuries were permanent, and appellee exhibited his injured body to the jury, which showed terrible scars under his armpit and a gaping wound on his left shoulder and at the base of his neck. It was shown that he has no use of his arm in a forward movement, which seemed to be of great value, if not indispensable, in the business for which he had qualified himself—that of an expert mechanic. There was also testimony that appellee's eyes were affected by the accident, and that his hair turned gray, although it seemed to have resumed its natural color at the time of the trial.

Appellee had an education above that of the average mechanic, including a four-year public school course, and a two-year course in forestry at the Kansas University; that prior to entering the army he had worked in a bank at Wichita, Kan., drawing a salary at the rate of $1,600 a year. At the time of his injury he was drawing $44 per month, with the rank of chauffeur in the army. There was testimony that he had diligently applied himself to become an expert mechanic, and expected to follow that avocation upon leaving the army. There was evidence that as an expert mechanic appellee might reasonably expect to earn as much as $160 per month, and that his usefulness in this business was virtually destroyed, and his ability to earn anything in other occupations greatly impaired and lessened because of the permanent injury to his arm.

Considering the long life expectancy of appellee, his mental and physical sufferings, the nature and probable permanency of his injuries, and his lost earning ability, we do not feel justified in either reversing the case for the alleged excessiveness of the verdict, or in ordering a remittur. The assignments complaining of the size of the verdict are each overruled.

The only other assignment in the brief complains that the trial court should have granted a new trial, because the great preponderance of the evidence shows that the collision was due to the negligence of the driver of the truck, and that this was the proximate cause of the injury. We do not deem it necessary to discuss this contention, which we do not regard as supported by the record.

Having concluded that there is no reversible error shown, the judgment will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

HINES, Director General of Railroads, et al.
v. KELLY. (No. 2283.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
May 18, 1920.)

1. Railroads \S 5½, New, Vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Federal Director General's order fixing venue of personal injury suits invalid.

So much of General Orders Nos. 18 and 18a issued by the federal Director General of Railroads in 1918, as undertook to fix the venue of personal injury suits against the Director General, was invalid.

2. Appeal and error \S 1060(1). — Refusal to permit reading of answer to jury harmless, unless jury not permitted to read pleadings after retirement.

In absence of contention and proof showing jury were not permitted to read and consider all of defendant's pleadings after retirement, reversible error in the action of the trial court in refusing to permit defendants to read certain paragraphs of their answer to the jury is not shown.

Appeal from District Court, Harrison County; P. O. Beard, Judge.

Suit by W. G. Kelly against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. H. Prendergast, of Marshall, for appellants.

Jones, Sexton, Casey & Jones, of Marshall, for appellee.

HODGES, J. The appellee sued the Director General, Walker D. Hines, and Pearl Wight, receiver of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, for damages resulting from injuries received by him while an employe in the railway service. The injury was caused by a collision between a motorcar and a handcar on which the appellee was riding. He was caused to fall backward and sustain injuries to his shoulders, back, neck, and other portions of the body. Appellee recovered a judgment against the appellants for the sum of $5,000.

[1] The facts show that the appellee was injured in April, 1919, at Reisor, in the State of Louisiana, and that he resided at Reisor at the time of the injury. The suit was filed in the district court of Harrison county, Tex. The appellants presented in the trial court a motion to dismiss the suit because of the facts above stated. They offered in evidence, and here refer to, general orders No. 18 and No. 18a, issued by the Director General of Railroads in 1918. The latter contains the following requirement:

"It is therefore ordered that all suits against carriers while under federal control must be brought in the county or district where the plaintiff resided at the time of the accrual of the cause of action, or in the county or district where the cause of action arose."

The court overruled the motion, and the case was tried upon its merits. No effort was made by the appellants to continue or postpone the trial, nor is there anything in the record to indicate that all of the witnesses needed did not appear and testify. In the case of El Paso & S. W. Ry. Co. v. Lovick, 218 S. W. 489, our Supreme Court held that so much of the orders of the Director General as undertook to fix the venue of suits of this character was invalid. That decision supports the action of the trial court in overruling the motion to dismiss the case.

[2] No reversible error is shown in the action of the court in refusing to permit the appellants to read to the jury certain paragraphs of their answer. It is not contended that the jury were not permitted to read and consider all of appellants' pleadings after their retirement; nor is it insisted that appellants were deprived of any particular defense by reason of the action of the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

SOVEREIGN CAMP, WOODMEN OF THE WORLD, v. PIPER. (No. 6400.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio May 12, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 9, 1920.)

1. Death §2(1) — Insurance §665(5)—Death established by direct proof or circumstances; presumption of death in seven years.

In a suit against an insurance company on a life policy, the death of insured may be established, like any other fact, by direct proof or circumstantial evidence, and after expiration of seven years the presumption of the death of a party will arise from an unexplained absence without information concerning him.

2. Death §2(2)—Absentee presumed to have died shortly after leaving home for his work.

Under Rev. St. 1911, art. 5707, where a member of a mutual benefit society, of happy disposition, fond of wife and children, left home to go to his work and was never seen again, an irresistible presumption arises that he died shortly after leaving home, so that a subsequent forfeiture of his policy for nonpayment of dues was ineffectual.

3. Insurance §693—Provisions against absence being evidence of death of member of benefit society void.

In view of Rev. St. 1911, art. 5707, provisions in the by-laws of a mutual benefit society against absence or disappearance of a member from his residence unheard of for any length of time, being held to be evidence of the death of such member, are null and void.

4. Insurance §812—Limitations do not run against action on policy until seven years from disappearance of insured.

Limitations do not begin to run against an action on the policy of a member of a mutual society who disappeared from home until the expiration of seven years from the disappearance, when the beneficiary's cause of action accrues under the presumption of death.

On Motion for Rehearing.

5. Insurance §815(1)—Petition stated cause of action on mutual benefit society's policy.

In a wife's action on her husband's policy issued by a mutual benefit society based on presumption of his death after seven years' absence, allegations of petition, though general, held sufficient to state cause of action in the absence of exception, the allegations, with the society's admissions, being sufficient to meet requirements that conditions precedent to recovery should be pleaded.

6. Pleading §34(7)—Intendments indulged in favor of petition not attacked by special exception.

When a petition is not attacked by special exception, every reasonable intendment will be read into its allegations to sustain it.

7. Pleading §34(7)—Amendable petition sustains judgment.

If a petition shows that it is amendable so as to meet every objection, it is sufficient to sustain a judgment.

8. Pleading §205(2)—Defective averment not reached by general demurrer.

A general demurrer admits the facts pleaded to be true, but denies that they constitute a cause of action or ground of defense, and, if enough is stated to enable the court to see that a good cause of action exists, however defectively, the insufficiency or defectiveness of the averment cannot be taken advantage of by a general demurrer.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; J. T. Sluder, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. Mary Piper against the Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

El. D. Henry and Atlas Jones, both of San Antonio, for appellant.

W. A. Wurzbach, of San Antonio, for appellee.

FLY, C. J. Appellee instituted suit against appellant to recover $3,000, alleged to be due on a policy of insurance issued by appellant on the life of Charles Piper, the husband of appellee, who it was alleged in the petition, died prior to December 1, 1911. The cause was tried without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of appellee for the amount for which she sued.

The facts show appellant is a fraternal benefit association or society, which has a subordinate body in Bexar county, Tex., from which a benefit certificate was issued to Charles Piper insuring his life for $3,000 in favor of his wife, Mary Piper. About 10 o'clock on the morning of October 20, 1910, Charles Piper left his home and wife and five children, and she has never seen or heard of him from that hour until the time of trial of this cause on November 24, 1919. He was natural and in his usual jolly mood when he left. He had always lived happily with his family, and he had the reputation of being a good man. He had $700 on his person about the time of his disappearance. He had charge of a yard gang of about 24 men on a railroad running out of San Antonio. After the disappearance of Charles Piper, Mrs. Piper paid all dues and assessments from November 10, 1910, to February, 1913, inclusive. Charles Piper was suspended for nonpayment of dues on April 1, 1913. On the back of the certificate, and contained in the laws of appellant, was the following provision:

"The absence or disappearance of the member from his last-known place of residence for any length of time shall not be sufficient evidence of the death of such member, and no right shall accrue under any certificate of membership to his beneficiary or beneficiaries nor shall any benefits be paid until proof has been made of the death of the member while in good standing."

That provision was amended in 1911 so as to read:

"The absence or disappearance of a member, whether admitted heretofore or hereafter, from his last-known place of residence and unheard of, shall not be regarded as any evidence of the death of such member, nor give or create any right to recover any benefits on any certificate or certificates issued to such member or on account of such membership, in the absence of proof of his actual death, aside from and unassisted by any presumption arising by reason of such absence or disappearance, until the full term of his life expectancy at his age of entry, according to the Carlyle table of life expectancy, has expired, and then only in case all assessments, dues, special assessments, and all other sums now or hereafter required under the laws of the order be paid on behalf of such member within the time required until the expiration of the term of such life expectancy, and this by-law shall operate and be construed as a waiver of any statute of any state or country and any rule of the common law of any state or country to the contrary. In the event the payments are not made as above provided, said member shall stand suspended and cannot be reinstated except in the manner as provided in these laws as to reinstatement of living members."

The court found that Charles Piper died about October or November, 1910, but there was no testimony to that effect, unless the fact it is presumed that a man absent and unheard of for seven years is dead carries with it the presumption that he died about the time of his disappearance. If that presumption arises, then Charles Piper was dead in April, 1913, when the suspension for nonpayment of dues took place, and of course it amounted to nothing and could not affect the insurance.

[1] In a suit with an insurance company on a life policy the death of the insured may be established, as any other fact, by direct proof or circumstantial evidence, and after the expiration of seven years the presumption of the death of a party will arise from an unexplained absence without information concerning him. Under such circumstances, without any direct proof of death, the justifiable conclusion will be sustained that the party is dead. Prinum v. Stewart, 7 Tex. 178; Modern Woodmen v. Ghromley, 41 Okl. 532, 139 Pac. 306, L. R. A. 1915B, 728, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1063, and notes; Holland v. Nance, 102 Tex. 177, 114 S. W. 346.

In article 5707, Rev. Stats. Texas, it is provided:

"Any person absenting himself beyond sea or elsewhere for seven years successively shall be presumed to be dead, in any cause wherein his death may come in question, unless proof be made that he was alive within that time."

It will be noted that nothing is said in the statute about the absence being unexplained or that no information was obtained of him during the period of time mentioned, and in the case of French v. McGinnis, 69 Tex. 19, 9 S. W. 323, it was held that the statute required only proof of absence for seven successive years beyond the sea or elsewhere, without proof that he was alive during that period, to raise the presumption that the person was dead. The court said:

"The statute is clear and explicit, and needs no construction, and the charge was in conformity to it."

In the case of Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World, v. Ruedrich, 153 S. W. 170, this court held:

"Under the common-law rule it was necessary to show that the absent one had not been heard from by his relatives or friends for seven years, but under the statute mere proof of absence of one from his home, beyond the sea or elsewhere, for seven successive years, raises a presumption of death; which can be destroyed by proof of the existence of the absent one within that time."

That decision was approved by the Supreme Court.

[2] The evidence showed that Charles Piper was a man of a happy disposition; that his domestic relations were pleasant and agreeable; that he was very fond of his wife and children and devoted to his home. About 7 o'clock on the morning of October 20, 1910, he left his home and went to his work, but, as was often the case with him, returned about 10 o'clock for some light refreshments. After he had eaten he left home in his usual happy way, having on his person about $700. He had about 24 Mexicans under his authority as yardmaster, and he left his home to go back to where they were at work. He was a man of excellent reputation and thoroughly satisfied with his home and job. He has never been seen or heard of by any of his family or friends since he left his home on the morning of October 20, 1910. Under these facts the presumption that he died shortly after leaving his home is irresistible. It was utterly inconsistent with his habits, disposition, and surroundings for the inference to arise that he went away without a word of farewell and left all that was dear to him in the world. Death alone gives the answer to the question of what became of Charles Piper after leaving his wife, children, and home. As said by the Supreme Court of Iowa in Lisdale v. Life Ins. Co., 26 Iowa, 170, 96 Am. Dec. 136:

"Evidence of character, habits, domestic relations, and the like, making the abandonment of home and family improbable, and showing a want of all those motives which can be supposed to influence men to such acts, may be sufficient to raise the presumption of death, or from which the death of one absent and unheard from, may be inferred, without regard to the duration of such absence."

Justice, charity, and a due regard for a past life of probity and honor would demand that any unexplained and unnecessary absence from home and loved ones was caused by an irresistible force, such as death. Any other supposition would be too unjust, uncharitable, and improbable to be entertained.

Under like circumstances, when a man had disappeared and had not been heard from by his family for nearly two years, the Court of Civil Appeals at Dallas, in the case of Sov. Camp, W. O. W., v. Robinson, 187 S. W. 215, through Judge Talbot, held:

"There is much authority to the effect that, where one has been absent and unheard of for seven years, the presumption arises that he is then dead, but not that he died at any particular time theretofore, and that whoever finds it important to establish death at any particular period must do so by some kind of evidence. The evidence, however, need not be direct or positive; it may be circumstantial according to many of the adjudicated cases. * * * Those courts have adopted the doctrine of Tisdale v.

Insurance Co., and hold with the Supreme Court of Iowa that the court or jury might, in a proper case, infer that the death of the absent person had occurred before seven years had expired, even though he was not exposed to some peril which would be apt to shorten his life, and that the conclusion of death at an earlier period could be drawn upon proof of any facts which, according to common experience, made it probable the party, if alive, would have communicated with his friends."

In that case the policy had been forfeited, and it became necessary for the plaintiff to establish the fact of the death of the insured before the date of the forfeiture. The evidence was no stronger in that case than in this, and yet the court held that it was sufficient. The Texas case is fully sustained by authorities cited in it as well as others. Bradley v. Modern Woodmen of America, 146 Mo. App. 428, 124 S. W. 69; Springmeyer v. Sov. Camp, W. O. W., 144 Mo. App. 483, 129 S. W. 273; Johnson v. Sov. Camp, W. O. W., 163 Mo. App. 728, 147 S. W. 510. It is stated in the last-named case that:

"Formerly the character of evidence necessary to establish death short of the seven-year period was that the person claimed to be dead must have been exposed to some peril or afflicted with some serious disease. But other character of evidence will now answer the purpose, as that the person was of good habits, comfortably and happily situated in life, of cheerful temperament, pleasantly and happily associated with friends and family, and other facts incompatible with his desertion and remaining away from family and friends without communicating with them."

The evidence in this case has met all the requirements named in the Missouri case, and the court was justified in finding that Charles Piper was dead before the policy was forfeited by appellant in April, 1913.

[3] The provisions in the laws of appellant against absence or disappearance of a member from his residence and unheard of for any length of time, being held to be evidence of the death of such member, are null and void. No corporation can, by a provision in its regulations, set aside a law of Texas, and make rules of evidence to suit its own ends and desires. No such preposterous and dangerous authority has ever been granted to a corporation in Texas, or tolerated by its courts, and when beneficiaries are compelled to sue a fraternal association in order to obtain insurance due them they cannot be met by rules of evidence formulated by such association which practically repeal rules made by a Legislature of Texas. Mystic Circle v. Hoskins, 171 S. W. 812; W. O. W. v. Robinson, herein cited.

Appellee for three years after the disappearance paid all dues and assessments, and probably would have continued to pay such dues and assessments had she not been informed by the secretary of the local body that the insurance would not be paid no matter how much she paid. She then ceased the payments. She said, "When I did not hear from him, I thought he was dead," but she hoped and paid the assessments, until she was told by the secretary that there was nothing to be gained by it. Within two months after the seven years had elapsed, when the statute declared that Charles Piper was dead, she instituted this suit. She had the right to wait until the statutory period of seven years had expired before she brought an action for the insurance. It was, in effect, admitted in a letter written by the general attorney of appellant to the attorney of appellee on October 30, 1917, that if appellee showed the death of Charles Piper occurred at any time prior to his suspension in April, 1913, appellant would be liable. He wrote:

"It will be seen from the above that unless proof can be given of the death of the above named on or before April 1, 1913, the society cannot entertain a claim under said certificate."

[4] There was no claim that the statute of limitation had interposed in behalf of appellant. Limitation under the facts of this case did not begin to run until the expiration of seven years from the time that Charles Piper disappeared. Knights of Pythias v. Wilson, 204 S. W. 891. The cause of action did not accrue until October 20, 1917. Appellee could not have made satisfactory proof of the death of her husband, as required in the certificate, until the proof was furnished by the presumption created by article 5707, and necessarily limitation could not begin until that time.

If it were true that limitation should begin to run from the time that an absent one was suspended for nonpayment of dues, insurance companies could refuse acceptance of dues from friends of the party who had disappeared and proceed to suspend him, and then when the time had arrived for the presumption of death to arise to meet a claim for insurance with the plea of limitation; in other words, the insurance company demands proof that the party absents himself was dead when the suspension took place, and, when that demand is met, claims that limitations should begin to run from the date proved instead of the date when death was established by the statutory provision. The statute of limitation would have no application in such a case and would not begin to run until the expiration of seven years from the time of the disappearance of the insured from his home.

The judgment will be affirmed.

MOURSUND, J., entered his disqualification in this case.

On Motion for Rehearing.

FLY, C. J. The third assignment of error assails the petition on the ground that its allegations are not sufficient to form the basis for a judgment, and complaint is made in the motion for rehearing that it was not considered. However, the assignment was considered and thought to be without merit, and we adhere to that opinion. The petition was assailed in the lower court only through a general demurrer, and that appears to have been merely formal and perfunctory, as no action of the court was invoked thereon. The only proposition under the assignment attacks the petition on the ground "that it failed to allege the terms and conditions precedent set out in the contract of insurance between the insured and the defendant, and failed to allege that said terms and conditions precedent had been complied with."

[5] It is alleged in the petition that Charles Piper was a member in good standing of Sam Houston Camp No. 55; that at the time of his death all his dues and assessments had been paid, and that he was a member in good standing of the association, and had been a member in good standing for more than two years, and that the facts as to his disappearance were given to appellant; that demand had been made for the amount of the policy; and that payment had been denied because the "absence or disappearance of a member from his last-known place of residence for any length of time shall not be sufficient evidence of the death of such member, and no right shall accrue under his certificate of membership to a beneficiary or beneficiaries nor shall any benefit be paid until satisfactory proof has been made of the death of the member while in good standing." It was further alleged that it was impossible to make any other proof of the death of Charles Piper, except upon the presumption of death from an absence of seven years. The allegations, while general, are sufficient to state a cause of action in the absence of exception thereto. Appellant in its answer admits that it issued to Charles H. Piper a beneficiary certificate, and claims to have duly suspended him on April 1, 1913, because of failure to pay dues for February and March, 1913. That was an admission that Charles H. Piper was in good standing up to that time, which meant that he had complied with all conditions precedent to his good standing at that time. The petition alleged that the insured had disappeared on October 20, 1910, and that appellee sought to pay all assessments becoming due, but they were refused by the clerk of the subordinate camp. The allegations of the petition with the admissions of appellant were fully sufficient to meet the requirement that conditions precedent to recovery should be pleaded. If Charles H. Piper was in good standing in March, 1913, as admitted by appellant, he had paid all entrance fees, one advanced assessment of Sovereign Camp fund assessments and camp general fund, physi-clan's examination fee, been properly obligated or introduced, and, as alleged, the beneficiary certificate delivered to him. An admission of membership in good standing was an admission that everything had been done to make him a member in good standing.

[6-8] When a petition is not attacked by special exception, every reasonable intendment will be read into its allegations to sustain it, and, applying this rule to the petition in this case, it was ample to sustain the judgment. In the trial court appellant sought to evade the payment to a widow of one of its members who had been paying it money for years, on the ground that he had been suspended for nonpayment of dues, and that the claim of the widow was barred by four years' limitation, but in this court it is sought to destroy the judgment on the ground that the petition failed to make certain allegations. The allegations were sufficient, however, to justify a reading into them by intendment of everything necessary to meet the decisions cited by appellant. If a petition shows that it is amendable so as to meet every objection, then it is sufficient to sustain a judgment. Under the Texas rule:

"The general effect of a general demurrer is to admit the facts pleaded to be true, but to deny that they constitute a cause of action or ground of defense, and the only question to be considered under it is whether any cause of action or ground of defense is described in the pleading demurred to. Consequently, if sufficient be stated to enable the court to see that a good cause of action exists, however defectively, the insufficiency or defectiveness of the averment cannot be taken advantage of by a general demurrer."

In the case of Northwestern Ins. Co. v. Woodward, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 496, 45 S. W. 185, it is stated by this court:

"A defective statement of a cause of action is not subject to a general demurrer. If it is so stated that it is amendable, it is good against a general demurrer."

There is no merit in the motion for rehearing, and it is overruled.

CRENSHAW v. STALLINGS. (No. 1660.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
May 5, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 23, 1920.)

Bills and notes \S 129(3)—Note not specifying time for payment due on demand.

Where neither a note nor the contract pursuant to which it was executed fixed a day of payment, the general rule that a promissory note in which no time is specified for payment is due on demand applied, and suit could be brought thereon after payment demanded and refused.

Appeal from District Court, Collin County; F. E. Wilcox, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. P. A. Stallings against A. B. Crenshaw. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. C. Merritt and Wallace Hughston, both of McKinney, for appellant.

Abernathy & Smith, of McKinney, for appellee.

HALL, J. September 4, 1906, appellant and appellee entered into a written contract, the material terms of which are as follows:

"(1) That the said P. A. Stallings, in consideration of the covenant of the said A. B. Crenshaw, hereinafter set forth, does by these presents demise, lease and farm let to the said A. B. Crenshaw the following described land, being about 187 acres, situated about 1½ miles southwest of Nevada, Texas, and known as the P. A. Stallings place. To have and to hold the same to the said A. B. Crenshaw during the said P. A. Stallings' natural life; and the said A. B. Crenshaw, in consideration of the leasing of the premises as above stated, covenants and agrees with the said P. A. Stallings to pay the said P. A. Stallings at Nevada, Texas, as rent for the same the sum of four hundred and no/100 hundred ($400.00) dollars per year, payable as follows: It is agreed and understood that the said A. B. Crenshaw is to pay to the said P. A. Stallings such sum, not to exceed the $400.00, at such time as the said P. A. Stallings may choose, for her actual living expenses.

"(2) It is also agreed and understood that the said A. B. Crenshaw shall, in consideration of repairing and keeping repaired at the said A. B. Crenshaw's expense, the above premises, have all rent money for his own use except that which the said P. A. Stallings shall have for her actual living expenses.

"(3) * * *

"(4) It is agreed and understood that the said P. A. Stallings and the said A. B. Crenshaw shall, on the first day of each January, have a full and complete settlement of all business transacted during the previous year unless providentially prevented.

"(5) The covenants herein shall extend to and be binding upon the heirs, executors and administrators of the parties to this contract."

Mrs. Stallings, the appellee, testified: That she was 75 years old in January. That the defendant Crenshaw was her son-in-law. That Crenshaw's wife died in April, 1918, or 1917. That she lived with Crenshaw and his wife up to the time of her daughter's death and for a short while thereafter. That she left because she was not satisfied, and it seemed that Crenshaw did not want her there. That she had nothing to do with the preparation of the contract; Crenshaw had it prepared and brought it to her to sign. When she decided not to live in the house with him and his children any longer she asked him for money to build a room for herself as an addition to her son's house so she could live with him. That her son lived in one of the western drouth-stricken counties. She asked for $500 for that purpose, and her request was refused. That she regarded the building of this room as an addition to her son's house as necessary for her comfort and happiness. It further appeared that, in accordance with the contract, about the 1st day of January of the first year after its execution, the parties had a settlement, and Crenshaw executed to Mrs. Stallings a note for the difference between $400, the amount stipulated as the annual rent and the amount of money which had been advanced by Crenshaw to Mrs. Stallings for the previous year. Annually thereafter, it appears that this difference was added to the amount due, and a new note executed for the increased sum. This practice continued until February, 1918, when the following note was executed:

"$3,134.60

Nevada, Texas,

"February 21, 1918.

"— After date, for value received I promise to pay to Mrs. P. A. Stallings, or order, thirty-one hundred thirty-four and ⁶⁰/₁₀₀ dollars at Nevada, Texas, to bear interest at the rate of — per cent. per annum from —. And further hereby agree if this note is not paid when due to pay all costs necessary for collection, including ten per cent. for attorney's fees.

"Due in accordance with a certain contract dated September 4, 1906, and payable in accordance with the same.

"[I. R. Stamps, 64 cents] A. B. Crenshaw.

"March 14, 1918. By cash on within note, $30.00."

This suit is filed to recover the amount of the note. The defendant, Crenshaw, in due time filed his plea in abatement, alleging that the suit was prematurely brought. The trial court rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of the note, interest at 6 per cent., and attorney's fees.

Under several assignments it is insisted that the suit was prematurely brought because the note by express provision was made payable in accordance with the terms of the contract and by the terms of the contract plaintiff's right to recover was not shown. It appears from the evidence that both the note and the contract were prepared by Crenshaw, or at his instance, and the latter presented to Mrs. Stallings for her signature; that he was custodian of both the contract and the original note, together with its several renewals. If there is any uncertainty in their terms, they must, under these facts, be construed most strongly against the appellant. It will be seen that the note does not fix the date of its maturity, but expressly provides that it is due and payable in accordance with the contract. The contract provides in paragraph 1 that appellant shall pay appellee rent not to exceed $400 per year at such time as the said Mrs. Stallings may choose, for her actual living expenses. The effect of paragraph 2 is that Crenshaw should be entitled to retain for his use all of the $400 rent not necessary for the actual living expenses of Mrs. Stallings. It was contemplated by the parties, as appears from the language of paragraph 4, that on the 1st day of each January, the parties should have a full and complete settlement of all business transacted during the previous year. The note sued upon is the result of these annual settlements. There is nothing in the oral testimony of the parties to indicate when final payment should be made by Crenshaw of the amount of annual rent due Mrs. Stallings over and above her living expenses. The note, itself is a promise to pay these sums, with interest and attorney's fees. Since neither the note nor the contract fix the date of payment, the general rule that a promissory note, in which no time is specified for payment, is due upon demand applies. The uncontradicted evidence shows that payment was duly demanded and refused. C. J. vol. 8, p. 405; note 69, citing Kampmann v. Williams, 70 Tex. 568, 8 S. W. 310; Chambers v. Hill, 28 Tex. 472; Salinas v. Wright, 11 Tex. 572. A failure to pay the note upon demand entitled appellee to sue upon it and recover the principal, together with interest at 6 per cent., and the attorney's fees, as provided therein. Appellee's pleadings and evidence are sufficient to sustain the judgment for the attorney's fees.

The judgment is affirmed.

GATEWAY PRODUCE CO. v. SUNSET FRUIT & PRODUCE CO. et al. (No. 2289.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
June 3, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 966(2)—Ruling on motion for continuance not disturbed in absence of abuse of discretion.

Court's ruling on motion of continuance for absence of testimony will not be disturbed on appeal in the absence of abuse of discretion.

2. Continuance \S 26(12)—Refusal to continue for testimony of absent witness held proper in absence of showing of diligence.

Where plaintiff had three months within which to have process issue to compel witness to appear before notary public and give his testimony, court's refusal to continue the case upon the ground that supplemental interrogatories had been propounded to such witness, who had failed to answer them, in order to prosecute legal process to compel such witness to testify, was not error; sufficient diligence not having been shown by plaintiff.

3. Garnishment \S 218—Proceeds of seller's draft on buyer delivered to assignee of seller's account against buyer held to belong to assignee intervenor.

Facts in evidence showing that seller shipped goods to its own order and assigned its account against buyer, and delivered draft on buyer with bill of lading to assignee, who intervened in garnishment proceedings, held to support court's finding that the proceeds of draft in hands of bank to which assignee had sent it for collection belonged to assignee intervenor, and could not be reached by seller's creditor.

Appeal from District Court, Bowie County; Sam. H. Smelser, Special Judge.

Action by the Gateway Produce Company against the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company, in which the American Commercial Bank intervened. Judgment for intervenor, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wheeler & Robison, of Texarkana, for appellant.

King & Estes, of Texarkana, for appellee.

LEVY, J. The appellant sued the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company for damages for breach of contract and obtained a judgment by default against it. At the time of filing the suit the plaintiff sued out a writ of garnishment against the Texarkana National Bank, claiming that the bank had funds in its hands belonging to the defendants. The garnishee bank answered that it, acting as a collecting bank, had received from the American Commercial Bank of Wapato, Wash., claiming to be the owner thereof, a draft for $1,176 and had collected it against the Gateway Produce Company, and prayed that the said bank be made a party to the garnishment proceedings. The American Commercial Bank filed a plea of intervention, setting up that it was the owner of the draft by assignment and delivery for a valuable consideration, and as such owner was entitled to the proceeds collected in payment of it, and prayed for judgment for the money. The plaintiff by supplemental petition denied that the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company owed the intervenor and had assigned the draft, and specially asked that the intervenor be required, if the draft had not been paid, to apply the funds then in its hands to the payment of its claims and debts against the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company. The court, after hearing the evidence, entered judgment that the plaintiff take nothing by reason of the garnishment proceedings and that the intervenor recover of the garnishee and the plaintiff the sum of money held by the garnishee by virtue of the writ of garnishment.

The first assignment of error complains of the overruling of the appellant's motion for a continuance of the cause. The application alleges that—

"The plaintiff desires the continuance of this cause in order to procure some additional testimony of J. P. Denham, who resides in Wapato, Wash., and who is the cashier and the active officer of the intervenor."

It appears from the bill of exception that on June 3, 1919, before the trial of the case on January 12, 1920, the depositions of the witness J. P. Denham were filed in the court, and for the purpose of further developing certain facts supplemental or additional interrogatories were propounded by the plaintiff and crossed by the intervenor and were forwarded to a notary public in Wapato, Wash. The witness, it is further alleged, "has failed and refused to answer said interrogatories," and "the notary public holding said depositions in this case has no power to force him to give his depositions in this case." The testimony sought is material, it is alleged, to the plaintiff's suit.

[1, 2] Assuming that the additional evidence sought was material in the case, yet the trial court may have properly overruled the motion, we conclude, on the ground of the want of sufficient diligence to have the witness testify, if such could be done through legal process. And if the trial court did not abuse the discretion lodged in him to grant continuances of this character, then this court cannot disturb the ruling. It reasonably appears from the application that the months of October, November, and December, 1919, passed without any effort to have process to issue to compel the witness to appear before the notary public and give his testimony. We conclude that the assignment must be overruled.

[3] By the second assignment of error it is contended that the court should have rendered judgment for the plaintiff and not for the intervenor. The question in the case was that of priority of claims against the funds garnished. If the intervenor was, as contended by it, the owner of the draft and the proceeds collected in payment thereof, then the funds garnished were not subject to the plaintiff's garnishment lien. The court's conclusion on all the facts in evidence was that the intervenor was the owner of the draft and the proceeds of collection at the time of the garnishment. It is believed that the facts support the court's conclusion and judgment. Denison Bank & Trust Co. v. People's Guaranty State Bank, 218 S. W. 561.

It appears that the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company on the 13th of September, 1918, entered into a contract to sell the appellant two carloads of apples and then breached the contract, resulting in damage to the appellant in the sum of $750. On the 20th of November, 1918, the appellant bought from the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company another car of apples for the sum of $1,176, which apples were shipped under a shipper's order bill of lading, showing that the apples were consigned to the order of the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company, Texarkana, Ark., notify Gateway Produce Company. It further appears that when the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company procured the bill of lading it made out an account against the Gateway Produce Company for $1,176 as the purchase price of the car of apples, and then sold and assigned said account to the American Commercial Bank of Wapato, Wash., and at the same time drew a draft on the Gateway Produce Company in favor of said bank for the amount of the account and delivered the draft and the bill of lading mentioned to the bank along with the assigned account. The account had the following indorsement signed by the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company, to wit: "For value received we hereby assign above account to the American Commercial Bank of Wapato, Washington."

The bank, in consideration of the assignment and delivery of the account, draft, and bill of lading, advanced to the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company $940, in evidence of which it took from the company a note payable on or before 30 days from date. At the time of this transaction the American Commercial Bank held an unpaid note against the Sunset Fruit & Produce Company for $3,500, and it was understood that the difference between the advancement and the $940 and the amount of the draft in controversy should be applied in payment of this above debt. The American Commercial Bank immediately forwarded the draft, together with the bill of lading attached, to the Texarkana National Bank for collection for its own account. Upon the draft and bill of lading above mentioned reaching the Texarkana National Bank, it notified the Gateway Produce Company, and that company immediately paid the draft and received the bill of lading. These facts would be sufficient, without setting out the other facts, to support the court's findings.

The third assignment of error does not present reversible error, and it should be, we conclude, overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARTLETT et al. v. STATE ex rel. DUMONT REALTY CO. (No. 592.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont.
May 26, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 23, 1920.)

1. Quo warranto \S 62—Appeals must be prosecuted to term of appellate court in session.

Under Rev. St. 1911, art. 6401, appeals in quo warranto must be prosecuted to the term of the appellate court in session at the time judgment was rendered in the district court, and respondents, having abandoned their appeal, cannot have the case reviewed on writ of error.

2. Quo warranto \S 62—Respondents should have appealed during term in session when judgment rendered.

Under Rev. St. 1911, art. 6401, and rule 7 for the Courts of Civil Appeals (142 S. W. x), to give a Court of Civil Appeals jurisdiction of appeal from judgment in a quo warranto proceeding respondents should have filed their appeal in it not later than the first Monday in July, 1918, during the term of the court in session when the judgment was rendered in the trial court, and should have filed transcript on appeal within 20 days after perfecting appeal.

3. Quo warranto \S 62—Writ of error improperly prosecuted not saved by theory statute applies only to portion of judgment.

Writ of error prosecuted by respondents in quo warranto proceedings, who failed to file their appeal in the Court of Civil Appeals during its term in session when judgment was rendered, and to file transcript on appeal within 20 days thereafter, cannot be saved on any ground that Rev. St. 1911, art. 6401, applies only to the portion of the judgment which is for ouster, where dismissal of the portion of the appeal for ouster disposes of all portions of the judgment directly affecting respondents.

4. Quo warranto \S 62—Question raised by motion to dismiss writ of error jurisdictional.

Where there is motion to dismiss writ of error prosecuted by respondents in a quo warranto proceeding on the ground that appeal was not perfected or transcript filed within time, under Rev. St. 1911, art. 6401, and rule 7 for the Courts of Civil Appeals (142 S. W. x), the question raised by the motion is jurisdictional, and leaves the court no discretion relative to dismissing writ.

5. Appeal and error \S 187(3)—Absence of necessary parties fundamental error which cannot be waived.

The absence of necessary parties is a question of fundamental error, and cannot be waived.

Error from District Court, Harris County;
A. R. Hamblen, Special Judge.

Action in the nature of quo warranto by the State of Texas, on the relation of the Dumont Realty Company, against L. L. Bartlett and others. To review judgment for plaintiff, defendants bring error. Writ of error dismissed.

Bradley & Fogle, of Houston, for plaintiffs in error.

Hutcheson, Bryan & Dyess and E. T. Branch, all of Houston, for defendant in error.

WALKER, J. This was an action in the nature of quo warranto instituted by the state of Texas, upon relation of Dumont Realty Company, against L. L. Bartlett, H. C. Gatton, S. B. Glazener, and G. A. Dutton. It was alleged that Bartlett was acting as mayor, Gatton and Glazener as commissioners, and Dutton as tax collector of the city of South Houston, Harris county, Tex.; that a void effort had been made by the village of South Houston to accept the provisions of title 22, chapter 1, of the Revised Statutes of Texas, in lieu of title 22, chapter 14, under which the village of South Houston was incorporated in 1915; and that respondents, though holding under a pretended election, were without authority to act in any official capacity, and that all their pretended acts were null and void. It was further alleged that in acting for the city of South Houston, they had issued interest-bearing warrants, which had been sold, and had passed ordinances levying taxes to pay such warrants. It was further alleged that there was no such municipal corporation as the city of South Houston, because the acts of the village of South Houston in attempting to accept the provisions of title 22, chapter 1, were null and void. The petition concluded with the following prayer:

"Wherefore, plaintiff prays the court that the defendants be cited to appear and answer this petition, and for judgment that the city of South Houston is not incorporated under either article 1070 of the Revised Statutes of 1911, as amended by the Acts of the Thirty-Third Legislature, nor under chapter 1 of title 22 of the Revised Statutes of 1911, or under any other law of the state of Texas, and that the defendants be adjudged to be not entitled to the several positions now held or claimed to be held by them, and the several acts of the defendants and their predecessors be adjusted (adjudged) to be null and void, and for such other and further relief, special and general, in law and in equity, to which the plaintiff may be justly entitled, and for costs of suit."

Judgment was entered declaring null and void the efforts of the village of South Houston to change the nature of its corporate existence, and declaring null and void the ordinances passed by the respondents, acting as a city commission of the city of South Houston, and declaring null and void the warrants and other obligations issued by them. As affecting the respondents, judgment was entered as follows:

"Defendant G. A. Dutton is without legal authority to collect any taxes assessed or levied under the void tax levies for year 1916 hereinbefore referred to, and is without authority to collect for the year 1917 more than 25 cents on the $100 valuation of property for current expenses, and the acts of the said Dutton in collecting such taxes, and in applying the same or any part thereof to the payment of interest on the aforesaid warrants in the sum of $15,500, were null and void.

"L. L. Bartlett does not now and has not at any time legally held the position nor has he legally exercised the powers of mayor of the city of South Houston, as attempted to be created as a town of 600 or more population.

"H. C. Gatton and S. B. Glazener are not now and have not at any time legally held the position of or legally exercised the powers of commissioners of the city of South Houston, as attempted to be created a city of 600 or more population.

"L. L. Bartlett as mayor, and H. C. Gatton and S. B. Glazener as commissioners, are now and have been since their election on April 4, 1916, de jure officers of the village of South Houston, as originally incorporated, with only the powers and rights of officers of a village incorporated under the provisions of chapter 15, title 22, Revised Statutes of 1911, and no other rights or powers.

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiffs, the state of Texas, and the relator, Dumont Realty Company, do have and recover of and from the defendants L. L. Bartlett, H. C. Gatton, S. B. Glazener, and G. A. Dutton all costs in this behalf expended, for which let execution issue."

Judgment was entered in this cause in the trial court in January, 1918. Motion for new trial was overruled February 15, 1918. Respondents gave due notice of appeal. However, no appeal was perfected. On the 22d day of January, 1919, respondents filed petition for writ of error. Service was had on the 24th of January, and transcript was filed in the Court of Civil Appeals for the First Supreme Judicial District on the 21st of April, 1919. Afterwards this cause was duly transferred to this court. Defendants in error have moved to dismiss this writ of error because not filed in time.

[1] Under article 6401, appeals in quo warranto must be prosecuted to the term of the appellate court in session at the time judgment was rendered in the district court. Fontaine v. State, 69 Tex. 510, 6 S. W. 816; Livingston v. State, 70 Tex. 393, 11 S. W. 115; Kendall v. State, 51 S. W. 1102. Respondents did not do this, but, having abandoned their appeal, are seeking to have this case reviewed on writ of error. This is without warrant of law. Livingston v. State, supra.

Under rule 7 for the Courts of Civil Appeals (142 S. W. x):

"Transcripts of appeals from judgments in proceedings in quo warranto shall be filed in the Court of Civil Appeals within 20 days after appeal is perfected." State v. Nelson, 170 S. W. 814.

[2] In order to give this court jurisdiction of this case, respondents should have filed their appeal in the appellate court not later than the first Monday in July, 1918, and should have filed the transcript on appeal within 20 days after perfecting their appeal. As they failed to do this, we are forced to dismiss this writ of error.

[3] Respondents seek to avoid the force of this article and the decisions cited by us on the ground that they apply only to that portion of the judgment which is for ouster, citing Oriental Oil Co. v. State, 135 S. W. 724; Cole v. State, 163 S. W. 354; 2 McQuillan on Municipal Corporations, § 809. These decisions cannot save this writ of error. If we dismiss that portion of the appeal which is for ouster, then we have disposed of all portions of the judgment directly affecting the respondents. Their rights are completely separable from the rights of the warrant holders, and their attempted appeal does not give us jurisdiction of the other portions of the judgment.

[4] The question raised by this motion to dismiss is jurisdictional, and we have no discretion in the matter. State v. Nelson supra.

[5] Messrs. Harris, McCall & Graham, attorneys at law, have filed with us, since submission, an amicus curiae brief, suggesting that the warrant holders were necessary parties to any proceeding affecting the warrants, and praying that this cause be reversed on fundamental error. Defendants in error have answered this brief, suggesting that the judgment of the trial court, in so far as it undertakes to affect parties not before it, is an absolute nullity. The absence of necessary parties is a question of fundamental error, and cannot be waived. Bule v. Cunningham, 29 S. W. 801; Channel Co. v. Bruly, 45 Tex. 6. But, as stated above, in our view of this case, we have nothing before us, and are without authority to do otherwise than to dismiss this writ of error. In as much as it appears on the face of the judgment that necessary parties were absent in the trial court, and that the judgment, as affecting them, is null and void, and that their rights are separable from the rights of respondents, even if we are wrong in declining to take jurisdiction of this writ of error, under rule 62a for the Courts of Civil Appeals (149 S. W. x.), we would hesitate to reverse the case.

Writ of error in all things dismissed, on the error suggested by Messrs. Harris, McCall & Graham.

BAKER v. BEATTIE. (No. 2269.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
June 10, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 17, 1920.)

1. Master and servant §3(1)—Contract of employment not absolutely void for fraudulent statement.

A contract of employment is not absolutely void by reason of a false representation by the servant that he had never been paid more than $100 in settlement of damages for personal injuries, such a fraudulent statement only affording ground for avoidance or annulment of the contract at the option of the master, and until actual termination the relation continues to exist.

2. Master and servant §139—Proximate cause of switchman's injury defined.

Where foreman directed cars to be switched onto a clear track, but instead they were switched onto a different track, where they bumped into standing cars, injuring a switchman operating a brake, the efficient cause of the injury was the impact of the cars and not the switching onto the wrong track.

3. Master and servant §213(3)—Risk of injury from impact of switched cars assumed.

Impact of box cars being switched is a risk ordinarily incident to the work of a switchman, which he assumes, and he cannot recover for injuries caused by being wrenched while operating a brake on top of a box car by an impact of the force usual and ordinary in the switching business.

4. Master and servant. §297(2)—Findings held inconsistent.

Where the legal effect of a part of the findings of a jury is to establish actionable negligence, and the effect of part of the findings is to establish a want of negligence, but only ordinary assumed risks, the verdict becomes so uncertain by reason of the inconsistent findings that it cannot be made the basis of a judgment.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Ewing Boyd, Judge.

Action by W. A. Beattie against James A. Baker, receiver. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The appellee sues for damages for alleged personal injuries received while performing the duties of a switchman in the yards of appellant at Houston, Tex. The negligence alleged was:

"That the signal was given for the train upon which he was working to go down into an empty track, but that such signal was negligently and carelessly transmitted to another employé on the switch engine, or was negligently or carelessly given to the employé, or was negligently or carelessly transmitted by one employé to another; and that the employés of the defendant carelessly and negligently shoved the cars upon which the plaintiff was working onto a track containing other cars, and carelessly and negligently jammed or bumped the cars upon which he was working suddenly and violently against the other cars already on said track; and that said violent bumping of said cars threw or twisted him around the brake staff, his foot catching and body twisting, and by reason of which he was injured."

And then follows a description of the injuries. The defendant pleaded general denial, contributory negligence, and assumed risk, and specially that plaintiff in his written application for employment as a switchman made false answers to procure the position, and that because of these fraudulent misstatements the relation of master and servant did not exist, and the plaintiff was consequently a trespasser upon the cars at the time of his injury.

The case was submitted to the jury on special issues, and their findings are: (1) That the act on the part of the employes in heading the seven cars on which the plaintiff was riding into a different side track than the one directed by the foreman to be used, causing them suddenly or violently to be bumped against other cars standing on said side track, was negligence; (2) that such negligence proximately caused the injuries to the plaintiff; and (3) that the plaintiff was not guilty of any contributory negligence. The jury further answered:

"No. 7. Did the cut of cars on which W. A. Beattie was riding collide with the other cars with unusual force, or with the force that is usual and ordinary in the switching business? Answer: They collided with the force usual and ordinary in the switching business."

"No. 13. Do you or do you not find that the injuries of the plaintiff, if any, were due to any risk arising in the discharge of his duty as a switchman and ordinarily incident to such work, or do you find that such injury, if any, resulted from the negligence of the servants and employes of the defendant? Answer: We find that the injury resulted from the negligence of the servants and employes of the defendant."

"Special issue requested by the defendant: Do you believe from the evidence the cars came together with unusual force and that plaintiff discovered that they would do so in time, by the exercise of ordinary care on his part, to have protected himself from injury, and failed to use ordinary care to so protect himself? Answer: No."

The evidence shows that the plaintiff was a switchman in the yards of Houston, and at the time in question was one of a switch crew of three, working under a foreman. It was necessary for the crew to place 35 or 40 freight cars on the tracks at the freight house on Commerce street. These cars were loaded with merchandise and were being placed for the purpose of unloading them. The foreman, in the hearing of appellee, directed 7 cars to be put into a sidetrack known as "city No. 1," which at that time was clear of any cars. Appellee was then directed by the foreman to ride on top of the 7 cars so as to stop them by means of the brakes when they reached the end of the track. The cars were not headed into the track directed by the foreman, but by some misunderstanding were headed into the adjoining side track, called "house track No. 2." The latter track had on it at the time 12 merchandise cars. After directing the 7 cars to be put on the side track the foreman uncoupled them from the other cars and then the switch engine put them in motion. According to appellee's evidence, supported by the other witnesses:

"All the kick you had to give those cars was to have the engine shove the slack against them so you can raise the coupling pin, and they will roll by gravity the rest of the way."

The 7 cars struck against the cars already on the side track, and, as appellee says:

"When they struck it twisted me around the brake staff, threw my body around, and my foot caught on something, I don't know what it was, and twisted my left knee," causing injury.

Wm. H. Wilson, Samuel B. Dabney, and John M. King, all of Houston, and J. H. Ranson, of Bryan, for appellant.

K. C. Barkley, of Houston, for appellee.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Appellee had been in the employ of the appellant for nearly two years. In his application for employment in the first instance the appellee incorrectly stated his age and his name, and answered "No" to each of the following questions:

"(14) Have you ever sustained a serious or permanent personal injury?"

"(15) Have you ever had, or have you now, a lawsuit against any railway company or the receiver thereof?"

"(16) Have you ever been paid more than the sum of $100 at one time in the settlement of a claim or lawsuit for damages for personal injuries sustained or alleged to have been sustained by you?"

Appellee had sustained a former injury of his left knee while employed as a switchman in Louisiana, and had been paid for the injury more than $100 by judgment of the court. Appellant insists, under appropriate assignments of error, that as the appellee had procured his employment as a switchman by false statements the contract of employment would be void and the relation of master and servant would not exist. This contention should, it is thought, be overruled. The contract of employment not being rescinded or canceled at the time of the injury, the appellee would be held to be an employe of the appellant. The contract of employment would not be absolutely void because of the alleged fraudulent statements. The alleged fraudulent statements would only afford grounds for a voidance or annulment of the contract of employment at the option of the company. And until the contract of employment was actually terminated by the company on the ground of the alleged fraudulent statements, the relation of master and servant would legally continue and exist. It is stated in Labatt on Master and Servant (2d Ed.) vol. 1, § 96a:

"A contract is not rendered void ab initio by the fact that the master was induced by the servant's fraud to enter into it. Such fraud constitutes a ground for dismissing the servant, or a defense to an action for the wages stipulated." Railway Co. v. Harris, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 434, 107 S. W. 108; Lupher v. Railway

[2-4] It is contended that the findings of the jury are inconsistent with each other and authorized, as a matter of law, a different judgment, and that the court erred in rendering judgment on the verdict for the plaintiff. It is believed that the contention should be sustained." The jury made the finding that in switching the seven cars into house track No. 2, causing the sudden or violent impact against the cars already on the track, there was negligence proximately causing the injuries to the plaintiff. If this finding were all the findings made, then a judgment thereon for the plaintiff was legally warranted. But the jury further found as a fact that the impact of the cars was not with "unusual force," but only "with the force usual and ordinary in the switching business." This later finding was further emphasized by the further finding in the special requested issue that (1) the cars did not "come together with unusual force," and (2) that "the plaintiff did not discover that they would do so in time to use ordinary care to protect himself from injury." There does not appear in the evidence that there was any shunting or kicking of the cars in the operation of the same. If there were no other findings than the latter findings of fact, a judgment for the appellant was legally authorized on the ground that there can be no recovery for injuries due to the ordinary risks of the particular work. There is, then, as seen, repugnancy in the several findings in matters material to the issues involved in the case. The mere fact that the cars were switched into house track No. 2 instead of side track No. 1 did not occasion any injury. The real and efficient cause of the injury was the impact of the cars. This impact, the jury finds, was (1) a sudden and violent jam or bump, but (2) not with "unusual force" and "with the force usual and ordinary in the switching business." Appellee as a switchman would know that every impact is in some measure forcible. If, as found by the jury, the impact causing the injury was a risk ordinarily incident to the work being done, then the employé assumes that risk and cannot recover. 4 Thompson on Negligence, § 4613; 18 R. C. L. p. 676. The railway company would not be guilty of negligence if only the ordinary risk of the work is established as being the cause of the injury. Accordingly, if the risk to which the injury was due was an ordinary one, the appellant is not liable, even if the employé did use ordinary care for his safety. The further finding of the jury on question 13 would not make the verdict certain. The question called for a legal conclusion. Where the jury finds the facts particularly, the court then decides the law arising on them. And where, as here, the legal effect of a part of the findings is to establish actionable negligence, and the effect of a part of the findings is to establish a want of any negligence but only ordinary assumed risks, the verdict becomes so uncertain by reason of the inconsistent findings that it cannot be made the basis of a judgment.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

STARR et al. v. BROOKS et al. (No. 2273.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. May 26, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 24, 1920.)

1. Tenancy in common ⇐45—Conveyance of specific part, ratified by cotenant, operates as partition.

When one tenant in common conveys a specific part of the common property, the conveyance may be ratified by the other cotenant and made to operate as a partition or conveyance in severalty, and the nonconveying tenant may recognize such deed by conveying in like manner the remainder of the common property by metes and bounds.

On Motion for Rehearing.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇐245—Whether junior purchase was in good faith and for value held for jury.

In trespass to try title, where plaintiffs claimed under a deed conveying an undivided half interest executed in 1848, and defendants claimed under a deed executed in 1846, but not recorded until 1853, evidence of assertion of title by plaintiff's predecessors in interest for more than 70 years, with payment of taxes and active steps towards protecting the lands from trespass, held sufficient to require the submission to the jury of plaintiff's purchase in good faith for a valuable consideration without notice of the first conveyance.

Appeal from District Court, Anderson County; John S. Prince, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. Clara C. Starr and others against B. H. Brooks and others to recover realty. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded for another trial.

F. H. Prendergast, of Marshall, and A. G. Greenwood, of Palestine, for appellants.

N. B. Morris and Mills Reeves, both of Palestine, for appellees.

HODGES, J. The appellants filed suit in the court below to recover of the appellees 800 acres of land described as a part of the Polly Scritchfield league, situated in Andereson county. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendants below, based upon a peremptory instruction given by the court. The facts show that Augustus Hotchkiss is the common source of title. Hotchkiss conveyed an undivided half interest in the property in 1846 to J. P. Smythe. Smythe's deed was not recorded until November 30, 1853. The appellees claim under Smythe. Hotchkiss conveyed the entire tract of land in 1848 to A. H. Donaldson, under whom the appellants claim title.

The first question is: Which of these conveyances should have priority? Under the statute of 1840, which then governed the registration of deeds, a junior purchaser, in order to postpone a prior unrecorded deed, had the burden of proving that he purchased in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and without notice of the first conveyance. Ryle v. Davidson, 102 Tex. 280, 115 S. W. 28. Appellants contend that the act of 1841 is the law that should be here applied, and that this statute changed the rule imposed by the act of 1840. The act of 1841 will be found in volume 2, page 627, of Gammel's Laws of Texas. After carefully considering that act, we are of the opinion that it did not modify the controlling part of the act of 1840, or in any way alter the rule above stated. The case of Ryle v. Davidson involved a junior conveyance made in 1846, and the question before the court was: Should it have priority over an unrecorded deed made in 1835? Without discussing the act of 1841, the Supreme Court applied the law of 1840, thereby holding that it should control as to deed executed at that time. The important facts in that case are not materially different from those here involved.

Appellants concede that there was no direct evidence to show that any of those claiming under the conveyance to Donaldson had paid a valuable consideration, or had purchased without notice of the Smythe deed; but they insist that there are circumstances disclosed in the evidence which would have authorized the jury to find those essential facts. The circumstances were, in substance, the payment of taxes practically every year by the claimants under Donaldson, the ejection of trespassers, and their actual claim of ownership. It appears that none of the parties were ever in actual possession of any portion of the tract of land, but that some of those who claimed under the Donaldson deed had brought suit and ejected trespassers. It was also shown that the appellants and those under whom they claimed had paid all the taxes, and that the appellees had never reimbursed them, or offered to reimburse them, for any part of the money so paid. It is true, as stated in the case of Holland v. Nance, 102 Tex. 181, 114 S. W. 346, that proof of the payment of a valuable consideration and a purchase without notice of a prior unrecorded deed may be made by circumstances. But the circumstances here relied on are not sufficient to supply that proof. The lapse of a great length of time alone has never been held to be a circumstance strong enough to meet the requirements of the statute. Rogers v. Houston, 60 S. W. 447; Rogers v. Pettus, 80 Tex. 427, 15 S. W. 1093; Bremer v. Case, 60 Tex. 152. In the last case referred to the court held that where the parties to the transaction had died, and no direct proof could be made that the subsequent purchaser had or had not notice of a prior conveyance, upon proof being made that the subsequent purchaser paid a valuable consideration, the presumption might be indulged that he paid without notice of a prior conveyance. But in this case there is no evidence that any of the purchasers of the Donaldson title ever paid a valuable consideration, and hence no basis for the presumption referred to above. It is true the holders of the Donaldson title paid the taxes; but, being the owners of an undivided half interest, it was their duty to keep the taxes paid. They also had the right to eject trespassers from the premises. Such conduct was not inconsistent with the title which they had a legal right to assert. It is that situation which distinguishes this case from that of Holland v. Nance.

[1] Appellants further contend that under the conveyance to Donaldson they became owners of at least an undivided half interest in the land, and in the trial below should have had a judgment for title to that interest. It is conceded that some time prior to the institution of this suit the appellants had sold off to third parties 875 acres of the common property, describing the tracts conveyed by metes and bounds. Approximately 800 acres, or less than half, is all that remained of the original grant. Appellants, in effect, assert the proposition that, notwithstanding they had sold for their own exclusive benefit more than one-half of the common property, they were entitled to share equally with the appellees in the remainder. We do not agree to that contention. When one tenant in common conveys a specific part of the common property, that conveyance may be ratified by the other cotenant, and thus made to operate as a partition or conveyance in severalty. The nonconveying tenant may recognize such a deed by conveying in like manner the remainder of the common property by metes and bounds; and when this is done it practically amounts to a partition of the land, and both deeds may be treated as effective. 7 R. C. L. pp. 882, 883, and cases cited in the notes. When the appellants conveyed more than their half of the common property, they had no right to demand and receive any portion of the remainder, without alleging and proving that the portion they conveyed was less valuable than that which remained. The original petitions in this case were in the form of an action of trespass to try title, and the pleas were "not guilty." The appellees, as defendants, were therefore not required to specially plead any equitable rights to entitle them to defeat the claim of the appellants. There was no proof offered that one portion of the land was more valuable than another, or what was the value of any portion of the land. It appears that the tract here sued for was uninclosed, and not in the actual possession of any claimant.

A decision of these questions, we think, settles this controversy, and the judgment is affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[2] We have concluded, upon further consideration, that the facts of this case, so far as they relate to the circumstances tending to show a purchase for value and without notice of the senior conveyance to Smythe, cannot be distinguished from those which controlled the Supreme Court in disposing of the case of Holland v. Nance, above referred to. While the conditions are different in the respects pointed out in the original opinion, the difference is not such as to destroy the probative force of material circumstances from which a purchase for value and without notice might have been inferred. The evidence shows that for more than 70 years those claiming under the Smythe conveyance, made in 1846, asserted no title to the land and undertook to exercise no acts of ownership over it. The evidence further shows that during all that time those claiming under the junior conveyance to Donaldson did assert title, and a part of the time took active steps towards protecting the land from trespassers. There is nothing to indicate that their claim was less than what it purported to be—title to the entire interest. It further appears without dispute that those who could have testified to the bona fides of the purchase from Hotchkiss, the common source, were dead; and the only method by which the appellants can now establish those essential facts is by resort to the circumstances attending the conveyance and the subsequent claims of the parties. While the circumstances relied on are not conclusive evidence of those essentials required to establish the appellants' title, they are such that the jury might take into consideration in determining that issue.

For the reasons stated we feel that justice requires that this case be reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial, and it is accordingly so ordered.

GERMAN et al. v. HOUSTON & T. C. R. CO. (No. 8197.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, Austin.
May 5, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 18, 1920.)

1. New trial \S 53—Disqualification of juror does not render verdict void; "competent."

In view of Const. art. 16, § 19, and Rev. St. 1911, arts. 5114, 5115, 5117, 5194, 5206, a juror under 21 years of age is incompetent and disqualified, the word "competent" in the statute meaning legally qualified, but such disqualification does not render the verdict void where the question was first raised on motion for new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Competent.]

2. New trial \S 44(1)—Conduct of jury in considering foreman's statements and a map drawn by him held to warrant a new trial.

In an action for plaintiffs' ejection from defendant's train after being carried beyond destination, the jury's consideration of its foreman's map drawn partly from information not in the evidence and the foreman's statement that he knew defendant's witnesses, and that he was credible, and that foreman had once been carried past his station and was taken to the next station and carried back without extra charge, where there was a question of contributory negligence in plaintiffs' voluntarily getting off the train between stations, constituted misconduct of jury warranting new trial.

3. Appeal and error \S 978(3)—Discretion of court in refusing new trial for misconduct of jury reviewable.

The discretion of the trial judge in refusing a new trial for misconduct of the jury in considering evidence of their foreman given while deliberating on verdict is subject to review upon appeal.

Appeal from District Court, McLennan County; H. M. Richey, Judge.

Suit by L. R. German and wife against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

W. L. Eason and W. B. Carrington, both of Waco, for appellants.

Stribling & Stribling, of Waco, for appellee.

BRADY, J. L. R. German and his wife brought this suit against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company for damages by reason of being ejected from defendant's train near Bremond, Tex. The basis of the action was the claim that the railroad company was negligent in not informing plaintiffs of their arrival at Bremond, although the conductor had personally promised to notify them, and the ejection of plaintiffs from the train during a hard rain, after having carried them about a mile and a half beyond the station. Rough and insulting treatment by the conductor in ejecting plaintiff's wife and grandchild and injuries resulting were alleged.

The issues made by the pleadings and the evidence are sufficiently indicated by the answers of the jury to the questions submitted by the court. They were, in substance, that the agents of defendant did not fail to announce, in a sufficiently distinct voice to notify passengers, the arrival of the train at Bremond, and that the conductor did not fail to personally notify plaintiffs of such arrival; that the conductor did not use actual force upon Mrs. German in ejecting her, if he did eject her from the train; that the failure of defendant to take plaintiffs back to the Bremond depot was not negligence; that the conductor did not eject plaintiffs from the train; that plaintiffs knew, or by the use of ordinary care could have known, when the train reached Bremond in time for them to have alighted therefrom; that they voluntarily got off the train after it had left the station at Bremond, and that such action was contributory negligence; that the failure of plaintiffs to go to a lodging house in Bremond was contributory negligence; that the exposure to the weather was the proximate cause of the injuries, if any, to the health of Mrs. German and to German, and also of the injuries, if any, to Mrs. German's wearing apparel. The jury found that the reasonable market value of the hat and dress of Mrs. German was $26, but found that there were no damages to plaintiffs because of physical pain or mental anguish. On the verdict judgment was rendered for the defendant.

Opinion.

[1] The first assignment complains of the refusal of the trial court to grant a new trial because one of the jurors was not competent to try the case, not being a qualified voter. The undisputed evidence shows that this juror was not 21 years of age until about 3 weeks after the trial, but the point was not raised until after the verdict, and appeared for the first time in the motion for new trial.

It is conceded by appellants' counsel that there are numerous authorities holding that a mere disqualification of a juror will not render a verdict void, but it is contended that this is not the rule when the juror is made incompetent by statute. A distinction is sought to be made between incompetency and disqualification, but we cannot see the force of the contention. The statute provides that all male persons over 21 years of age are competent jurors, "unless disqualified under some provision of this chapter." We think it is clear that the word "competent," as used in the statute, means legally qualified. A person is as much incompetent or disqualified to serve as a juror when not a freeholder or householder, for instance, as when he is not over 21 years of age. Each of such grounds of disqualification renders him incompetent as a juror, not only as to the particular case, but in any case. Without further discussion of the question, we overrule the assignment; and in support of our holding cite the following authorities: Constitution of Texas, art. 16, § 19; articles 5114, 5115, 5117, 5194, and 5206, tit. 75, R. S. 1911; Railway v. Woodward, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 389, 63 S. W. 1051-1054; Rice v. Dewberry, 93 S. W. 719; Schuster v. LaLonde, 57 Tex. 29; Newman v. Dodson, 61 Tex. 96; Sinsheimer v. Edward Well Co., 61 Tex. Civ. App. 209, 129 S. W. 187; Railway v. Broughton, 212 S. W. 669; Givens v. State, 103 Tenn. 648, 55 S. W. 1111; Blair v. Paterson, 131 Mo. App. 122, 110 S. W. 616; Wassum v. Feeney, 121 Mass. 93, 23 Am. Rep. 258; Johns v. Hodges, 60 Md. 215, 45 Am. Rep. 722; Salisbury v. McClaskey, 26 Hun, 262; Brewer v. Jacobs (C. C.) 22 Fed. 217; 12 Corpus Juris, 233.

[2, 3] It is next contended that the court should have set aside the verdict and granted a new trial because of misconduct of the jury. In brief, this claim is based upon the conduct of the foreman of the jury, Mr. Eaves, in showing to the jury a large map which he had himself drawn, showing Bremond station and objects in that vicinity, including distances marked to certain points, and the conduct of the same juror in having stated to the jury, in substance, that he was personally acquainted with one of defendant's witnesses, T. J. Smith, whom he had known since boyhood, and that for this reason he believed his testimony was true.

Before announcing our conclusion, we will briefly consider these two grounds of alleged misconduct. It appears that Mr. Eaves did prepare and exhibit such a map to the jury, and that he drew the same not only from the evidence, but also, in part at least, from his own knowledge of the town of Bremond and its environments, to which he had not testified. On the map he showed a hotel and lodging house, when the evidence showed but one, and he testified that he had marked the location of a semaphore near the depot, which was not shown by the evidence, and had marked certain distances not based upon the evidence, including the distance to the cattle guard, beyond which it was claimed plaintiffs were ejected from the train. While most, if not all, of the jurors who testified stated that they based their verdict entirely upon the evidence, it was shown that some of the jurors considered this map in determining locations and distances. It appeared that two or three of the jurors were at first for awarding damages to the plaintiffs in a substantial amount, one of the jurors having testified that they yielded to the majority because they were mostly farmers, and were tired and wanted to go home.

Touching the question of the probable effect of the statement of Mr. Eaves, the foreman, that he personally knew Mr. Smith, and that he believed he was a credible witness, it was shown that the testimony of Smith was directly in conflict with plaintiffs' testimony as to whether or not the name of Bremond station was called, and as to whether or not plaintiffs were notified of the arrival of the train at Bremond. In fact, Smith testified that he personally notified them of the arrival of the train in time for them to have gotten off, which they denied. Mr. Smith also testified that when plaintiffs got off the train he had walked to the front and did not see the conductor do anything to them. Plaintiffs claimed that the conductor applied force in ejecting them from the train. Mrs. German stated that the conductor caught her by the arm and pulled her off the train into the rain and mud. The testimony of plaintiffs was to the effect that they had to cross over a cattle guard, and they had to go about a mile and a half back to the station, which took them about a half hour.

There is also another alleged ground of misconduct, consisting of the claim that Mr. Eaves, the foreman, also stated to other members of the jury that he had once made a trip near Tyler, Tex., was carried past his station, but that the conductor took him to the next station, and then carried him back to where he wanted to go, without any extra charge. At least two jurors testified that Eaves made substantially the above statement, although he denied it on the hearing of the motion for new trial. One of the issues submitted to the jury was the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiffs in voluntarily getting off the train into the rain when carried past the station of Bremond, instead of going on to the next station and returning to Bremond on another train.

It is strongly insisted by appellee that none of these matters constituted misconduct on the part of the jury, but, if they did, the question of granting a new trial is by statute committed to the discretion of the trial judge, and, unless that discretion was clearly abused, the case should not be reversed for the alleged misconduct.

The Supreme Court, in H. & T. O. R. R. v. Gray, 105 Tex. 43, 143 S. W. 606, held that the discretion vested in the trial judge in such a matter by our statute is not final nor an arbitrary one, but its exercise may be reviewed by an appellate court, when it clearly appears that the rights of the parties have been disregarded.

This court, in the case of Dunnaway v. Austin Street Ry. Co., 195 S. W. 1159, has held to the same effect, and that, where it appears altogether probable that the statement of a juror, not based upon the evidence, had influence upon other jurors in determining material issues, it is such misconduct as entitles the injured party to a new trial, and the trial court exceeded its discretion when it overruled that contention.

The following cases may also be cited as showing a review by the appellate courts of the discretion of a trial judge in refusing to grant a new trial for misconduct of the jury: South Tex. Mfg. Co. v. Dozier, 158 S. W. 1052; S. L. B. & M. v. Vick, 210 S. W. 250; Andrews Lbr. Co. v. M., K. & T. Ry., 158 S. W. 1194; Manes v. Case Thresh. Mach. Co., 204 S. W. 236; Fave v. Bowers, 33 S. W. 133; Goar v. Thompson, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 330, 47 S. W. 65; G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Matthews, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 92, 66 S. W. 592, 67 S. W. 788; St. L. & S. W. v. Roberts, 196 S. W. 1004; Corpus Christi Ry. v. Kjellberg, 185 S. W. 432; Peppercorn v. City, 89 Wis. 38, 61 N. W. 80, 46 Am. St. Rep. 818; Garside v. Ladd Watch Case Co., 17 R. I. 691, 24 Atl. 473; Gilbert v. State (Cr. App.) 215 S. W. 110. Without expressly approving the conclusion of the courts in all of these cases upon this subject as to the particular facts involved, we cite them as showing the trend of the decisions, especially where it is thought that the rights of parties have been disregarded.

In the instant case, without attempting to point out specifically wherein the misconduct complained of probably affected the jury's verdict, we are clearly of the opinion that it did probably influence the jury in respect to several material issues as to which the evidence was sharply conflicting. We are reluctant to disturb the finding of a trial judge on a matter of this kind, which is largely committed to his discretion, but when we are convinced that a party's rights have been disregarded, and that probable injury resulted from misconduct of the jury, we will not hesitate to review the trial court's action, and to reverse the case, since it thus appears that the discretion devolved by statute has been exceeded. Such is our conclusion in this case when all the acts of misconduct are considered, and, believing that the appellants have not had that fair and impartial trial which the spirit of our laws accords a litigant, and it being impossible to say how far the verdict of the jury was influenced in this case by what we regard as improper conduct of the jurors, although it may have been from no improper motive, we reverse the case for another trial.

Reversed and remanded.

WARD COUNTY WATER IMPROVEMENT
DIST. NO. 2 v. WARD COUNTY IRR.
DIST. NO. 1 et al. (No. 1114.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. El Paso.
May 20, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 17, 1920.)

1. Waters and water courses \Leftrightarrow 247(1)—Water improvement district not empowered to maintain action to adjudicate riparian water rights not acquired by it.

A water improvement district established by commissioners' court under Acts 35th Leg. (1917) c. 87 (Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, arts. 5107—1 to 5107—117), while authorized to sue and be sued, and under sections 1, 24, and 108 (sections 5107—1, 5107—24, 5107—108) empowered to provide for irrigation of the land in the district, to own and construct reservoirs, etc., to acquire right of way, and to acquire water rights and privileges in any way that an individual or corporation may, cannot maintain action to adjudicate riparian water rights; it not having acquired them.

2. Continuance \Leftrightarrow 8—Refusal to continue to bring in parties held proper where exception to petition of no right to assert the cause of action had been sustained.

Where exception to petition to determine riparian water rights had been properly sustained on the ground that it was not alleged plaintiff owned the rights, and that it could not assert a right not owned by it, and there was no offer to amend, there was no error in refusing continuance to bring in riparian owners and contractual water right owners, there being no case left to continue, and such owners not being necessary parties to the suit. Rev. St. 1911, art. 1848.

3. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 927(2)—In absence of showing, grounds of motion to dismiss cross-action granted to be assumed true.

In the absence of any showing to the contrary, the grounds of a motion to dismiss cross-action granted must be assumed true.

4. Abatement and revival \Leftrightarrow 8(2)—Cross-action between defendants held properly dismissed pending a suit involving its subject-matter.

Cross-action of one defendant against another is properly dismissed on plaintiff's motion, where to permit its prosecution would necessitate continuance of the cause, and where there is a suit pending between one defendant and the predecessor in interest of the other involving the subject-matter of the cross-action.

Appeal from District Court, Martin County; Chas. Gibbs, Judge.

Action by the Ward County Water Improvement District No. 2 against the Ward County Irrigation District No. 1 and the Cedarvale Canal Company. Plaintiff's suit and cross-action of the Cedarvale Canal Company against its codefendant were dismissed, and plaintiff and defendant Cedarvale Canal Company appeal. Affirmed.

Gaines & Corbett, of Bay City, Jno. H. Boogher, of Grandfalls, Lee Monroe, of Pecos, and Garrard & Baker, of Midland, for appellants.

J. E. Starley, of Pecos, and H. G. Russell, of Barstow, for appellee.

HIGGINS, J. This suit was brought by Ward County water improvement district No. 2, appellant here, hereinafter referred to as district No. 2, against Ward County irrigation district No. 1, hereinafter referred to as district No. 1, and the Cedarvale Canal Company.

By its first amended petition filed October 21, 1919, the plaintiff in substance alleged as follows: That it was a duly organized irrigation or water improvement district under the laws of Texas, and that district No. 1 was an irrigation district under Texas laws, and the Cedarvale Company was a foreign corporation claiming the right to do business in this state; that plaintiff had incurred heavy financial obligations in the purchase of canals, laterals, ditches, dams, headgates, reservoir rights, water rights, and water appropriations, and had issued its interest-bearing bonds in the sum of $65,000 secured by a lien upon the land situate in the district; that the plaintiff was organized for the purpose of acquiring the unappropriated waters of the Pecos river and furnishing same for irrigation purposes to the lands within the district, and also for appropriating, owning, and controlling appropriations of the waters of said river and furnishing same to said lands for irrigation purposes and domestic uses, and also for the purpose of operating canals for the benefit of the owners of riparian lands in the district abutting on said river so that the waters to which said lands were entitled for domestic and irrigation purposes might be delivered to them in the most economical and efficient manner; that about 43,000 acres of land were included in the district, about 33,000 acres thereof being riparian to the Pecos river; said riparian lands were described and the respective owners thereof named; that said lands were granted by the state prior to 1895. The petition further sets up various appropriations of water from the Pecos river for irrigation purposes made by various persons between the 6th day of September, 1890, and subsequent dates, and that the plaintiff was the successor in interest of the original owners of said appropriations and the irrigation systems of such appropriators, and that it and its predecessors in interest had been using said irrigation systems and making use of said water appropriations for about 24 years; that the defendants had each constructed dams in the Pecos river, thereby diverting from the river the waters thereof and conveying the same through their irrigation systems and supplying the same for irrigation purposes to lands adjacent to the systems of defendants, thereby depriving the plaintiff of the waters of the river, to which it was entitled.

There are other allegations of the petition which are quite lengthy, but the foregoing outlines the material allegations pertinent to this appeal.

The plaintiff sought to have its right to the waters of the river established, and asked that the defendants be enjoined from diverting any of the waters of the river and delivering same to nonriparian lands, and that they be restrained from using any of such water which would result in decreasing the flow of the stream so as to interfere with plaintiff taking water for the proper irrigation of lands in its district, and that the rights of the defendants to the waters of the river be declared to be subordinate to the plaintiff's rights.

The plaintiff voluntarily took a nonsuit as to any and all causes of action set up in its petition "other than the rights to litigate the questions involved in the claim to riparian water rights of said stream." As to this remaining cause of action the court sustained an exception urged by the defendants and dismissed the suit. The sustained exception was to the effect that the petition was "insufficient in law in that it bases its cause of action upon the ownership of riparian lands, which ownership is vested in other parties, and not in the plaintiff, and said petition does not allege that the plaintiff is the owner of said riparian lands, or said riparian rights, and it cannot assert a cause of action herein not owned by it."

The plaintiff appeals from the dismissal of its suit upon the sustaining of the foregoing exception, and the Cedarvale Company appeals from the action of the court in striking out and dismissing a cross-action set up by it against its codefendant, district No. 1. The appeal of the original plaintiff in the cause, district No. 2, will be first considered.

[1] The petition does not allege that the plaintiff has in any wise acquired the riparian water rights of the lands situate in its district riparian to the Pecos river, but its contention, under its first assignment, in effect is that by virtue of the incorporation of the district under the provisions of chapter 87, General Laws of the Thirty-Fifth Legislature (Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, arts. 5107—1 to 5107—117) the plaintiff "became a municipal corporation which took and held in trust, for the use and benefit of the lands within the district, all of the rights of each acre of land within the district, whether such rights were riparian, prescriptive or appropriative," and therefore entitled to maintain this suit. This is the substance of the appellant's contention as set forth in its brief and written argument.

Chapter 87 of the Acts of the Thirty-Fifth Legislature and its subsequent amendments (Acts 36th Leg. [1919], c. 77) authorizes commissioners' courts to establish water improvement districts in their respective counties. Districts so established are authorized to sue and be sued. Among other powers conferred they are authorized to provide for the irrigation of the land included in the districts, to own and construct reservoirs, dams, wells, etc., to acquire the necessary right of way therefor, and they are vested with "full authority and right to acquire water rights and privileges in any way that any individual or corporation may acquire the same," and their boards of directors are authorized to construct all works and improvements necessary for the irrigation of lands in the district and the conveying of water for such purpose and all other purposes authorized by section 59, art. 16, of the Constitution. See sections 1, 24, and 108 of original act (Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, arts. 5107—1, 5107—24, 5107—108) and its amendments.

It will be noted that by the voluntary nonsuit of the plaintiff its cause of action narrowed down to litigation concerning the riparian water rights of the riparian lands within its district. These riparian water rights were appurtenant to the riparian lands and were owned by the various owners of those lands. The law under which the appellant is incorporated specifically authorizes the acquisition by it of water rights and privileges, but, as was said by Justice Gaines in Mud Creek Irrigation Co. v. Vivian, 74 Tex. 174, 11 S. W. 1078, "the law does not confer such rights and privileges themselves." In the opinion of the majority the question presented by the appellant is ruled against it by the principle announced in the case cited. In that case the irrigation company sued as a corporation created under the general law for the purpose of constructing and maintaining irrigation canals. By its suit it sought to enjoin the appellees from maintaining a dam on Mud creek above the point at which the waters of the creek entered its works. A demurrer to the petition was sustained and the suit dismissed. In affirming the case Judge Gaines said:

"The action, judging from the averments in the petition, seems to be based in part upon the theory that the charter of the company by designation of the locality of the canal gave it the exclusive right of the water for irrigating purposes in that locality. This we think a mistake. The franchise granted by the charter was the usual powers and privileges conferred upon such corporate bodies as should be organized under the general law of incorporation, together with the right to acquire by gift, purchase, or condemnation such property as was necessary or proper to carry out the objects of its creation. Act April 23, 1874, § 58.

"The charter conferred the right to acquire water privileges, but it did not confer the privileges themselves. This principle was announced by this court in the case of Tugwell v. Eagle Pass Ferry Company, Austin term, 1888. We there held that the ferry company by becoming a corporation under the general law for the purpose of maintaining a ferry over the Rio Grande at Eagle Pass acquired no right to operate such ferry without procuring a ferry license from the commissioners' court of the county in which the town is situated. The corporation by filing its articles of incorporation in compliance with the law was authorized to establish and maintain a ferry as a corporation at the point designated in its articles, but it did not acquire the ferry privilege itself. So in this case the plaintiff by its incorporation became invested with the power to acquire as a corporation a privilege of using the waters of Mud creek for the purpose of irrigation, but it did not thereby obtain a right to the use of the waters. That right remained to be acquired, which could have been done by either purchase or condemnation, provided the use was a public one.

"It is true that the act of March 10, 1875, provides that 'any * * * canal company shall have the free use of the waters and streams of the state,' but the provisions of that act applied as well to ordinary companies as to corporations. Laws 2d Sess. 14th Leg. 77. Besides we are of the opinion that the provision could be held only to apply to streams upon the public lands of the state, since the Legislature had no power to take away or impair the vested rights of riparian owners without providing for the payment of a just compensation. If the defendants or the owners of the land along the stream in controversy had the right to use the water for the purposes of irrigating their lands, that right remained unaffected by the plaintiff's incorporation or by the legislation of the state passed for the encouragement of irrigation."

The majority recognizes that the law under which the appellant is incorporated is very different from that under which the Mud Creek Irrigation Company was incorporated. The petitions in the two cases are perhaps otherwise distinguishable, but it is the view of the majority that the question presented by this appeal is ruled by the principles announced in the cited case.

The title to the riparian water rights appurtenant to lands abutting on the Pecos river and situate in appellant's district remained vested in the respective owners of these lands. Their title was not affected by appellant's incorporation. The law under which the appellant was incorporated and under which it operates expressly authorizes it to acquire these water rights, but in no wise undertook to confer same. Until it has in some manner connected itself with such riparian rights, it has no right to maintain a suit to enjoin other riparian owners or water users from diverting and using such waters. Such right and user is not an infringement of any right of the plaintiff, but affects only the right of the riparian landowners in its district, and if they do not see fit to complain the plaintiff cannot do so. The action of the court upon the demurrer presents no error.

[2] By another assignment appellant complains of the action of the court in refusing to continue the case so that it might make all of the parties owning or controlling riparian rights or water contractual rights within its district parties to the litigation.

It appears from the motion that it was made after the court had sustained the exception to the petition. The sustaining of this exception eliminated the only remaining right asserted by the plaintiff, and, since there was no offer to amend, there was no case left to continue.

But, aside from this consideration, the riparian landowners in appellant's district and contractual water right owners therein were not necessary parties to this particular suit. They would not have been bound by any judgment which might have been entered, and their rights could not have been affected in any way. The cases cited by appellant in this connection have no application. These owners can bring an independent suit for the protection of their rights whenever they see fit to do so, and the action of the court in refusing the application of this appellant to continue the case so that it might make them parties presents no error. Article 1848, R. S.

The opinion and ruling of the majority is limited to the action of the lower court upon the demurrer and refusal to continue the case. They express no opinion upon any other matter.

[3,4] As to the appeal of the Cedarvale Company, complaining of the action of the court in striking out its cross-action against its codefendant, district No. 1, and dismissing the same, this matter presents no error. The grounds of the motion filed by district No. 2 asking that the cross-action be dismissed were that there was a former suit pending in the district court of Reeves county involving the subject-matter of the cross-action between district No. 1 and the predecessor in interest of the Cedarvale Canal Company, and further that to permit the prosecution of the cross-action would necessitate the continuance of the cause. In the condition of the record it must be assumed that the grounds of this motion were true, and, if so, the action of the court in striking out the cross-action and dismissing the same presents no error.

Affirmed.

WALTHALL, J. (concurring). The only question presented on this appeal to which I care to refer arises on the sustained exception of appellee, Ward County irrigation district No. 1, and is to the effect that appellant bases its cause of action upon the ownership of riparian lands, and which ownership of the riparian lands is shown by the petition to be vested in the owners of the said lands, and not in plaintiff, the petition not alleging that the plaintiff is the owner of the riparian lands or riparian rights, and for that reason plaintiff shows no interest or right in itself to the land or water that it can assert against Ward County irrigation district No. 1. I am not sure that the case of Irrigation Co. v. Vivian, 74 Tex. 174, 11 S. W. 1078, referred to in the majority opinion, has the same application here as applied to the facts of that case.

Appellant is a water improvement district established by the commissioners' court of Ward county under chapter 87, General Laws 35th Leg., and by section 24 of the act authorized to do the things specified, and later herein more specifically stated, and issue bonds. While a corporation, authorized to sue and be sued, it is not a body created for profit, but one organized and established more as a political subdivision of the state, and having for its object the administration of the affairs of the water district in the management and ownership of rights to the use of water in the hands of those most interested in its intelligent and economic use, and to provide a method for acquiring the financial means for constructing a system of works necessary for the appropriation, distribution, and use of water, and incidentally to get from under the necessity of private corporations organized for the purpose of profit, and to enable the water consumers in the district to obtain water for their lands at first cost through the means of their own district organization. It is not my intention to write a discussion on the district policy or means of providing for the economic distribution of water in the arid portion of the state, but simply to make an observation on the water district system as provided, from my viewpoint, on the issue presented. I am under the impression that the case of Mud Creek I. A. & M. Co. v. Vivian et al., referred to in the majority opinion, is not exactly in point and decisive of the one question presented here. There the corporation was organized for profit, and not for administrative purposes. In that case Judge Gaines makes the observation that the action is based in part upon the theory that the charter of the company by designation of the locality of the canal gave it the exclusive right to the water for irrigation purposes in the locality, and held that the franchise gave the company the right to acquire such property as was necessary or proper to carry out the object of its creation, but did not confer the privileges themselves. There being no allegation that the company had acquired any interest in or right to use the waters of Mud creek, the exception was sustained. That opinion was delivered May 28, 1889. At that time we had no state law providing for the use of waters in the streams of the state other than the act of March 10, 1875 (Acts 2d Sess., 14th Leg. c. 63), which provided that any canal company could have the free use of the waters and streams of the state. At that time we had no statutory or other provision declaring the unowned and unappropriated waters of the ordinary flow of every flowing river or natural stream, and the storm, flood, and rain waters of every natural stream within the state, to be the property of the state, and that the right to the use of such waters might be acquired by appropriation for beneficial uses. Now, by edict of legislation, all such waters, and in fact all waters except the ordinary flow and underflow, may be acquired by appropriation, diverted and so used, except the ordinary flow and underflow of such waters as have become vested rights of riparian landowners. If our statutes are to be construed to mean that the riparian right to water and the right to appropriate and divert waters for purposes of irrigation runs only with the title or possessory rights to land, then, of course, to assert such rights it would be necessary for a private corporation organized for profit, and where the fee in lands are owned and taken in the name of a corporate body, to allege ownership or possessory right to land to which the rights would be appurtenant or allege that such rights had been acquired. The petition here does not assert ownership or possessory right to the lands mentioned to be in the corporate water district. Here, while the water district when established represents the combined interests of all of the lands in the district for purposes for which the district was established, it does not own the fee in the lands to be served with water, nor does it own the water rights appurtenant to such lands, nor does the petition allege the lands or water rights have been acquired by purchase or condemnation from the landowners.

The gist of the action being to adjudicate the respective rights of the landowners to the water in the two water districts, the question then presented by the sustained exception is: Does the corporation water district in the suit brought represent the real parties at interest? A brief review of the history and growth of water districts, culminating in several states in what are now corporation water districts, will possibly disclose more pointedly, as I conceive it, the point at issue presented by the exception. It is a general rule that the real parties at interest must be made parties to a suit; otherwise the interest not brought into the suit will not be committed by the results reached.

The contention made by the exception in the case at bar is that the suit cannot be sustained by the corporation water district without joining in the suit the landowners, for the reason that the corporation water district is not the real parties at interest, and that the real or main questions involved cannot, for that reason, be determined in a trial on the merits.

The community irrigating ditch or acequia for the purpose of supplying water to lands is an institution peculiar to the people living in that portion of the Southwest where irrigation is necessary or beneficial in the cultivation of lands for agricultural purposes. In arid regions early settlements were made along the banks of streams where water was reasonably certain to be available for irrigation at needed times. When a settlement was established the people by their joint effort would construct an irrigation canal or ditch sufficiently large to convey water to their several lands for the irrigation of crops. Each individual owned and cultivated a specific tract of land, and from the main canal or ditch laterals were run to these various tracts of land to be watered. The distribution of the water and the repair of the main canal or ditch was in charge of a major-domo or officer elected by the water users under the canal. The official would require the water users to contribute labor toward the repair of the ditch and its maintenance, and also make an equitable distribution of water to the various water users in proportion to the land to be irrigated. There the water official was and has always been held to be but the agent of the individual owners of the lands under the ditch. The water users under the community system had no right to any specific water in the stream, but a right of use of the water for the purpose stated, a species of tenants in common, each having a common interest in the flow of the water by reason of the community of labor furnished. The fact that such water was diverted into a ditch common to all water users, and owned in common with other water users, did not give such other users any interest in, or control over, the right to take water from the stream which each individual water user possessed by reason of his ownership of his land. Such water right was appurtenant to the land he owned. That right was a several right, and the officer of the water community, in diverting the water, acted only as the agent of the water user. The act of the Thirty-Fifth Legislature, as we view it, is the outgrowth or development of the old water community system. It does not disturb or destroy individual ownership of the lands in the water districts into which they are incorporated, nor give to the incorporated water district the power to take away from the individual landowner the land or water owned by him. The act is administrative only, and for convenience gives a legal status to such organizations, in order to facilitate the distribution of the water and the establishment and maintenance of the canals. It does not attempt to interfere with the rights theretofore owned by the individual incorporators. It gives the right to the corporation to acquire water rights, but does no more, except as to the operation of the water system. If my interpretation of the act is sound, and the right, as expressed in the twenty-fourth section of the act, is to own and construct reservoirs, dams, wells, canals, etc., and to acquire the necessary right of way for and buy or construct all reservoirs, dams, etc., and other improvements required for the irrigation of the lands in such district by gift, grant, purchase, or condemnation, and it may acquire the title to any and all lands necessary or incident to the successful operation thereof, including the authority by purchase or condemnation to acquire rights of way for the enlargement, extension, or improvement of existing canals for the purpose of using such canals and ditches jointly with the owners thereof, it necessarily follows, it seems to me, that the individual landowner in the water district is a proper and necessary party in an action for an adjudication of water rights, where such rights are exercised through a corporation water district. The individual rights of the several landowners cannot be adjudicated in an action to which they are not parties. It is also my individual view that the corporations created under the act solely for administrative purposes can sue and be sued only where the gist of the action has reference to matters concerning the administration of the water district affairs, and not where the action involves the individual water rights of the participants under the water district. Acequia Del Llano v. Acequia Del Llano Frio (N. M.) 179 Pac. 235.

For the reasons stated, I concur in the result reached by the majority opinion.

DUNKEL v. AMARILLO BANK & TRUST CO. (No. 1664.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
May 5, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 9, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨662(3)—Qualification to bill of exceptions governs.

Where a bill of exceptions with qualification was accepted and filed as part of the record, the appellant is bound by the qualification where it conflicts with the facts stated in the bill.

2. Abatement and revival ⇨84—Plea in abatement cannot be filed after answer to the merits.

A plea in abatement cannot be filed after answer to the merits; consequently, that part of an answer alleging that the suit was prematurely brought, being a plea in abatement, and not having been filed in the due order of pleading, will be stricken.

3. Executors and administrators ⇨86(1)—On default of one of series of vendor's lien notes administrator may exercise option of declaring all due.

Under Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 3353, as to recovery of assets by executors and administrators, an administrator may, in proceeding to collect a series of vendor's lien notes, exercise an option to declare the entire series due on default in payment of any one of them or interest.

4. Appeal and error ⇨680(1) — Matter not shown to have been acted upon by court cannot be reviewed.

Where the record did not show that a general demurrer was ever submitted to the court or acted upon an assignment of error complaining of the sustaining of the demurrer cannot be reviewed.

5. Executors and administrators ⇨87—Administrator held not authorized to make agreement as to priority of liens.

Under Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 3354 and 3355, an administrator does not have the authority, without the consent of the probate court, to agree that maker of vendor's lien notes may procure a loan on the land and pay off part thereof, postponing the security for the remaining notes as a second lien.

6. Bills and notes ⇨483—Answer held insufficient to state defense.

In an action on notes and to foreclose vendor's lien securing the same, the answer which set up an agreement by the administrator of the holder of the notes, that the maker should procure a loan and pay off part of the series and that the rest should be postponed to a second lien, held insufficient to state a defense, because not alleging facts sufficient to establish a binding agreement.

7. Bills and notes ⇨473 — Exception held properly sustained to answer, notwithstanding assertion it set up estoppel.

In an action on notes where it was sought to foreclose a vendor's lien securing the same, the sustaining of exceptions to the answer was warranted despite the contention that an estoppel was set up in the averments, that intestate and his administrators had, at various times, agreed to extend the notes, etc., there being no allegation of fraud, and the assignment merely calling into review the action of the court in striking out that portion of the pleading which was really a plea in abatement.

8. Executors and administrators ⇨86(4) — Agreement by administrator to extend time unauthorized.

Under Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 3353, requiring administrator to use ordinary diligence to collect every claim due the estate, an administrator is without authority to agree that, on payment of a part of a series of vendor's lien notes, the remainder should be made a second lien subject to the loan procured to pay off the first of the series, and so a deposition of administrator tending to show such an agreement was properly excluded in an action on notes.

9. Bills and notes ⇨516 — Evidence insufficient to show any agreement for extending series of vendor's lien notes.

In an action on notes and to foreclose vendor's lien securing the same, evidence held insufficient to establish an agreement that, on payment of a portion of the notes, the remainder should be extended as a second lien, etc., there being nothing to show that defendant accepted any proposals as to such arrangement.

10. Bills and notes ⇨489(1)—Under pleadings proof not needed as to attorney's fees.

In action on notes, held that, on the pleadings, judgment for attorney's fees was not erroneous on the ground that there was no showing when the notes were placed in the hands of attorneys, and no proof that plaintiff had promised to pay the attorneys, or that the attorney's fees were reasonable.

11. Bills and notes ⇨129(2)—Suit sufficient notice of election to declare entire series of vendor's lien notes due.

Where a series of notes, secured by vendor's lien, provided that, on default in payment of one, the holder might declare all due, suit by an administrator, into whose hands the notes came, after default in the payment of the first, is sufficient notice of election to declare the whole series due.

12. Executors and administrators ⇨519(1)—Texas administrator alone has authority to make contracts as to disposition of property in that state.

Notwithstanding interest of another in an estate, or fact that he was administrator of that part of the estate located elsewhere, the Texas administrator is the only person within the state of Texas who can make contracts concerning property of the intestate within that jurisdiction.

Appeal from District Court, Carson County; W. R. Ewing, Judge.

Action by the Amarillo Bank & Trust Company against C. A. Duenkel. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

I. E. Duncan, of Pampa, and Hoover & Willis, of Canadian, for appellant.

Turner & Dooley, of Amarillo, for appellee.

HALL, J. Joseph Fisher, now deceased, formerly owned a section of land in Carson county, and sold it to one F. L. Stokes, and took as part payment eight vendor's lien notes, the first in the sum of $2,000, the other seven in the sum of $1,571.42 each, payable two, three, four, five, six, seven, and eight years after date, respectively, each bearing interest at 8 per cent. per annum, and providing for 10 per cent. attorney's fees, if placed in the hands of an attorney for collection or if collected by suit. Thereafter, the appellant, Duenkel, purchased said land from Stokes and assumed the payment of said notes. Appellee sued to recover the amount due upon the notes and to foreclose the vendor's lien, alleging that all of the notes were declared due by virtue of the provision in each of them that failure to pay any note or interest should, at the election of the holder, mature all of them, and that the plaintiff had so elected to declare all of them due. Plaintiff sued as administrator of the estate of Joseph Fisher, deceased. At the return term of the court the appellant answered by general demurrer and general denial. The record fails to show that the demurrer was ever passed upon by the court.

At the second term the appellant filed his plea in abatement, upon the ground that the suit was prematurely brought, alleging that he had an agreement with Joseph Fisher in his lifetime to extend the first note for $2,000 as to time of payment until November 27, 1918, and that the plaintiff had agreed with appellant that he might take a loan upon the said section of land of $9,000, and apply the same to the payment of the notes in the order of their maturity, and for the balance of the debt a second lien should attach, inferior to the loan company's lien for the $9,000; that appellant had procured the loan, and upon his offering to perform the said agreement that Messrs. Turner & Dooley had obtained possession of the notes, claiming to have them for collection, and demanded the 10 per cent. attorney's fees upon them; that by reason of the agreement for the loan, and part payment and subrogation of the lien, that the plaintiff had waived its right to declare any or all of the notes due, or to place them in the hands of an attorney for collection, and was estopped from collecting any of said notes except the ones due by their terms.

Defendant also pleaded in greater detail the agreement to allow him to procure the loan upon the land of $9,000, and apply it in partial payment of the series of notes, and postpone the balance of the notes to a second lien upon the land. It was alleged that the agreement was first made by Joseph Fisher to extend the time of payment on the first note for one year, in consideration of the additional amount of interest; that the agreement for the loan was first made with Glen M. Fisher, who was the administrator of the estate of his father, Joseph Fisher, in the state of Kansas, and that the agreement was he should secure the loan of $9,000 and apply it as stated above; that this agreement was later confirmed and approved by a letter received from Messrs. Turner & Dooley, attorneys for plaintiff; however, that said attorneys, at the same time demanded their attorney's fees upon all of the notes; that appellant thereupon tendered to plaintiff all of the principal and interest that was then due upon said notes, which the plaintiff refused to accept, and that the administrator, Glen M. Fisher, notified defendant not to pay Turner & Dooley any attorney's fees, as he or his estate was paying them for their services. It is further alleged that the agreement of the parties constituted a waiver of the right to place the notes in the hands of an attorney and claim attorney's fees; also a waiver of the right to declare all of the notes due, defendant having relied upon their previous agreement and representations, and having complied with them by procuring the loan, and that had the plaintiff performed the agreement defendant could and would have paid off the notes that were due. The prayer was that the suit abate and that he recover his costs, or in the alternative that plaintiff should recover only the amount of the notes actually due, without attorney's fees, and be denied the recovery of the amount of the notes not yet due.

[1] Upon the filing of the plea in abatement appellee moved to strike it from the record because it was not filed at the first term of the court, and, having been filed after a general demurrer and general denial, was not in due order of pleading. The court sustained the motion, striking the plea in abatement from the record. The bill of exception to this action of the court was qualified by the trial judge in the following language:

"The foregoing bill of exception, No. 1, prepared and tendered by C. A. Duenkel, defendant, has been examined by me and is approved with the following qualification: Defendant offered no proof, either by his own testimony or by that of his counsel, or any one else, that at the February term of said court the parties to this cause had verbally agreed in open court that at said February term the defendant need not file his actual pleadings in the case in full but might only file a general demurrer and general denial, and that he could file same without prejudice to his rights to file any future pleadings he saw fit, whether in due order of pleading or not. All that was done on said question was an unsworn statement by defendant's counsel, I. E. Duncan, to the effect that at the February term of court he understood that counsel for plaintiff agreed with him that he might file his dilatory plea at the next term of this court. This statement was denied by counsel for plaintiff, but no sworn testimony was offered by either party. No such agreement as claimed by defendant was made in open court, or in the presence and hearing of the court. The court did not refuse to permit defendant to offer any testimony, or to hear testimony concerning such alleged agreement, because none was offered. The statement in the bill that plaintiff offered proof as to the matters contained in said plea in abatement is incorrect. Neither party offered any proof thereon, and, consequently, the court did not refuse to hear any such evidence."

The bill, with the qualification, was accepted and filed as part of the record, and appellant is bound by the qualification where it conflicts with the facts stated in the bill.

[2] The court also sustained the appellee's first, second, and third special exception to the defendant's answer, which are in substance: (1) That the answer is insufficient because it seeks to set up a pretended agreement between the parties for the compromise and extension of the notes, which constitutes a material change in the security, in this: Its effect would have been to postpone part of the debt to the loan of $9,000 mentioned in the pleading, and would have made said $9,000 a first lien on all of the land; that no such agreement could have been made except under the order of the probate court of Potter county, where the administration is pending, and it is not alleged that any such order had been procured; (2) that the matters set up constitute a plea in abatement and are not filed in the due order of pleading; (3) that part of the answer which alleges "it would be harsh and inequitable to sell defendant's land under the present social unrest, same having suppressed the sale of property and the land will not satisfy the debt at forced sale," is wholly insufficient. That part of the answer alleging that the suit is prematurely brought is a plea in abatement, and, not having been filed in due order of pleading, the court did not err in striking it from the docket, since it was filed after an answer to the merits. Drake v. Brander, 8 Tex. 176; Graham v. McCarty, 69 Tex. 324, 7 S. W. 342; Keator v. Whitaker, 147 S. W. 608.

[3] By the second assignment it is insisted that the administrator could not elect to declare the entire series of notes due upon failure to pay any one of them or the interest, as therein provided. No decisions are cited to sustain this proposition. We think the effect of V. S. C. S. art. 3353, is to authorize the administrator, in the use of proper diligence, to declare the notes due and proceed to collect them.

[4] The third assignment is that the court erred in sustaining plaintiff's general demurrer to the defendant's answer. The record does not show that the general demurrer was ever submitted to the court or acted upon in any way.

The fourth and fifth assignments being based upon the same supposed state of facts are overruled.

[5, 6] It is insisted under the sixth assignment of error that an administrator has the authority to agree that the maker of notes due the estate may procure a loan to pay off part of the notes, postponing the security for the remaining notes as a second lien, and this without an order of the probate court. We do not so understand the law. The answer does not show that any such arrangement had been approved or authorized by the probate court of Potter county. V. S. C. S. arts. 3354 and 3355, provide that whenever an administrator may deem it to the interest of the estate to take any claims or property for the use and benefit of the estate in payment of any debt due the estate, or to compound bad or doubtful debts or to make promises or settlements in relation to claims in dispute or litigation, it shall be his duty to present an application in writing to the county court at a regular term thereof, representing the facts, and if the court, upon the hearing of such application, shall be satisfied that it will be for the interest of the estate to grant the same, an order to that effect shall be entered upon the minutes, setting forth fully the authority granted, and the administrator is further authorized on receipt of the amount due on a mortgage to release such mortgage. Nothing appears in the record to indicate that it would have been to the benefit of the estate for the administrator to waive the vendor's lien on the land and permit the appellant to borrow $9,000, secured by a first lien upon the property, to credit said sum upon the debt and hold the remaining notes, secured by a second lien. From the record we entertain serious doubt whether a probate judge could have been convinced that such a course was to the best interest of the estate. From what is shown we think it would have been detrimental. In any event, since the answer failed to show the required order of the probate court, approving such an agreement, that part of the answer setting it up was subject to the exception. Smith et al. v. Pate et al., 43 S. W. 312; Smith v. Dibrell, 31 Tex. 239, 98 Am. Dec. 526; Trammell v. Swan, 25 Tex. 475; Browne v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 98 Tex. 55, 80 S. W. 596. These and other authorities settle the question that administrators and guardians may act in material matters, such as the compromise and settlement of claims under agreements of the nature alleged by appellant, only under express authority obtained from the probate court, and that the effect of the statute is to change the rule of the common law in this particular. Appellee's contention is that the defense urged by the defendant is insufficient because the answer does not allege a binding agreement for an extension of time or for changing the security and creating a second lien in favor of the estate for part of the indebtedness. We think this contention is sound. Ward v. San Antonio Insurance Co., 164 S. W. 1048; Astin v. Mosteller, 152 S. W. 495.

[7] It is insisted under the seventh assignment that the court erred in sustaining the special exception to the answer, because by the plea that the intestate and his two administrators together had at different times agreed to the extension of the first note for more than a year, and had agreed to accept payment by means of a loan on the land, etc., appellee was estopped from declaring all of the notes due and from placing them in the hands of attorneys. This assignment merely calls into review the action of the court in striking out the plea in abatement. There is no allegation of fraud on the part of the administrator, and because of the lack of such an allegation the authorities cited by appellant have no application. The evidence does not sustain appellant's contention that the Texas administrator, or its attorneys, ever made an agreement for the extension of time and postponement of the lien in consideration of the payment of $9,000. The court's action in sustaining the third special exception is unquestionably correct.

[8] Appellant insists, under the ninth assignment, that the court erred in excluding the deposition of Glen M. Fisher, to the effect that he and the attorney for the estate in Kansas had agreed, more than a year after the first note was due, to allow defendant to procure a loan of $9,000, and pay that amount on the notes in the order of their maturity and give a second mortgage to secure the other notes. We think any agreement on the part of the administrator to the effect alleged would be a violation of the provisions of article 3353, V. S. C. S., requiring the administrator to use ordinary diligence to collect every claim due the estate, and rendering the administrator and his bondsmen liable in the event of a failure to use such diligence.

[9] The tenth, eleventh, and twelfth assignments are based upon similar rulings. The allegation is that Glen M. Fisher as administrator agreed with defendant, as above set out, but the evidence tendered to sustain the allegation would not have shown any agreement between appellant and the defendant to that effect. The principal evidence relied upon is the letter from appellee's attorneys, Turner & Dooley, to appellant, in which they say:

"We have not heard from you in reply to our last letter and we desire to close this matter up in some way. We have a letter from our clients, authorizing us to close up this deal by way of paying $9,000 cash and giving a second mortgage to secure the four notes at $1,571.42 each, providing that you pay the interest due to date and our fee. If this cannot be done we shall have to institute foreclosure proceedings."

Clearly, this letter cannot be construed as an agreement for the extension, even though it had been shown that the probate court of Potter county had approved the proceeding. It was not shown that Duenkel ever replied to this letter from Turner & Dooley, or notified them that he was ready to comply with the requirements by paying the $9,000 plus the interest and attorney's fees. None of the evidence sought to have been admitted would have in any degree benefited appellant. Appellant made no tender of the $9,000, or any amount, in an effort to make good his offer to carry out his alleged agreement. If the evidence had been admitted the effect would have been to sustain the plea in abatement, and the court could not, in the absence of a tender, have granted appellant any relief.

[10] Under the thirteenth assignment it is insisted that the court erred in rendering judgment for the attorney's fees, because there was no showing when the notes were placed in the hands of attorneys, and no proof that plaintiff had promised to pay the attorneys, or that the attorney's fees were reasonable. These questions have been settled by the decisions in this state contrary to appellant's contention. First National Bank of Eagle Lake v. Robinson, 104 Tex. 167, 135 S. W. 372; Stewart v. Thomas, 179 S. W. 886; Coleman v. Garvin, 158 S. W. 185; Johnston v. Branch Banking Co., 143 S. W. 193; Kerr v. Morrison, 25 S. W. 1011. These authorities establish the propositions: That it is not necessary for the holder of a note to prove when the notes were placed in the hands of an attorney; that the plaintiff had promised to pay the attorneys; that the attorney's fees were reasonable; for an allegation that the notes were placed in the hands of attorneys would be taken as true, and it is not necessary to offer proof thereon when the petition so alleges.

[11] The institution of the suit within a reasonable time after default in the payment of the first note is sufficient notice of the election by the administrator to sue; no further notice to the appellant was necessary. Machine Works v. Reigor, 64 Tex. 89; Chase v. Bank, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 595, 20 S. W. 1027; Bonnell v. Prince, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 399, 32 S. W. 855.

[12] The only remaining observation necessary to be made in disposing of the issues presented here is that Glen M. Fisher a resident of Kansas, could not, by agreement made with appellant, bind the administrator of the estate pending in the courts of Texas. An administrator in this state has the exclusive right to possession of the property within the jurisdiction of the court, and is the only person who can make any contracts concerning the property.

We find no reversible error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

ELLERD v. SODEBERG. (No. 1688.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
May 19, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 23, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨499(3)—Assignment to rejection of testimony not considered where exceptions do not show objections, etc.

Assignments of error to the rejection of testimony are not entitled to consideration where the bills of exceptions do not show the objections made to the evidence nor the ground on which they were sustained.

2. Contracts ⇨173—Independent promissory representations no defense unless fraudulently made.

Persons who employed an architect to make plans were liable for his services despite non-performance of his statements as to financing the building, which were independent promissory representations, unless fraudulently made without intent to perform.

3. Evidence ⇨441(7)—Parol evidence contradicting writing inadmissible.

Where a contract to compensate an architect was in writing, parol evidence contradicting, varying, or modifying its terms by showing an oral agreement of the architect to finance the building was inadmissible.

Appeal from District Court, Hale County;
R. C. Joiner, Judge.

Suit by Frederick Sodeberg against Reuben M. Ellerd. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Lewis, of Plainview, and Bryan Stone & Wade, of Ft. Worth, for appellant.
Williams & Martin, of Plainview, for appellee.

BOYCE, J. Appellee, Sodeberg, brought this suit against R. M. Ellerd and J. J. Ellerd on a written contract dated November 21, 1916, and copied later. It was alleged that said contract was a settlement contract; that plaintiff had theretofore rendered services for the defendants as an architect in the drawing of plans for a hotel building which defendants proposed to erect in the city of Plainview; that the plaintiff was demanding in payment for his services so rendered a sum largely in excess of the amount stated in said settlement contract; that on said 21st day of November, 1916, the parties agreed upon a settlement of plaintiff's claim and evidenced their agreement by a writing signed by the said R. M. Ellerd and J. J. Ellerd reading as follows:

"In the event of our failure to finance the construction of hotel building contemplated for us in the city of Plainview, Tex., and our abandonment of the proposition, we agree to pay to F. Sodeberg $1,500 for balance due for architectural services to date. This November 21, 1916.

"[Signed] Reuben M. Ellerd.

"We do hereby agree that Mr. Sodeberg is, from and after this date, fully released from all further obligations or contractual obligations in connection with this matter.

"[Signed] Reuben M. Ellerd.
"John J. Ellerd."

Plaintiff further alleged that the defendants had failed to finance the construction of said building and had abandoned the project, and that he thereupon became entitled to the payment of the said sum of $1,500 mentioned in said contract.

The appellant Ellerd answered that plaintiff had a good cause of action as set forth in the petition, except so far as it might be defeated in whole or in part by the facts of the answer constituting a good defense, so as to secure the opening and close within the provisions of rule 81 for the district and county court. We can convey a better understanding of the case by copying that part of the answer material to the decision of the assignments presented on this appeal than we could by attempting to describe said allegations in general terms. That part of said answer is as follows:

"Now comes the defendant, R. M. Ellerd, and in answer to plaintiff's petition says that he did execute the agreement sued upon, but at said time and before said time the plaintiff had made certain material statements which were believed by the said Ellerd and relied upon by him. The representations were as follows: (a) 'Plaintiff stated that he could and would finance the deal with cheap Oakland money.' That by reason of the above representations defendant began to negotiate with plaintiff, and, had it not been for said representations, defendant would not have considered the claims of plaintiff, but would have considered architects just as good near at home who could have been secured at a less price. That plaintiff has failed to finance said erection of building, thereby making all of the alleged services rendered by plaintiff of no value to this defendant. That, had the plaintiff not made said representations, this defendant would not have considered him as an architect in this matter, and, if plaintiff has been damaged in any way, it is because of his making representations and agreements that he did not carry out as he agreed. This defendant says that he is now willing, ready, and able to carry out his part of the contract, and, if plaintiff will do as he agreed to do, finance this deal with cheap Oakland money, then he will accept the same and carry out his part of the contract."

The answer is followed by a "cross-action" which reads as follows:

"Defendant says that he has paid the plaintiff the sum of $650, which he is not entitled for the reason that the consideration in the plans for the erection of this proposed building has wholly failed as hereinbefore set out; wherefore he prays judgment for said $650."

On the trial of the case the defendant offered evidence as to oral representations or promises of the plaintiff to "finance the construction of the building with cheap Oakland money" and to show that at and prior to the execution of the contract of settlement the defendant had paid the plaintiff $650 on the contract of employment. The testimony offered, as shown by the bills of exception was as to oral promises or representations made, and was about as general and indefinite as the allegations of the answer. The court sustained the objections to this testimony and gave the jury a peremptory instruction to find for the plaintiff.

[1-3] All of the assignments are based on the ruling of the court in rejecting the testimony referred to. The assignments are not entitled to consideration for the reason that the bills of exception do not show the objections made to the evidence, nor the ground on which they were sustained. Progressive Lumber Co. v. Marshall & E. T. Ry. Co., 106 Tex. 12, 155 S. W. 177; Alexander v. Fletcher, 177 S. W. 514; Hall v. Ray, 179 S. W. 1137. However, we have considered the assignments, and are of the opinion that they present no error. All of the evidence offered was on the theory that the representations or agreements on the part of the plaintiff to procure the money to be loaned to the defendants with which to construct said building constituted the consideration for the contract of employment, and that noncompliance therewith amounted to a failure of consideration for the contract which would defeat recovery of anything thereon, and would entitle defendant to recover the amount already paid. We think this position is untenable, whatever construction might be placed on the indefinite allegations of the answer. If the statements of the defendant as to financing the building be regarded as independent promissory representations, the answer setting them up constitutes no defense, for the reason that there is no allegation that they were fraudulently made; that is, made without intention of performing them. If the allegations be considered sufficient to allege an agreement as a part of the contract of employment that the plaintiff would finance said project, the answer and evidence offered thereunder make no defense to the suit, because the contract in question expressly releases the plaintiff from all such obligations. Even if it was the purpose of the defendant to allege and prove an agreement made at the same time and as a part of the contract of November 21, 1916 (and we hardly think that this construction can be placed either on the pleading or evidence offered thereunder), the evidence would nevertheless have been objectionable because such agreement is inconsistent with the terms of the writing, and there are no allegations that would authorize the admission of parol evidence to contradict, vary, or modify the terms of the writing. This agreement of November 21, 1916, appears to evidence an agreement of accord or settlement between the parties. Whatever may have been the previous rights and obligations of the respective parties, they appear to have been merged into and settled by this agreement, and there is no allegation that would have justified the court in setting it aside.

The judgment of the trial court will be affirmed.

JACKSON et al. v. WALLACE et al.
(No. 8375.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, Dallas.
May 8, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 12, 1920.)

Death — Evidence held to require submission of issue of absentee's death.

Proof that one against whom a judgment had been entered was seen alive within less than seven years of the date of the trial held to require submission to the jury of the issue as to whether he was dead when the suit was filed.

Appeal from District Court, Navarro County; H. B. Daviss, Judge.

Suit by J. E. Wallace and others against J. T. Jackson and others, for an injunction. Decree for petitioners, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

W. W. Ballew, of Corsicana, for appellants.

Jack & Jack and Callicutt & Johnson, all of Corsicana, for appellees.

RAINEY, C. J. The statement of the case, taken from the appellants' brief, is correct, and is as follows:

"On June 5, 1911, appellees filed their petition in the district court of Navarro county, Tex., for an injunction against J. T. Jackson, and M. S. Clayton, sheriff of Navarro county, Tex., to enjoin the sale of 118 acres of land on John Beauchamp survey, in Navarro county, Tex., which land had been advertised for sale on the first Tuesday in June, 1911, by virtue of an order of sale issued upon a judgment rendered in the district court of Navarro county, Tex., in cause No. 7700, styled J. T. Jackson v. J. C. Wallace, rendered on the 24th day of March, 1911. The plaintiffs, appellees herein, alleged they were the owners of said land, and the heirs of J. C. Wallace, who they alleged was dead when said suit was filed and judgment rendered; and they alleged numerous other alleged defects in said judgment. Injunction was issued upon said petition. Defendant J. T. Jackson filed his original answer in due time, and amended answer on October 25, 1913.

"Gibson & Callaway, a firm composed of E. J. Gibson and L. R. Callaway, intervened in said cause, and alleged they were interested in the subject-matter of said suit, claiming to own an undivided one-third interest in said land. First and second amended pleas of intervention were filed, and the trial was had upon second amended plea of intervention. Plaintiffs filed numerous supplemental petitions, of date January 24, 1919, March 13, 1919, and answer to intervention January 27, 1919. Defendant filed supplemental answer to all of the various supplemental petitions of plaintiffs, consisting in the main of exceptions upon points stated therein. Interveners Gibson & Callaway filed exceptions to answer of plaintiffs and supplemental plea.

"The case went to trial May 15, 1919; and during the trial S. H. Jack, W. H. Jack, J. S. Callicutt, and L. A. Johnson were allowed to intervene, claiming interest under original plaintiffs, and W. W. Ballew intervened, as assignee of Gibson & Callaway.

"The court gave peremptory instruction for plaintiffs and intervening plaintiffs for all of lot 19, containing 14 acres, and an undivided two-thirds interest in lot 9, 20 acres; lot 12, 40 acres; lot 14, 11 acres; lot 15, 23.5 acres; lot 17, 10½ acres—and for W. W. Ballew, intervenor, for undivided one-third interest in lots 9, 12, 14, 15, and 17, without rents, and against J. T. Jackson and M. S. Clayton for all of the land. The jury returned verdict under instructions of the court as directed. Defendant Jackson and intervenor W. W. Ballew excepted to the charge of the court, and requested special charges, which exceptions and special charges were refused. Motions for new trial were filed by defendant Jackson and intervenor W. W. Ballew, and overruled June 28, 1919. Exceptions duly taken, notice of appeal given, and appeal perfected to Court of Civil Appeals.

"The court gave a peremptory charge for appellees, and refused appellants' special charge as follows: 'You are instructed that an absentee is presumed to be alive until his death is proved, and there has been no legal evidence offered by plaintiffs that J. C. Wallace was dead at the time the suit of J. T. Jackson v. J. C. Wallace was filed in February, 1910, or at date of judgment, March 24, 1911, and you are therefore instructed to return a verdict in favor of J. T. Jackson.'

Plaintiffs sued as heirs of J. C. Wallace and claimed by reason thereof to be the owners of the land. Their petition shows that there was no necessity for an administration, but prayed for an injunction, alleging the death of J. C. Wallace, proof of which was essential for a recovery under the evidence, which was totally lacking. There was testimony tending to show that Wallace was alive within less than seven years of the date of trial, and which raised an issue not authorizing the court to assume that death was presumed, and warranted a charge to that effect. There was evidence showing that J. C. Wallace was seen alive, which required the court to submit that issue to the jury, and which precluded the court from giving the jury a peremptory instruction to find for appellees.

Besides alleging that J. C. Wallace was dead at the time of the rendition, the petition alleged, in substance, that the judgment had become extinct when the court reviewed it. The evidence does not show definitely whether or not the judgment had become extinct, which, if it had, can be shown upon another trial and can be taken advantage of. Boyd v. Ghent, 95 Tex. 46, 64 S. W. 929.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

ANDERSON BROS. v. PARKER CONST.
CO. (No. 554.)(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont.
June 1, 1920.)1. Arbitration and award ¶64—Award will be avoided for bias or intimidation.

While arbitrations are favored in law, and every reasonable intendment will be indulged in to support them, a showing of fraud, bias, or intimidation will avoid an award.

2. Arbitration and award ¶85(4)—Fairness and intimidation held issues for jury.

In a building contractor's action for a balance alleged to be due on an award of arbitration, which defendants sought to avoid on the ground of unfairness of one of the arbitrators and intimidation towards the board on the part of the plaintiff, evidence held sufficient to require the court to submit the issues of fairness and intimidation to the jury.

Appeal from District Court, Liberty County; D. F. Singleton, Judge.

Action by the Parker Construction Company against Anderson Bros. Judgment for plaintiff on an instructed verdict, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

E. B. Pickett, Jr., and C. H. Cain, both of Liberty, for appellants.

Campbell, Myer, Myer & Freeman and Stevens & Stevens, all of Houston, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This suit was instituted by appellee against the appellants to recover the balance due on a house-building contract. Appellee specially pleaded that the difference between it and appellants, by agreement of all parties, had been duly arbitrated, and under the award of the arbitrators a balance was due them of $2,600.35. Appellants answered by general denial, and by special plea to the effect that the building was not according to contract, and claimed damages in the sum of about $5,000. They also admitted in their plea that an effort had been made to arbitrate the difference between them and appellees; that two of the arbitrators had rendered an award, but they sought to avoid the award on the ground that it was tainted with fraud, unfairness, partiality, intimidation, and other improper influences. On the conclusion of the testimony, the trial court instructed a verdict for the appellees. The only proposition submitted by appellants challenges the correctness of this ruling.

Appellants and appellee sought to adjust their differences, growing out of the construction of a brick storehouse in the town of Cleveland, by arbitration. Appellants selected one arbitrator, a Mr. Isaacks, the appel-lees selected another arbitrator, a Mr. Morin, and these two selected a third, T. C. Edminster. The arbitrators held their first meeting in Cleveland. At this time appellant Anderson and his attorney appeared before them. Morin requested the attorney to withdraw from the room, stating that they did not want any attorney in the case. Edminster and Isaacks examined the roof of the building, about which complaint was made; but Morin refused to do so, stating he would take the word of the other arbitrators as to the condition of the roof. This meeting did not last long. They adjourned and called a second meeting at Houston. According to the testimony of appellants, their attorney went to Houston on the day of this meeting, and had an express agreement with counsel for appellee that no attorney would appear before the arbitrators. After this agreement, counsel for appellants returned to his home in Liberty. When the arbitrators came together for this meeting, appellant Anderson, a Mr. Halcomb, agent for the appellee, and the attorney for the appellee, appeared before the board. Again, according to appellants' testimony, there was an agreement between appellants and appellee that they should leave the board and not return until a decision had been reached. Appellant Anderson did leave, and did not return. Mr. Isaacks, one of the arbitrators, testified that, a short time after Anderson left the room, Halcomb and his attorney returned to the room and remained until the board adjourned. The board met in a balcony in a storeroom. Isaacks stated that Halcomb and his attorney were from 20 to 100 feet from them during their deliberations; that after deliberating until 11 or 12 o'clock—that is, near midnight—the board decided it was not possible to come to an agreement, and adjourned. Down in the front part of the store, Halcomb came to them and asked them if they had reached an agreement. When he found that no agreement had been reached, he requested them to make another effort, stating that the matter had been unadjusted a long time; that, if he was not going to get more than $1,000 out of the deal, he wanted to know it; that he wanted the matter closed up, and whatever the board did would be entirely satisfactory to him; that after this assurance and on this request from Halcomb, the board went back to the balcony, and after a reasonable deliberation reached an adjustment on every item in the dispute between the parties; that in the adjustment they allowed about $960 for the roof on the building; that appellants had a claim based on a clause in the contract allowing them $10 a day for delay in construction; that he agreed with the other arbitrators to waive this $10 a day item on condition that they would agree with him on the amount to be allowed for the roof; that Edminster, in compromising the two items—that is, the roof item and the damages for delay—agreed to his proposition; that Morin said nothing either way; that after the adjustment was reached they began dictating it to a stenographer, and, when the roof item was reached, Halcomb and his attorney violently protested against the allowance, saying that it was unjust, inequitable, unfair, and illegal; that Halcomb and his attorney came up to the balcony where the arbitrators were, and entered into quite a lengthy discussion of the matter, objecting most vigorously to what had been done; that he (Isaacks) protested against their interfering with the deliberations of the board, stating that they ought to get down and out; that Mr. Anderson was not there, and had no attorney there, and that their presence was unfair; that the other two arbitrators refused to sustain him in his protests as to the presence of Halcomb and his attorney, but permitted them to take part in their deliberations, and that over his protest the meeting again adjourned; that he stated to them that he didn't know that he would have anything further to do with the board; that the matter had been fairly and honestly adjusted, and that there was no excuse for adjourning the board at that time.

Edminster testified:

"The truth of the matter is that, if Mr. Myer [the attorney] and Mr. Halcomb had not interrupted our proceedings and objected to our decision, that decision that we had already made would have been signed by all three of the arbitrators, and would have been our final decision."

The testimony further shows that most of the decision had been reduced to writing when Halcomb and his attorney went to the balcony.

Appellee's version of the facts is quite different from the statement made by Isaacks, and possibly under their statement no error is shown; but it was the duty of the jury, and not of the court, to pass on the facts and weigh the testimony.

[1, 2] We recognize that "arbitrations are favored in law, and every reasonable intentment will be indulged in to support them." Hill v. Walker, 140 S. W. 1159. But a showing of fraud, mistake, bias, undue influence, or intimidation will avoid an award made by them. In this case the award was made by two of the arbitrators, Morin and Edminster. Morin was selected by the appellee. It is undisputed in the record that, the only time an attorney for the appellant appeared before them as such arbitrators, Morin refused to let him remain in the room, and requested that he withdraw. It is also undisputed that when the attorney for the appellee appeared before him (according to the testimony of appellants, uninvited) he refused to request the withdrawal of such attorney, but listened to him and followed his suggestions as to the law by which they were to be governed. This conduct on the part of Morin was sufficient to raise an issue of fact against his fairness as an arbitrator. Again, the testimony of appellants clearly shows improper conduct on the part of Halcomb and his attorney after the award had been reached, of such a nature as to raise an issue of intimidation on their part towards the board. When the award was finally made, instead of allowing the $960, as was agreed to by all three of them, they allowed only $150, and altogether refused Anderson's claim for damages based on the clause of the contract allowing $10 per day for delay.

The agreement of the arbitrators, adjusting the differences between the parties, according to appellants' testimony, was not only fair and equitable, but was also a lawful agreement, and one which the courts would have enforced. Halcomb and his attorney, in their protest before the board against the fairness of the award, failed to consider the fact that the award also included an adjustment of the damages growing out of delay in constructing the building. Notwithstanding by their presence Halcomb and his attorney had violated the agreement shown by appellants' testimony, if they had done nothing more than enter a formal protest to the award, or presented an argument on request of the board, we would not be inclined to hold that their conduct raised an issue of fact against the award. But Isaacks testified that they intruded themselves before the board; that they refused to go down when requested; that they precipitated a very bitter discussion, and challenged the award as being unfair, unjust, and inequitable, and one which the courts would not enforce. So violent was their protest that the meeting broke up in disorder. Two of the arbitrators refused to conclude the agreement, and in their final award rendered a decision vastly different from the one which had been honestly and fairly reached. The final award was to the prejudice of appellants in the sum of about $800. Edminster testified that they heard no new evidence between the second and third meetings. What, then, had entered into the case, causing this radical deduction in the sum to be allowed appellants? Appellants say it was fraud, bias, prejudice, and intimidation. In our judgment, the facts of this case raise this issue, and error was committed in instructing a verdict for appellees.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

HINES v. FLINN. (No. 1119.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. El Paso.
May 20, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 17, 1920.)

1. Master and servant ⇨103(2)—Duty to keep tool in condition defined.

If there was nothing to indicate to injured section foreman that the temper of a maul has been changed since it was furnished him, or that he knew the dangerous condition in which it was because not properly tempered, he was not under duty to send it to the blacksmith shop to be properly tempered, as required by the railroad's rules.

2. Master and servant ⇨103(2)—Duty to furnish safe tool nondelegable.

The duty of furnishing a safe and suitable maul or sledge for use in his work by its section foreman is a nondelegable duty of a railroad, of which it cannot relieve itself by charging the foreman with its performance.

3. Master and servant ⇨286(7)—Negligence in furnishing hammer question of fact.

It cannot be said as a matter of law, without reference to the use made of it, that because a hammer or maul is a simple appliance a master, when furnishing it to his servant, does not owe to him the duty to use ordinary care to see it is reasonably suitable and safe to use in the work to be done.

4. Master and servant ⇨286(7)—Negligence in furnishing defective hammer held for jury.

In an action for injuries to a railroad section foreman, struck in the eye by a sliver from a maul or hammer, question of negligence in furnishing such hammer held for jury.

5. Master and servant ⇨219(3)—Assumption of risk of injury from defective hammer defined.

If a railroad was negligent in furnishing to its section foreman and his men an untempered hammer, unsafe in the particular work, a defect which, in the exercise of ordinary care, would not have come to the foreman's knowledge, the road cannot escape liability on any theory the foreman assumed the risk.

6. Master and servant ⇨288(12)—Assumption of risk jury question.

In an action for injuries to a railroad section foreman, when a maul or hammer slivered and the piece struck his eye, question of assumed risk held for jury.

Appeal from District Court, El Paso County; Ballard Coldwell, Judge.

Suit by E. L. Flinn against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and the El Paso & Southwestern Railway Company of Arizona. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant Director General, such defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. M. Peticolas and Del W. Harrington, both of El Paso, for appellant.

Hudspeth, Wallace, Harper & Berkshire, of El Paso, for appellee.

WALTHALL, J. This suit was brought by appellee, Flinn, against appellants, Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and the El Paso & Southwestern Railway Company of Arizona, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him while in the employ of appellants as a section foreman on one of its lines of railroad in New Mexico. The facts are substantially without dispute and are as follows:

On February 3, 1919, Walker D. Hines was the Director General of Railroads, including the El Paso & Southwestern Railroad Company, and was then operating the lines of said company in New Mexico in interstate commerce, and Flinn was section foreman on the railroad at Victoria, N. M. On the day named it became necessary and a part of Flinn's duty to repair a part of the railroad track and switch, and to make the repairs it was necessary for Flinn to cut or remodel a tie plate, and in order to do so it became necessary to use a chisel and strike it with a chisel hammer or sledge; the hammer having been furnished appellee and other employes by appellant for that purpose. While Flinn was holding the chisel another of appellants' employes was striking it with the sledge, and while doing so the sledge slivered and a piece of the sledge flew off, striking Flinn in the eye, and caused the injuries of which he complains. The negligent act assigned was that the sledge furnished him was unsafe because it was too hard, brittle, not properly tempered, and for that reason when used in striking on another hard instrument it broke or slivered; that appellants knew, or by inspection could have known, of the defective condition of the sledge; and that Flinn was ignorant of its condition.

Appellants answered by general denial; denied Flinn's injury and the extent of it as alleged; alleged that the sledge or hammer was a common and ordinary tool, which, if defective, its defects were plain and apparent to Flinn, and that it was Flinn's duty to observe and know of its defects and not to use the sledge if it was in the condition as alleged; that if Flinn was injured same was due to ordinary risks incident to his employment, and that Flinn assumed the risk of using the sledge in the manner and in the condition it was in; that Flinn was section foreman, and if any inspection of the hammer was necessary to determine its condition it was his duty to make the inspection; that appellants' instructions contained in its book of rules made it Flinn's duty to keep all tools in first-class condition, and when same needed repair to send same in to place designated by the head of the department and to make requisition for a new one. The case was dismissed as to the railroad company, and a verdict and judgment rendered against appellant, Walker D. Hines.

Appellant's insistence here is that the court was in error in refusing to peremptorily instruct the jury to return a verdict for appellant. While the error assigned is discussed under three propositions, they are to the effect that, where the evidence is uncontroverted and to the effect that the duty of inspection and keeping the tools and appliances in proper condition is on the employé, the employé complaining of injury by reason of such tools being in bad order or condition, and this defect being the proximate cause of the injury, such employé cannot recover; that where the duty of inspection is with the employé he is presumed to know the defects, if any, in the tools which it is his duty to inspect and keep in repair or replace with new or other tools, and that under such conditions the appellee assumes the risk, as a matter of law, of using such defective tool. Without stating all the evidence, we will state briefly such as seems relevant to the contention made.

Appellee testified: In his 25 years' experience he had occasion to handle mauls and chisels of that character; from his experience, when a tool has been broken he can judge whether or not it is properly made; had had the maul on the hand car before the accident and used it; it was a tool they used right along, but he never had any occasion to make a special examination of it; said:

"It was my duty and I did inspect tools and keep them in good shape as near as I could. * * * As to whether I stated a while ago that I had not inspected this hammer, I took it for granted it was a good maul because there were no defects. Yes; I looked at the maul; it looked perfectly good as far as I was concerned."

Welch testified: Was road master; was familiar with the duties of section foreman; the foreman is responsible for his tools; is supposed to know his tools are safe; quoted rule 280, which reads:

"Employés must keep their tools in first-class condition. When needing repair, they must be sent to the place designated by the head of the department. When a tool is no longer serviceable, the foreman must make requisition for a new one and send the old one to the place designated by the head of the department." "When tools break or wear out, the section foreman sends them to the blacksmith to be fixed, and it is the duty of the blacksmith to properly temper the tools. When a tool is too brittle it is liable to break. When a tool is properly tempered it will mash instead of break. Flinn made no requisition for new tools, mauls, or chisel. If a tool is not serviceable Flinn is supposed to order a new one. He is supposed to do so only when they are battered or broken. When a tool shows to have been chipped off, that is an indication that something is wrong and it should be sent in."

Paul Flinn, son of appellee, testified:

"My father was holding the chisel so the Mexican could cut the end of the tie plate off. * * * I examined the chisel maul after the accident occurred. On the face of the maul and the side it was all chipped off. Chipped off $1\frac{1}{2}$ " on the face, and about $1\frac{1}{4}$ " upon the side of the maul. I didn't find any other alivers around there. * * * This maul was chipped around the edge of the face and off the side. As to how many places I noticed this chip, on the other side of the maul there was maybe two small ones, and on the other side of the maul it was perfectly good. * * * I didn't see it break, but I was using it just a few minutes before. This new break I have referred to was a large chip off one side. It was a place about $1\frac{1}{2}$ " around the side of the face of the maul and $1\frac{1}{2}$ " up the side. The large chip off showed to be a new break. There were some small old chips off the opposite side; they had broken some time previous to that. Showed to be an old break. I do not know the exact time my father had been foreman at that place; I think about three or four months, maybe two months. * * * He had been using the tools all the time he had been there."

[1, 2] It seems to us that the extent of the duty appellee assumed in looking after the safe condition of the maul or hammer is well stated in the rule above quoted. He was to keep the tool in first-class condition; when it needed repair he was to send it to the place where it was to be repaired; the witness Welch added to the rule that when it was not in proper temper he was to send it to the blacksmith. The maul seems not to have had the proper temper, and for that reason, instead of mashing when used, it splintered when struck on the steel or iron plate. The evidence does not disclose that when the accident happened the maul was in a temper different from what it was when it was furnished Flinn. If there was nothing to indicate to Flinn that the temper of the maul for some reason had been changed since it had been furnished to him, or that he knew the dangerous condition in which it was because not in proper temper, we can see no reason why he should send it to the blacksmith shop to be properly tempered. The duty of furnishing a safe and suitable maul is one, we think, of the nondelegable duties of the master of which he cannot relieve himself by charging his servant with its performance. It is a personal obligation the master owes to the servant. Gulf, etc., Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 103, 20 S. W. 1123; Railway Co. v. Pope, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 616, 97 S. W. 534.

[3] It cannot be said, as a matter of law, without reference to the use to be made of it, that because a hammer or maul is a common and simple appliance the master, when furnishing it to his servant for use in the discharge of his duties as such, does not owe to him the duty to use ordinary care to see that it is reasonably suitable and safe for the servant's use in the service to be performed by him. If the hammer was to be used in a service not requiring a proper temper, it might be said that the master was not lacking in care in furnishing one not properly tempered; but we think it should not be so said as a matter of law when the use to be made of it required a proper temper when struck against a steel or iron plate to prevent it from being a dangerous instrument. Houston & T. O. Ry.

Co. v. Patrick, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 491, 109 S. W. 1097.

[4-6] We are of the opinion that the circumstances of this case, as disclosed by the evidence, were such as to have a jury determine the question of negligence vel non of the appellant upon a consideration of all the facts. The question of assumed risk depends upon the same considerations. As said by the Supreme Court in Drake v. San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co., 99 Tex. 240, 89 S. W. 407, in furnishing a tool of any kind, the master is bound to use ordinary care for the safety of the servant who uses it. If there was negligence on the part of appellant in furnishing the hammer which, because of its unfitness for the use to which it was to be put, exposed Flinn to a danger which in the exercise of ordinary care in doing his work would not have been brought to his knowledge, he cannot be held to have assumed the risk resulting from his employer's negligence. We have reached the conclusion that the issues of negligence and assumed risk under all the circumstances and facts shown were for the jury to determine, and that the trial court was not in error in refusing to give the peremptory instruction requested.

The case is affirmed.

MASSEY et al. v. ALLEN et al. (No. 8322.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas.
May 1, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 19, 1920.)

1. Wills §94 — Essentials of instrument stated.

Under Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 7857, every will, except when wholly in the handwriting of testator, must be in writing and signed by testator, or by another at his direction and in his presence, and attested by two or more credible witnesses above the age of 14 years, by subscribing their names thereto in presence of testator.

2. Wills §293(1)—Evidence other than that prescribed by statute may be resorted to for probate.

While the method of Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 3267, is the preliminary rule for proving wills, other evidence may be resorted to, both in lieu of the statutory method and to supply lapses of memory on the part of the subscribing witnesses.

3. Wills §302(1)—Evidence held insufficient to prove due execution.

In proceedings to probate a will, evidence held insufficient, under Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 3267, to prove execution in compliance with article 7857.

4. Wills §165(1)—Declarations of testator inadmissible, except on issue of undue influence.

Though declarations of testator that he has made his will are not admissible, either on issue of execution or attestation, where it is alleged by contestants that proponents have exercised undue influence, such declarations, made within a reasonable period from execution, are admissible to show testator's state of mind and effect of such influence thereon.

5. Wills §822—Declarations of testator inadmissible in rebuttal.

In proceedings to probate a will, testimony of a devisee as to certain declarations of testator tending to show the will offered was the will he intended to make, such witness being called by proponents in rebuttal, should have been excluded.

6. Evidence §155(1) — Admission of illegal evidence does not authorize similar evidence for adversary.

The admission of illegal evidence on the part of one of the parties will not authorize his adversary to introduce similar illegal evidence in rebuttal, when excepted to.

7. Appeal and error §1050(1)—Testimony harmless, where party does not object to like testimony.

Where an objecting party permits like testimony to be introduced without objection, that admitted over his objection will be held harmless.

Appeal from District Court, Van Zandt County; Joel R. Bond, Judge.

Application to probate the will of W. J. Allen by John Allen and others, contested by R. B. Massey and others. From judgment admitting the will to probate, contestants appeal. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

Muse & Muse, of Dallas, and Simpson, Lasseter & Gentry, of Tyler, for appellants. Wynne, Wynne & Gilmore, of Wills Point, and Stanford & Sanders, of Canton, for appellees.

RASBURY, J. Appellants in the court below contested the application to probate the will of W. J. Allen, and the appeal is from the judgment of the court, entered upon special verdict of the jury, admitting it to probate. By requested peremptory instruction in the court below before verdict, and in various ways thereafter, appellants challenged the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the probate of the will and as a consequence the submission of the case to the jury. In our opinion the contention must be sustained. We will not attempt to follow appellants' method of presenting the issue, but, in lieu thereof, state the reasons why, in our opinion, the evidence does not support the findings of the jury, which, aside from the issue of fraud and undue influence, were in substance that N. A. Matthews and K. F. Williams, subscribing witnesses to the will, signed same in the presence of W. J. Allen, the testator.

[1] To properly understand our conclusion, it will be of assistance to recall that every will, except when wholly in the handwriting of the testator, to have effect as such, must be in writing and signed by the testator, or by another at his direction and in his presence, and attested by two or more credible witnesses above the age of 14 years by subscribing their names thereto in the presence of the testator. Article 7857, Vernon's Sayles' Civ. Stats. That the essentials required by the article cited to constitute a will, when not wholly in the handwriting of the testator, concurred, are to be shown primarily (1) by the written affidavit of one of the witnesses, taken and subscribed in open court, or by their depositions if they are non-residents of the county or unable to attend court; or (2) if none of the witnesses are living, then by proof of the handwriting of the testator and the attesting witnesses by affidavit taken in open court or by depositions. Article 3267, Id. It has been decided that in the cases first enumerated—that is, when the will is proven by the affidavit of one of the attesting witnesses—"the clear inference is that it [the affidavit] must contain such facts as are necessary to concur for the due execution of the will." Tynan v. Paschall, 27 Tex. 286-299 (84 Am. Dec. 619). The facts which must concur are those things enumerated in article 7857, supra, as the requisites for a will, as that it was signed by the testator, or by another at his direction and in his presence, and attested by two or more credible witnesses above the age of 14 years, by subscribing their names in the presence of the testator. Concerning proof of the will in the cases last enumerated, it was decided in the same case that, when the direct testimony of one or more of the subscribing witnesses—

"cannot be had, the statute also prescribes that it may be probated on proof by two witnesses of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, and also of the testator, if he was able to write. When this character of testimony can be resorted to, the statute indicates all that it is necessary to establish by the witnesses."

[2, 3] In short, when such proof is allowable, and it is allowable when that first required cannot be secured, the will may be probated on proof by two witnesses of the handwriting of the testator and the subscribing witnesses. Further, while the statutory method is the primary rule for proving wills, other evidence may be resorted to, both in lieu of the statutory method and to supply lapse of memory on the part of the subscribing witnesses. Tynan v. Paschall, supra. What, then, does the evidence disclose in that respect? The facts deducible from the testimony on that issue, as contained in appellees' brief, which we assume to be all the testimony, are these:

T. J. McKain, at the request of W. J. Allen, the testator, wrote the instrument tendered for probate and witnessed by R. F. Williams and N. A. Matthews in his office in Wills Point at the dictation and in the presence of Allen. When completed McKain read the instrument to Allen, and at his request signed Allen's name thereto; Allen making his "mark" to indicate such signature was his. After signing the will in the manner indicated, McKain advised Allen that two witnesses were required to the will, whereupon Allen left McKain's office to procure the witnesses. According to McKain's "best recollection," the witnesses signed as such in his office; Williams being accompanied to his office for that purpose by Allen. The signature, "N. A. Matthews," signed to the instrument offered as Allen's will as a witness, was shown by those qualified to know to be the genuine signature of N. A. Matthews, who was dead, and who was over 21 years of age at the time he signed same. R. F. Williams, the other witness to the will, testified to the genuineness of his signature, and that he was over 21 years of age when he signed it. The only other fact he remembered in connection with the matter was that Allen requested him to go to McKain's office and sign a document, which he understood to be Allen's will. Otherwise his memory had lapsed. He could not recall whether Allen or any one else was present when he signed the will. He also testified that Matthews was dead and over 21 years of age at the time he signed the instrument.

It was also shown that Allen, the testator, while illiterate, was intelligent and a person of strong and determined character, accompanied by testimony of certain declarations of Allen, subsequent to making the will and prior to his death, the tendency of which was to show that he intended to dispose of his property in the manner provided in the will. Typical of these declarations was the statement to William Pilley that some of his children had not "treated him right," and that he had given his property to his son John, and left his grandchildren $500 each, and had made a will accordingly; the declaration to Henry Gilchrist in his last illness, when he learned that his cash at bank was in excess of what he expected, "that John was going to get that money"; the statement to Jim Wilson that his son John would be manager of his property after his death. To Dick Sinclair he declared that he had made a will, so that none of the children would get anything, except John, and, when reminded that wills are often "broken," declared, "By God, I was present when this one was made." Declarations of like character were made to W. M. Massey, J. A. Vance, John Henry Jackson, and Andy Hawkins.

Such are the facts, and from them it appears, if the rule prescribed first by the statute is applied, that the only showing made by Williams, the living subscribing witness, is that he signed it, which is insufficient. On the other hand, if it be conceded that the next rule prescribed applies when one of the witnesses survives the testator, notwithstanding the statute declares it applies when all witnesses are dead, the showing in that respect is also insufficient, since, while the statute requires the handwriting of the testator and the witnesses to be proven by two witnesses, as matter of fact McKain only testified to the testator's handwriting and that of Matthews, and Williams to his own. In short, one witness only identified each signature, while to admit the will to probate two witnesses must identify each signature.

It is also apparent, from the facts we have recited, that the execution of the will was not otherwise proven, as it is said in the case so often cited herein may be done, when the primary rule cannot be complied with. If less witnesses are required to prove the will, when it cannot be done by the affidavits of the subscribing witnesses, it is none the less certain that every essential required must be shown in some way, and in that respect the proof also fails; for, while it was shown that Allen signed, and that Williams and Matthews subscribed as witnesses, and that both were over the age of 14 years, there is no showing that both or either signed as witnesses in the presence of the testator.

It is true that the declarations of the testator which we have recited were shown, and that they tend to prove that Allen believed he had executed a will. In the only case cited in this opinion it was said concerning such declarations:

"Nor will the declarations and acts of a party, indicating a belief that he has a will, add but little, if any, strength to the other testimony adduced to prove its due execution."

The facts in the case at bar illustrate the force of the argument, for, while Allen's declarations clearly indicate the disposition he desired to make of his property, they have no tendency whatever to prove that the witnesses signed the will in his presence.

The case of Hopf v. State, 72 Tex. 281, 10 S. W. 589, is not, in our opinion, one that presents facts parallel to those in the case at bar. There not only was the genuine signature of Nelman, the testator, shown, but it was also shown by Bumpas, one of the witnesses, that he signed in Nelman's presence. It was further shown by one Toblon that Nelman in his presence requested Schul, the other subscribing witness, to sign what Nelman said was his will, and that Schul did, as requested, sign such paper. Such facts clearly support the inference, not that the witnesses signed in the presence of the testator, for that was shown directly, but that the paper Schul signed was the will. In the case at bar, however, there is nothing that such an inference could be founded on, since the evidence only discloses the naked fact that the witnesses signed the instrument.

[4] Complaint is made of the admission in evidence of the declarations of the testator heretofore recited, on the ground that they prove neither the execution nor the attestation of the will. So stated, the contention is correct. However, it was alleged by appellants that appellees had exercised undue influence upon the testator to induce the execution of the will. When that issue is in the case, and the issue independently proved, such declarations in turn become admissible, when made within a reasonable period from the date of the execution of the will, for the purpose of showing the testator's state of mind and the effect of such influence thereon. Scott v. Townsend, 106 Tex. 322, 166 S. W. 1138.

[5-7] Amanda Glidden, a devisee in the will, was permitted over the objections of appellants, in rebuttal, to testify to certain declarations of the testator, tending to show that the will offered was the will he intended to make, being called as a witness by appellees, the proponents. The testimony should have been excluded. Leahy v. Timon (Sup.) 215 S. W. 951. It appears, however, from the record, that appellants were permitted by the court, over objections, to introduce similar illegal testimony favorable to them. That fact is urged as justification for admitting the testimony of Mrs. Glidden. It is the rule that the admission of illegal evidence on the part of one of the parties will not authorize his adversary to introduce similar illegal evidence in rebuttal, when objected to. Dolson v. De Ganahl, 70 Tex. 620, 8 S. W. 321; Shiner v. Abbey, 77 Tex. 1, 13 S. W. 613. The contention is not, in our opinion, within the rule that holds that, where the objecting party permits like testimony to be introduced without objection, that admitted over his objections will be held harmless. Appellants did not permit similar testimony to be introduced by appellees. What really transpired was that appellees permitted appellants to introduce illegal testimony favorable to them, and then sought to rebut its effect by contradictory illegal evidence.

Because of the errors pointed out, it becomes our duty to reverse the judgment and remand the cause for another trial, consistent with the views herein expressed.

BROYLES et ux. v. GILMAN et al.
(No. 1106.)(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. El Paso.
May 20, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 17, 1920.)1. Trial \S 192—Court did not err in assuming admitted fact that defendant was assignee of oil lease.

Where petition to cancel an oil lease alleged that certain defendants claimed an interest in the land under a sale or transfer, proof by such persons of a formal transfer was rendered unnecessary, in view of further fact that the plaintiff testified he received checks from such persons to cover rentals, and there was no error on part of court in assuming as an admitted fact that such persons were in privity with the lessee as assignees of his interest.

2. Mines and minerals \S 79(4)—Payment of rental by one of two assignees of oil lease payment for both.

Where $20 was payable quarterly as rental on an oil lease assigned by lessee to two persons, and each of the assignees gave lessee a check for $20 to cover the rental of his undivided interest and one of the checks was dishonored, there was no default by the assignees of the lease; the assignees filing a joint answer in an action by the lessor to cancel the lease, it being immaterial to a lessor as to who pays rentals due.

3. Mines and minerals \S 79(1)—Acceptance of quarterly rentals sufficient consideration for optional privileges in oil lease.

Acceptance of rentals provided for in an oil lease on failure of lessee to drill a well constituted a sufficient consideration for the optional privileges granted, and made the contract, which originally had only a nominal consideration of $1, valid.

Appeal from District Court, Eastland County; Joe Burkett, Judge.

Action by J. N. Broyles and wife against R. F. Gilman and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

B. W. Patterson, of Cisco, and Alexander & Baldwin, of Ft. Worth, for appellants.

J. J. Butts, of Cisco, for appellees.

HIGGINS, J. On May 22, 1916, J. N. Broyles and wife, lessors, leased to R. F. Gilman, lessee, 320 acres of land situate in Eastland county. The material portions of the lease contract are as follows:

The lessors, in consideration of $1 paid, granted, demised, and let unto the lessee all the oil, gas, etc., in and under the land, together with the exclusive right unto the lessee to operate, drill for, and mine said oil, gas, etc., and to lay and maintain pipe lines, etc. The lease was for the term of five years from date, and as much longer as gas, oil, etc., was produced in paying quantities, yielding to the lessors one-eighth of all the oil produced, delivered free of expense into the tanks or pipe lines to the lessors' credit. The contract contains these further provisions:

"Lessees agree to commence a well on said premises within one year from the date hereof, or pay lessor 25 cents an acre per annum, payable quarterly in advance from the 22d day of May, 1917, until said well is commenced or this lease surrendered, which surrender is made complete and binding upon failure of lessee to make such payment. And the drilling of such well shall be full consideration to lessor for grant hereby made to lessee, with exclusive right to drill one or more additional wells on the premises during the existence of the lease. * * *

"The above rental shall be paid lessor in person or by check deposited in post office, directed to J. N. Broyles, Nimrod, Texas. And it is further agreed that upon the payment of one dollar lessee shall have the right to surrender this lease, and thereafter shall be released and discharged from all payments, obligations, covenants, and conditions herein contained, whereupon this lease shall be null and void, and that all conditions, terms, and limitations between the parties hereto shall extend to their heirs, personal representatives, and assigns."

The form of this contract is the same as that construed by the Ft. Worth Court of Civil Appeals in the recent case of Hitson v. Gilman, 220 S. W. 140, not yet [officially] reported.

On September 26, 1918, Broyles and wife filed this suit against Gilman, Frances Ruben, and A. L. Cohen to cancel and set aside the above-described contract. In the petition it was alleged that the defendants Ruben and Cohen claimed some interest in the land through or under some kind of sale or transfer from Gilman; that the contract gave Gilman no right to sell or transfer, but, if he had such right, then such assignees acquired their interest subject to the burdens, conditions, defenses, and limitations contained in the lease. The defendants Ruben and Cohen filed a joint answer, setting up that they were the assignees of Gilman, and urging various defenses which it is not necessary now to mention. Upon trial before a jury a peremptory instruction was given in favor of the defendants, in accordance wherewith verdict was returned and judgment rendered. Error is assigned to the action of the court in giving the peremptory instruction; various propositions being urged why it was erroneously given.

[1] By the third proposition it is urged that the giving of the peremptory charge was improper, because there was no evidence to show that defendants Cohen and Ruben were legal assignees of Gilman, or owners of the leasehold interest in the land, and, since Gilman had disclaimed, there was no evidence upon which the peremptory charge could be based. It is true there was no direct evidence offered of an assignment by Gilman to Ruben and Cohen, but plaintiff's petition alleged that Ruben and Cohen claimed an interest in the land under a sale or transfer from Gilman; and the allegations of the petition thus placed those defendants in privity with Gilman under the lease contract, and proof by said defendants of a formal transfer from Gilman was thus rendered unnecessary, in view of these allegations and the further fact that the plaintiff, J. N. Broyles, upon the stand testified that in May, 1918, he received checks from Ruben and Cohen to cover the rental installment due May 22, 1918, and that these two parties had paid the rental installment at the previous quarter. His testimony clearly shows that he recognized Ruben and Cohen as being assignees of Gilman, and it is quite evident from the record that upon the trial no question was raised as to Ruben and Cohen being assignees, and that they were treated by the parties as such. In the state of the pleading and the record as a whole, there was no error upon the part of the court in assuming as an admitted fact that Ruben and Cohen were in privity with Gilman as assignees of Gilman's interest in the land under the lease contract.

[2] The fifth proposition is as follows:

"This lease was a mere option, running first for a period of 12 months, and then from quarter to quarter, and as it provided that failure to pay any rental in advance should be a complete surrender of the lease, and the evidence showing that part of the rentals were paid, plaintiffs had the right to refuse to receive further rentals and forfeit the lease, which they did, and for this reason the court erred in giving the peremptory charge."

It is true that so far as the lessee was concerned it was entirely optional whether he commenced a well or paid the quarterly rentals as stipulated in the contract. The testimony shows that no well had been commenced upon the land, but that Gilman paid the quarterly rentals up until the time Ruben and Cohen acquired his rights, and that such payments were accepted by the appellants. It further appears that Ruben and Cohen paid the quarterly rental which became payable three months preceding May 22, 1918, and that same was accepted by appellants. By virtue of the cash payment made at the time the lease was executed and these quarterly payments thereafter made, the optional rights of the lessee and his assignees were secured until May 22, 1918. Those payments constituted the consideration which supported the contract and the optional right of renewal or extension of the privileges for the period of 3 months from May 22, 1918, by making payment of the quarterly installment due May 22, 1918. There being 320 acres of land covered by the lease, a payment of $20 on or before May 22, 1918, would have secured to Ruben and Cohen an extension of their optional rights for 3 months. The record discloses that by letter dated May 14, 1918, the defendant Ruben wrote appellants as follows:

"Am sending $20 in payment for my share of 320 acres. The other half will be paid by Mrs. Anna Cohen. If you do not receive the rest of the rental for the land, please let me know."

In this letter she inclosed a check for $20. On May 18th defendant Cohen sent J. N. Broyles a check for $20, with letter as follows:

"I am inclosing $20 for 6 months rental for my share or half interest in the 320 acres assigned to Cohen & Ruben by Gilman. Please send me receipt."

The two checks of Ruben and Cohen were received by J. N. Broyles and cashed by him at his local bank. The check of Ruben, however, was dishonored by the bank upon which it was drawn, and Broyles repaid to the bank which cashed it for him the amount of the check. It thus appears that the defendant Ruben had failed to make any payment on or before May 22, 1918, as required by the contract; but the defendant Cohen did pay $20, which was received by appellants, and which they have never repaid her, nor offered to refund. The total amount due on May 22, 1918, was $20, and this amount was received by appellants from Cohen. It made no difference to the appellants which one of the assignees paid the rental due May 22, 1918. That was no concern of his. He had the right to insist upon the payment of $20 as a condition precedent to the further extension of the optional rights of the assignees, but the lessors had no right to arbitrarily say by whom the stipulated amount should be paid. The defendant Cohen had the right to insist upon her co-owner paying her share of the stipulated rental, but they filed a joint answer in which they pleaded the said payment of $20 made by the defendant Cohen, which payment covered the quarterly installment due May 22, 1918, and that by reason of such payment there had been no default in the payment of the installment due on May 22, 1918.

In view of the payment of this $20 by the defendant Cohen, which was received and accepted by the appellants, the dishonor of the checks of Ruben is of no importance.

[3] The sixth proposition is as follows:

"Where there is only a nominal consideration, the real consideration being the drilling of a well for oil, and both the drilling and the payment of rentals are entirely at the option of the lessee, with further right given the lessee alone to surrender the lease at any time by payment of $1, or other nominal amount, the contract is unilateral and void for want of mutuality, and this status of the contract renews itself at the end of each option period. This being the character of this contract and evidence showing these facts, it was error to give the peremptory charge."

Upon the facts heretofore stated it appears that all rental installments had been paid up to and including the one due on May 22, 1918, and that all subsequent maturing installments have been tendered to the appellants. These payments made by the original lessee and his assignees, and the acceptance thereof by the appellants, constituted a sufficient consideration for the optional privileges granted to the lessee and his assigns, and made the contract valid. The testimony of the appellant, J. N. Broyles, shows that the contract was read to him before he signed it, and that he understood the same, and there is nothing in the evidence which would relieve him from the legal effect of the contract which he made.

The first, second, and fourth propositions are as follows:

First. "Where there is any evidence upon an issue, the question should be submitted to the jury. Plaintiffs having alleged the failure of defendants to drill and to pay rentals, and the plaintiffs' evidence having shown that no well was drilled, and that the rental on one-half of the land was not paid when due, the issue was for the jury, and it was error to give the peremptory charge for defendants."

Second. "The peremptory charge was error, because payment of the rental was not made on one-half of the land, and, this having been shown by uncontradicted evidence, the court should have charged the jury to find for plaintiffs for an undivided one-half of the land, or should have left that question to the jury for determination."

Fourth. "The peremptory charge was error, for the reason that there was no provision in the lease for the pro rata payment of the rentals, the contract authorized the payment only on all the land, and, the evidence having shown payment on only one-half the land; the question of cancellation should have been left to the jury."

It will be noted that these last-mentioned propositions all proceed upon the theory that the payment of $20 on May 22, 1918, by the defendant Cohen, would not operate to save the interest of the defendant Ruben. Upon the view heretofore expressed, this was a matter which did not concern the appellants. Twenty dollars was the correct amount due on May 22, 1918. The defendant Cohen is not complaining, but has answered jointly with her codefendant, Ruben, setting up the payment of this $20 as being in full satisfaction of the entire amount due on May 22, 1918, and in this condition of the pleadings, and the manifest purpose of the defendant Cohen to have this payment operate as an extension of the optional rights of herself and her codefendant for a period of 3 months from May 22, 1918, it should be permitted to so operate.

Upon the views expressed, we are of the opinion that this case should be affirmed. It is a hard contract against the lessors, but a man has a right to enter into an onerous contract, if he wishes to do so. The plaintiff's own testimony wholly disproves his allegation of fraud being practiced upon him, and it appears that he accepted the quarterly rentals, and in this condition of the record there is no reason why the contract is not valid and binding upon him. The opinion of Judge Conner in the Hiltson-Gilman Case, supra, recognized the validity of the contract, and the reversal was based solely upon the ground that the court below erred in excluding the lessor's testimony that the recited consideration in the lease was not in fact paid. In the present case Broyles admits that he received the cash payment, and payments covering every rental installment up to and including May 22, 1918, and it further appears that the subsequent installments have been duly tendered.

The judgment is affirmed.

CENTRAL TRANSFER & STORAGE CO. v.
WICHITA FALLS MOTOR CO. et al.
(No. 8363.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas.
May 1, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 19, 1920.)

1. Trial \Leftrightarrow 352(5)—Special issue held objectionable as being a combination of two distinct issues.

In action against mortgagee for wrongful sequestration of mortgaged automobile, the submission of special issue as to whether mortgagee's agent acted in good faith and with reasonable grounds for believing that mortgagee felt itself insecure or unsafe or that it feared that the storage company in possession of the automobile would injure the automobile during pendency of suit, with directions to answer "Yes" or "No," held error, being an erroneous combination of two separate and distinct issues which the jury should have been permitted to pass upon separately.

2. Chattel mortgages \Leftrightarrow 161—Stipulation for possession in case of insecurity held valid.

A stipulation in chattel mortgages giving mortgagee the right in case he feels unsafe or insecure in the collection of the deed to declare all the indebtedness due and take possession of the mortgaged property is valid and enforceable.

3. Sequestration \Leftrightarrow 21 — Chattel mortgage held to give no right to sequestration from fear of damage to property pending foreclosure.

While mortgagee's exercise by sequestration of a right given him by his mortgage to take possession of the mortgaged property, as the right to declare all notes due and take possession of the property upon feeling unsafe or insecure from any cause, could not make him liable as for wrongful sequestration, yet, if the mortgagee had not exercised its option to declare all the notes due because it felt unsafe and insecure, before sequestration was sued out and levied, and sued out sequestration on the ground alone of fear that the holder of the mortgaged property would injure the property during the pendency of suit, the mortgagee, if such ground in fact did not exist, could not escape liability for actual damages by showing that it had reasonable grounds to fear such consequences.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; Marshall Thomas, Special Judge.

Suit by the Central Transfer & Storage Company, a partnership, etc., against the Wichita Falls Motor Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Morris & Williamson, of Dallas, for appellants.

Ralph P. Mathis, of Wichita Falls, and Davis, Johnson & Handley, of Dallas, for appellees.

TALBOT, J. The Central Transfer & Storage Company, a partnership composed of William E. Burns and Earl S. Burns, appellants, sued the appellees, Wichita Falls Motor Company, a corporation, and G. F. Spence to recover damages, actual and exemplary, for alleged wrongful and malicious issuance and levy of a writ of sequestration by them upon a "Wichita truck No. B. 160," alleged to be of the value of $1,000. They also sued to recover "special damages," and the facts upon which they sought to recover the several characters of damages claimed were fully set out in their petition. The appellees pleaded a general demurrer, special exceptions, and specially that on July 31, 1917, the Wichita Falls Motor Company sold to O. D. Rawlins and J. B. Merritt, of Dallas, Tex., one second-hand two-ton truck; that said parties gave notes in part payment of the purchase price of said truck, said notes being for the sum of $400, and also gave a mortgage on said truck to secure the purchase price thereof; that the mortgage was filed with county clerk of Dallas county, Tex., on August 1, 1917; that the mortgage provided in part as follows:

"The mortgagor hereby expressly agrees and covenants that on default in the payment of any one of said notes or any interest due thereon, or any sale, or any attempt to sell said goods or chattels, or any part of them, or to remove them, or any part of them from the county, or from their present location, or upon the seizure of them or any part of them, by any process of law, or if any holder of said notes shall at any time feel unsafe or insecure from any cause, then and in any of the foregoing events said mortgagees, or their assigns, agents, or representatives, are hereby authorized at their option to declare all of said notes due and to take actual possession of said property";

—that on or about September 15, 1917, and at which time the truck was in the hands of the appellees for repair, being placed there by Rawlins and Merritt, the plaintiffs came to the place of business of said defendants with Rawlins and Merritt, and said truck was sold to the appellants herein; that the appellants assumed the balance due on said truck by said Rawlins and Merritt; that at the time appellants purchased the truck there was one note due on the truck; that the notes were collected through a local bank, and inquiry was made by the local agent of the defendants if the note at the bank had been paid; that said appellants advised the appellees the note had been paid; that afterwards the appellees were advised that the note then due had not been paid on September 15, and when said appellants called for the truck on or about September 27, 1917, further inquiry was made of the appellants if said note had been paid; that the appellees refused to permit the truck to be taken out of their place of business unless said note or notes then due were paid; that said appellants assured the appellees that the notes had not paid, and that said assurance was given before said truck was taken out of appellees' place of business; that afterwards said appellees found that said note due in September, 1917, was not paid, although the appellants had assured appellees that said note had been paid; that the October note was not paid when due; that on October 17, 1917, appellees were advised said notes due in September and October, 1917, had not been paid, and said appellees advised appellants that said notes must be paid, otherwise possession of the truck must be had by appellants; that during the month of October, 1917, said appellants were operating the truck and left said truck in Denton county on the public road and advised the defendants below, appellees here, that if they wanted said car to go after it; that in view of the fact that the notes due on said car had not been paid, although numerous promises had been made by the appellants that said notes would be paid, and in view of the fact that the truck had been left on the public highway by appellants and the security of the appellees was in danger, said appellees called on their attorneys on October 17, 1917, and were advised to sue out a writ of sequestration and levy same on the car and file suit to foreclose the mortgage lien, etc.

The case was submitted to the jury on special issues, with instructions that, if an affirmative answer was given to special issue No. 1, not to answer any other issue submitted. Special issue No. 1 is as follows:

"Did G. F. Spence, act in good faith and with reasonable grounds for believing the truth of either of the statements made, (a) that the Wichita Falls Motor Company felt itself insecure or unsafe, or (b) that it feared the Central Transfer & Storage Company would injure the property during the pendency of the suit? Answer 'Yes' or 'No.'"

To this question the jury answered "Yes," and in obedience to the instruction of the court made no other finding. On motion made judgment was entered, over the objections of the appellants, on the above finding of the jury in favor of the appellees. Appellants' motion for a new trial having been overruled, they appealed.

[1, 2] We shall not undertake to discuss seriatim the several assignments of error presented by the appellants. Our conclusion is that two propositions contended for by them are well taken and require a reversal of the case. These propositions are to the effect: (1) That special issue No. 1, quoted above and the only one determined by the jury, is an erroneous combination of two separate and distinct issues which the jury should have been permitted to pass upon separately; (2) that it cannot be told from the jury's answer "Yes" to said special issue which of the questions therein contained they intended to or did answer and could not be made the basis of the judgment rendered thereon in appellees' favor. The first question involved in the issue is, in substance: Did G. F. Spence, the agent of appellees, in suing out the sequestration, act in good faith and with reasonable grounds for believing that the appellee Wichita Falls Motor Company felt itself insecure or unsafe with respect to its security for the payment of its debt? And the second question involved is: Did said appellee, as a basis for suing out the sequestration, fear the Central Transfer & Storage Company would injure the truck constituting the security for the payment of its debt during the pendency of the suit in which the sequestration was sued out? Under the pleadings and evidence both of these questions were questions of fact, both or either of which might have been answered in the negative. As they were submitted the jury was not given the privilege of answering one in the negative and the other in the affirmative, or vice versa. They were instructed to answer by the one word "Yes" or "No." The decisions of this state clearly affirm that a special issue of fact submitted to a jury for their determination by which the jury are instructed to answer "Yes" or "No" should submit for their consideration a single question, and should not combine two separate and distinct questions of fact, one of which might be answered in the negative and the other in the affirmative, or vice versa, by the jury. Railway Co. v. Turner, 199 S. W. 868; Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Andrews, 169 S. W. 218; Western Indemnity Co. v. MacKechnie, 214 S. W. 456. Here the issue as framed required the jury to find whether or not G. F. Spence, in suing out the writ of sequestration, had either reasonable grounds to believe that the Wichita Falls Motor Company felt itself insecure or unsafe with respect to the security it had for the payment of its debt, or feared the Central Transfer & Storage Company would injure such security during the pendency of the suit in which the sequestration was sued out. To this issue the jury, having been instructed to answer "Yes" or "No," answered "Yes." From the form of the issue and the answer it can only be said, at most, that the jury determined from the evidence that G. F. Spence, when he sued out the writ of sequestration, had reasonable grounds to believe either that the appellants felt themselves insecure or unsafe in the security they had, or that appellants feared the appellees would injure the truck constituting such security pending the litigation, but which of the facts they found to exist it is impossible to say. This being true, the finding of the jury furnishes no basis for the judgment rendered upon it. That a stipulation in a mortgage giving the mortgagee the right, in case he feels unsafe or insecure in the collection of his debt, to declare all of his indebtedness due and take possession of the mortgaged property, is valid and enforceable, is well settled by adjudicated cases.

This court, in the case of Warren v. Osborne, 97 S. W. 851, cited by appellees, treating of a provision in a mortgage practically the same as the one contained in appellants' mortgage, said:

"This clause placed the power in him [the mortgagee] to declare it [the debt] due, and, the jury having found that he had reasonable grounds for feeling unsafe and insecure, and he having declared it due, judgment was properly rendered thereon."

[3] Had there been a definite finding by the jury that G. F. Spence had reasonable grounds for believing that the Wichita Falls Motor Company felt unsafe or insecure, and had declared all the notes secured by its mortgage due before the payment of the notes which became due September 15 and October 15, 1917, respectively, and before the suing out of the sequestration, then we think the court would have been authorized to declare as a matter of law arising upon such finding that appellants were not entitled to recover any damages on account of the issuance and levy of the sequestration. In such case appellee's exercise by sequestration of the right given him by his chattel mortgage to take possession of the property covered by such mortgage could not make him liable as for wrongful sequestration. Wedig v. San Antonio Ass'n, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 158, 60 S. W. 567; Nichols v. Paine, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 87, 113 S. W. 972; Brunson v. Dawson State Bank, 175 S. W. 438. If, in other words, the facts existed which authorized appellee to take possession of the mortgaged property under the terms of his mortgage, then he cannot be held liable for damages by taking such property by writ of sequestration. This is firmly established by the authorities cited. But we hold that the jury's finding under the issue submitted in this case does not show the existence of such facts and does not support the judgment rendered. Whether the appellee had exercised its option to declare all the notes secured by its mortgage due because it felt unsafe or insecure before the September and October notes were paid and the sequestration sued out and levied was a question of fact under the evidence, and not one of law.

The submission of issue No. 1 in the form it was submitted indicates to us that the trial court entertained the view that, if G. F. Spence, appellee's agent, had reasonable grounds to believe that appellee felt itself unsafe or insecure, or if it feared appellants would injure the property upon which it had a mortgage during the pendency of the suit in which the sequestration was sued out, then, in either such event, appellants were not entitled to recover either actual or exemplary damages. If this was the court's view, then we do not concur in its opinion that, if the appellee's agent had reasonable grounds to fear appellants would injure the property during the pendency of the litigation, appellants were not entitled to recover actual damages. If the ground alleged for the issuance of the sequestration, which was that appellee feared that the appellants, the Central Transfer & Storage Company, would injure the property during the pendency of the suit, was in fact untrue, then appellee could not escape liability for actual damages by showing that it had reasonable grounds to fear such consequences. Culberston v. Ca-been, 29 Tex. 247; Fred Mercer Dry Goods Co. v. Fikes, 211 S. W. 880.

Because of the error in submitting issue No. 1 in the form it was submitted and the insufficiency of the finding of the jury upon that issue to authorize and support the judgment rendered, said judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

YOUNG v. JONES et ux. (No. 1079.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. El Paso.
May 20, 1920.)1. Mines and minerals \S 73—Oil lease held privilege, and not present conveyance.

Oil and gas lease, granting described premises "for the sole and only purpose of mining and operating for oil and gas, and of laying pipe lines, and of building tanks," etc., designating the right of the lessee as a "privilege," and providing that lessee's rights should terminate on failure to drill within one year or make payment of specified amount on or before certain date, held a mere right, franchise, or privilege to enter on the land, and to appropriate a portion of oil and gas discovered therein, and not a conveyance of the oil and gas as a present interest in the land, the commencement of a well, or payment of rental on or before specified date, being a condition precedent to the continuation or extension of the lessee's privileges after such date.

2. Mines and minerals \S 73—Time regarded as essence of oil and gas lease.

In oil and gas leases, time is regarded as the essence of the contract, and the rule that a lease is construed most strongly against the lessor does not apply.

3. Evidence \S 20(1)—That development is inducing consideration to lessor in oil and gas lease is common knowledge.

In oil and gas leases, it is a matter of common knowledge that the development of the oil and gas is, in most instances, the main inducing consideration to the lessor, that the privilege of paying rentals in lieu of such development is for the benefit of the lessee, and that undue delay in prospecting often produces a serious loss to the lessor.

4. Mines and minerals \S 79(6) — Forfeiture of oil lease for failure to pay rental within specified time.

Where oil and gas lease merely gave lessee the right to enter on land, and take a portion of the oil and gas therefrom, without conveying a present interest therein, and provided for the termination of lessee's right, on failure to drill or make specified payment on or before certain date, the failure to drill or pay the stipulated amount on or before such date, constituted a forfeiture against which equity will not give relief, though failure to make necessary payment was due to a mistake as to amount, and though an amount less than that specified was tendered prior to such date, and the full amount tendered subsequent thereto.

5. Mines and minerals \S 79(3)—Lessee could not extend oil lease as to only one part of land by payment of only a portion of the rental.

Where lessee assigned his interest in oil lease in different portions of the land in severalty to different persons, who in turn assigned their interests to the same person, such person, holding the lessee's interest as to the entire land, could not extend lease as to only a portion of the land by payment of only a portion of the rental, though lease provided that, on assignment as to a part of the land, the default of assignee should not affect lease in so far as it covered other portions of the land as to which rental was duly paid; such provision being applicable only in case the rights in different portions of the land were held by different persons, the optional right to pay rental being indivisible, where rights as to all the land were vested in one person.

6. Contracts \S 170(1)—Construction by the parties to be considered.

Interpretation placed upon a contract by the parties thereto, where the meaning is uncertain, is to be considered by the court in construing the contract.

Appeal from District Court, Callahan County; Joe Burkett, Judge.

Suit by William L. Jones and wife against R. M. Young. From the judgment, defendant appeals, and plaintiff cross-assigns error. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, and rendered for plaintiff.

R. M. Rowland, of Ft. Worth, C. M. Oakes, of Tulsa, Okl., and W. R. Ely, of Baird, for appellant.

B. L. Russell, of Baird, and Dallas Scarborough, of Abilene, for appellees.

HIGGINS, J. On December 7, 1917, Wm. L. Jones and wife, as lessors, entered into a written contract with C. L. Alvis, trustee, as lessee, the material portions whereof read:

"Witnesseth, that the said lessor, for and in consideration of seventy-six and $\frac{25}{100}$ dollars cash in hand paid, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and of the covenants and agreements hereinafter contained, on the part of lessee to be paid, kept, and performed, has granted, demised, leased, and let, and by these presents does grant, demise, lease, and let, unto the said lessee for the sole and only purpose of mining and operating for oil and gas and of laying pipe lines, and of building tanks, power stations, and structures thereon to produce, save and take care of said products, all that certain tract of land situated in the county of Callahan, state of Texas, described as follows, to wit: Being 78 acres out of the A. T. Burnlee survey and $80\frac{1}{2}$ acres out of the Burnlee survey and 152 acres out of the U. Bass survey No. 9, abstract No. 14, being all of land owned by us in Callahan county, Texas, conveyed to us by Nattie L. Rust, as shown by record in Callahan county, Texas, Book 58, page 148, and containing 305.3 acres, more or less.

"It is agreed that this lease shall remain in full force for a term of ten (10) years from this date, and as long thereafter as oil or gas, or either of them, is produced from said land by the lessee. In consideration of the premises the said lessee covenants and agrees:

"First. To deliver to the credit of lessor, free of cost, in the pipe line to which he may connect his wells, the equal one-eighth part of all oil produced and saved from the leased premises.

"Second. To pay the lessor two hundred ($200.00) dollars, each year, in advance, for the gas from each well where gas only is found, while the same is being used off the premises, and lessor to have gas free of cost from any such well for all stoves and all inside lights in the principal dwelling house on said land during the same time by making his own connections with the well at his own risk and expense.

"Third. To pay lessor for gas produced from any oil well and used off the premises at the rate of fifty ($50.00) dollars per year, for the time during which such gas shall be used, said payments to be made each three months in advance.

"If no well be commenced on said land on or before the 7th day of December, 1918, this lease shall terminate as to both parties unless the lessee on or before that date, shall pay or tender to the lessor, or the lessor's credit in the Farmers' National Bank at Cross Plains, Texas, or its successors, which shall continue as the depository regardless of changes in the ownership of said land, the sum of seventy-six and $\frac{25}{100}$ (\$76.25) dollars which shall operate as a rental and cover the privilege of deferring the commencement of a well for 12 months from said date. In like manner and upon like payments or tenders the commencement of a well may be further deferred for like periods of the same number of months successively. And it is understood and agreed that the consideration first recited herein, the down payment, covers not only the privilege granted to the date when said first rental is payable, as aforesaid, but also the lessee's option of extending that period as aforesaid, and any and all other rights conferred.

"Should the first well drilled on the above-described land be a dry hole, then and in that event, if a second well is not commenced on said land within twelve months from the expiration of the last rental period for which rental has been paid, this lease shall terminate as to both parties, unless the lessee on or before the expiration of said twelve months shall resume the payment of rentals in the same amount and in the same manner as hereinbefore provided. And it is agreed that upon the resumption of the payment of rentals, as above provided, that the last preceding paragraph hereof, governing the payment of rentals and the effect thereof, shall continue in force just as though there had been no interruption in the rental payments. * * *

"If the estate of either party hereto is assigned—and the privilege of assigning in whole or in part is expressly allowed—the covenants hereof shall extend to their heirs, executors, administrators, successors, or assigns, but no change in the ownership of the land or assignments of rentals or royalties shall be binding on the lessee until after the lessee has been furnished with a written transfer or assignment, or a true copy thereof; and it is hereby agreed that in the event this lease shall be assigned as to a part or as to parts of the above-described lands, and the assignee or assignees of such part or parts shall fail or make default in the payment of the proportionate part of the rents due from him or them, such default shall not operate to defeat or affect this lease in so far as it covers a part of said lands upon which the said lessee or any assignee thereof shall make due payment of said rental."

On January 16, 1918, Alvis and his cestui que trust transferred to C. W. Markley their rights under the above contract. On January 31, 1918, Markley transferred to L. W. Young, Jr., his rights in and to the land in the Burnlee survey. On February 7, 1918, Markley transferred to said Young his rights in and to the land in the Bass survey. Thereafter, and prior to November 11, 1918, L. W. Young, Jr., transferred to the appellant, R. M. Young, his rights in the land situate in the Burnlee survey, and by another assignment transferred to R. M. Young his rights in the land situate in the Bass survey.

On November 11, 1918, appellant, R. M. Young, made two deposits to the credit of appellee, Wm. L. Jones, in the Farmers' National Bank of Cross Plains, Tex., one deposit being for $38.25, and the other for $35.04, making a total of $73.29. The correct amount of the rental due on or before December 7, 1918, upon all of the land, under the original contract, was $76.25. On December 16, 1918, appellee Jones wrote appellant, Young, calling his attention to the fact that the correct amount of the rental had not been paid, and declared the contract thereby terminated. Thereupon appellant, on December 24, 1918, wrote Jones as follows:

"William L. Jones, Baird, Texas—Dear Sir: I acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 16th inst. with reference to oil and gas lease covering certain acreage in the U. Bass and Burnlee surveys, in Callahan county, Texas, and I wish to say immediately that this office has made a slight mistake with reference to the payment of rental becoming due December 7, 1918, and as a matter of explanation I have the following to say:

"Your lease covers in all 305.3 acres, and on February 5 of this year I purchased the lease, by assignment, in so far as same covers the 153 acres of the A. T. Burnlee survey, which acreage I am carrying under No. 11511; and on February 16 I purchased the remaining interest in this lease, being the acreage in the U. Bass survey, which through an oversight of my lease department was given No. 11756, when same should have been consolidated with the first purchase and carried under the one lease number, inasmuch as I was acquiring the entire lease. When the rental was paid, it therefore was paid with two separate drafts, and in figuring the amount of the rental due under each lease number the total amount was figured short $2.96; but this, of course, was an innocent mistake, which was not discovered until your letter of the 16th inst. was received. I expect to maintain my rights under this lease, and I wish to notify you that I am to-day mailing to the Farmers' National Bank of Cross Plains, Texas, a New York draft in the sum of $2.96, being the balance of rental due you, and trust you will find it consistent to call upon them for this sum. Will you please advise me?"

In this connection the agreed facts are as follows:

"The papers concerning the acreage in question came to defendant's office in Tulsa, Oklahoma, under two separate lease numbers, one bearing the number 11511, the assignment in that case calling for 153 acres out of the Burnlee survey; the remainder of such leased acreage came through said office about two weeks later under the number of 11756, the assignment in that case calling for 150 acres out of the U. Bass survey; the combined acreage covered by both assignments amounts to 303 acres; the rental called for by this lease was $76.25, which became due December 7, 1918, and the amount of $73.29 was paid by defendant prior to December 7, 1918, by forwarding to the Farmers' National Bank of Cross Plains, Tex., which was the depository named in the lease, two New York drafts, one in the sum of $38.25 to cover lease No. 11511, the other in the sum of $35.04 to cover rental under lease No. 11756; the lessor was notified by defendant's office that these deposits had been made and some time after the rental was due said lessor notified defendant that he had made a mistake in the payment of the rental money and had failed to pay enough; thereupon the matter was immediately checked up in defendant's office, and it was discovered that the remittances made to said depository bank before December 7, 1918, lacked $2.96 of amounting to the sum of $76.25 called for in the lease; thereupon defendant immediately remitted said $2.96 to said depository bank and deposited same therein to the credit of the lessors in said lease and notified lessors that such had been done and that it had always been the purpose and intention of defendant to protect the lease and comply with its terms and that the failure in the first instance to remit the required amount was due solely to error and inadvertence. If the defendant had not made a mistake, he would have paid the $76.25 by December 7, 1918."

Jones at all times refused to accept the deposits made by appellant. On February 19, 1919, Jones and wife and S. N. Foster, to whom they had conveyed a portion of the land, brought this suit to cancel and set aside the lease contract, on account of appellant's failure to pay the correct amount of the rental due on or before December 7, 1918.

Upon trial without a jury judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor, cancelling the lease upon the land in the Bass survey, and denied them any relief in so far as concerned the land in the Burnlee survey. From this judgment the defendant appealed.

Opinion.

The appellant's contention is that the admitted facts as above stated, show:

"That defendant at all times intended fully to comply with all terms of the lease contract, that the trivial shortage in one of the rental remittances was the result of a mere inadvertence, and that no damage resulted to the lessor from such mistake; the case plainly called for the interposition of equity to prevent a forfeiture of the lease, and the court erred in rendering judgment canceling the lease as to a part of the acreage covered by the same."

In determining whether this case calls for the application of the equitable rule for relief against forfeitures, it becomes necessary first to ascertain the nature of the contract executed by Jones and wife.

[1] The instrument does not undertake to grant the oil and gas in present, but, upon the contrary, the lands were granted and demised "for the sole and only purpose of mining and operating for oil and gas, and of laying pipe lines, and of building tanks," etc. Elsewhere in the contract the right of the lessee is designated as "privilege." Viewing the instrument as a whole and in the light most favorable to the lessee, it cannot be regarded as a conveyance of the oil and gas as a present interest in the land itself, but it confers upon him a mere right, franchise, or privilege to enter upon the land and "devote it to a certain use, with the usufructuary right, as a part of its [his] use and enjoyment, to appropriate a portion of the oil and gas as might be discovered." Texas Co. v. Daugherty, 107 Tex. 226, 176 S. W. 717, L. R. A. 1917K, 989. In other words, the lessee was granted the privilege of entering upon the land, developing its oil and gas resources, and exploiting a portion of such resources for his benefit, as distinguished from a present vested interest in the land itself. This conclusion is supported by the discussion in the Texas Co. Case, supra, also by Oil Co. v. Teel, 95 Tex. 586, 68 S. W. 979, O'Neil v. Sun Co., 58 Tex. Civ. App. 187, 123 S. W. 172, and Witherspoon v. Staley, 156 S. W. 557.

The next feature of the contract which should be noticed is its optional character. The cash paid to the lessors when the contract was made secured to the lessee the development and exploitation privilege until December 7, 1918; but, if a well upon the land was not commenced on or before that date, the lease terminated unless the lessee, on or before that date, paid or tendered to the lessor's credit the sum of $76.25, which payment would "operate as a rental and cover the privilege of deferring the commencement of a well for 12 months from said date." It will be noted the lessee assumed no obligation to commence a well in 12 months from the date of the contract, nor did he agree to pay a rental if such a well was not commenced. It was wholly optional with him. In this connection it will be noted, also, that by the express terms of the contract, if such well was not commenced in 12 months or the rental paid, the lease was terminated as to both parties. The features of the instrument, to which attention has been thus directed, show that if a well was not commenced in 12 months the privileges of the lessee terminated, unless he exercised his option to extend the same for the period of another year by paying $76.25 on or before December 7, 1918. The commencement of a well or payment of rental was a condition precedent to a continuation or extension of the lessee's privileges after that date. In speaking of failure to perform conditions precedent in options to purchase, Mr. Pomeroy says:

"In pursuance of this principle, equity will not relieve against a failure to perform a condition precedent in a contract, however slight the failure. The right to specific performance has never vested for the party in default. The contract cannot be said to be of equitable cognizance until the condition is performed. The contractual liabilities are incomplete before that time. * * * It has at times been suggested that relief for slight failure, where there was substantial compliance, should be applied to options to purchase land, as where the holder of the option was a day late in exercising the option. But it is clear the rule followed generally by equity is the true one—that there can be no relief against failure to exercise an option after the day named for its expiration, for an option is no more than an offer to sell, which the offerer is bound to keep open during the time set, but which expires with that time, leaving nothing for equity to operate upon. The courts very frequently refuse to give specific performance of an option sought to be exercised after the time has expired, on the ground of time being of the essence. Strictly speaking, there is no contract if the election is not made before the expiration of the time, and equity, finding no contract to use its discretion upon, cannot be concerned with the element of time, which presupposes an existing contract." Pomeroy's Eq. Remedies, §§ 806, 807.

[2, 3] In oil and gas leases time is regarded as the essence of the contract, and the rule that a lease is construed most strongly against the lessor does not apply. In oil and gas leases it is a matter of common knowledge that the development of those products is in most instances the main inducing consideration to the lessor. The privilege of paying rentals in lieu of such development is for the benefit of the lessee. The vagrant nature of oil and gas is well known, and undue delay in prospecting therefor often produces a serious loss to the landowner.

[4] We are therefore of the opinion that the contract executed by Jones and wife did not vest in the lessee a present interest or estate in the land itself, which would render applicable the equitable rule for relief against forfeiture of a vested interest, for breach of a condition subsequent, but that the right or privilege of the lessee terminated on December 7, 1918, unless a well was commenced on or before that date, or the stipulated rental paid; that the commencement of the well or payment of the rental were conditions precedent to an extension or continuation of the lessee's privileges and wholly optional with him; and, this being the nature of the contract equity will not relieve against the failure to exercise the option in strict accordance with its terms. Oil Co. v. Teel, O'Neil v. Sun Co., and Witherspoon v. Staley, all supra; Weiss v. Claborn, 219 S. W. 884; Hitson v. Gilman, 220 S. W. 140; Jennings-Heywood Oil Syndicate v. Oil Co., 119 La. 793, 44 South. 504; Pomeroy's Eq. Remedies, §§ 806, 807. Upon this view the court below did not err in canceling the lease upon the land in the Bass survey.

The appellee cross-assigns error to the action of the court in refusing to cancel the lease upon the land in the Burnlee survey. No conclusions of law were filed by the trial court, but we presume its action in this particular was based upon the theory that the contract was divisible, and the deposit of $38.25, which was made by appellant to cover the acreage in the Burnlee survey protected and maintained his rights and privileges as to that land. The contract provides:

"If the estate of either party hereto is assigned—and the privilege of assigning in whole as in part is expressly allowed—the covenants hereof shall extend to their heirs, executors, administrators, successors, or assigns; * * * and it is hereby agreed that in the event this lease shall be assigned as to a part or as to parts of the above-described lands, and the assignee or assignees of such part or parts shall fail or make default in the payment of the proportionate part of the rents due from him or them, such default shall not operate to defeat or affect this lease in so far as it covers a part or parts of said lands upon which the said lessee or any assignee thereof shall make due payment of said rental."

It doubtless was not contemplated that the original lessee, nor any subsequent assignee of the entire lease, should have the right to pay less than the whole rental sum of $76.25 annually for the continuation of his privileges. The manifest purpose of the provision was to give different assignees of different portions of the land the right to protect their respective holdings. The fair and reasonable construction of this portion of the contract is that the option to pay rental upon only a portion of the land arose when the lessee had assigned to different persons different portions of the land in severalty. In such case each assignee would have the right to pay the pro rata rental upon the land assigned to him and protect against an extinguishment of his privileges.

[5] We are of the opinion that under the contract in question, where all of the rights and privileges granted by the instrument as to all of the lands described therein were vested in one person, the optional right to pay rental was indivisible, and that such an individual would have no right to pay rental upon a part of the land only. This was the construction placed upon the instrument by the lessor, for he at once declared the entire lease terminated for the failure to pay the whole rental. The appellant seems also to have placed this construction upon the contract, for in his letter to Jones of December 24th, he says:

"Your lease covers in all 305.3 acres, and on February 5 of this year I purchased the lease, by assignment, in so far as same covers the 153 acres of the A. T. Burnlee survey, which acreage I am carrying under No. 11511; and on February 18 I purchased the remaining interest in this lease, being the acreage in the U. Bass survey, which through an oversight of my lease department was given No. 11756, when same should have been consolidated with the first purchase and carried under the one lease number, inasmuch as I was acquiring the entire lease." (Italics ours.)

[6] The interpretation placed upon a contract by the parties thereto, where the meaning is uncertain, is to be considered by the court in construing the same. We are therefore of the opinion that, since the entire interest of the lessee was vested in appellant, the option to pay the annual rental was indivisible, and the failure to pay the whole stipulated amount terminated the entire contract. For this reason appellees' cross-assignment is sustained.

Affirmed as to the land in the Bass survey. As to the land in the Burnlee survey the judgment is reversed, and here rendered in appellee's favor.

LOPEZ v. MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. OF TEXAS et al. (No. 6416.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio.
May 28, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 16, 1920.)

1. Marriage \S 40(6) — Agreement to marry woman and cohabiting with her without legal ceremony not basis for presumption of divorce from legal wife.

The fact that a man leaves a lawful wife and lives in a state of cohabitation with another woman without a legal ceremony and with an agreement that they will be married cannot form a basis for a presumption that he had been divorced from his legal wife.

2. Marriage \S 40(8)—Once established presumed to continue.

Where a marriage is once established, it is presumed to continue until the contrary is proved.

3. Marriage \S 40(1, 6)—Presumption of competency of parties and death or divorce of former spouse does not extend to common-law marriage.

When there has been a formal marriage according to legal requirements, the law will presume the competency of the parties to enter into marriage contracts, and will presume that any former marriage of either was dissolved by death or divorce, but such presumption does not extend to a cohabitation with an agreement that the parties would marry, since the law merely tolerates common-law marriages, and does not encourage them.

4. Death \S 31(6)—Woman unlawfully cohabiting with husband of another not entitled to sue.

The statutory cause of action to recover damages for death is "for the sole and exclusive benefit of the surviving husband, wife, children and parents" of the deceased as provided by Rev. St. 1911, art. 4698, and a woman cohabiting unlawfully with a man has no right to such damages, even though she did not know he had ever been married.

5. Marriage \S 50(5)—Evidence held insufficient to establish common-law marriage.

In an action for a man's wrongful death, evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiff was his common-law wife, even if he did not have another wife living at such time; the agreement shown being one to get married, and not a marriage contract.

6. Marriage \S 33—Binding without cohabitation if celebrated under forms of law.

A marriage celebrated under the forms of law is valid and binding, whether cohabitation takes place or not, and, although there is no cohabitation, an innocent third party otherwise eligible has no lawful right to contract a second marriage with one of the parties.

7. Marriage \S 40(7), 44—Ceremonial marriage in foreign country presumed in accordance with its laws; may be proved by witness without producing certificate.

A ceremonial marriage may be proved by the testimony of eyewitnesses without the production of the marriage certificate, or explanation of its absence, and proof of a ceremonial marriage in a foreign country carries the presumption that it was in accordance with that country's laws.

8. Marriage \S 50(1)—Evidence held to show that plaintiff's common-law husband was husband of another.

In a woman's action for a wrongful death of her alleged common-law husband evidence held sufficient to show that deceased was the lawful husband of another, so that plaintiff was not his common-law wife.

9. Appeal and error ¶99—New trial not warranted by immaterial impeaching evidence.

Plaintiff seeking damages for the unlawful death of her alleged common-law husband is not entitled to new trial for newly discovered evidence which could be used only to impeach witness who testified that deceased was the lawful husband of another, which evidence was not material, because plaintiff failed to show a common-law marriage, even though such former marriage did not exist.

10. Pleading ¶11—Not necessary that defendant plead defensive evidence.

In an action for wrongful death of plaintiff's alleged common-law husband, it was not incumbent upon defendants to plead the evidence to show that plaintiff had never married the deceased, and they could produce evidence to prove that deceased was the lawful husband of another by a prior existing marriage.

11. New trial ¶102(1)—Not granted where movant had knowledge of facts, but did not investigate.

Where plaintiff, suing for death of her alleged common-law husband, had notice through affidavit long prior to trial that deceased was previously married in Mexico, but made no investigation whatever, a new trial for newly discovered evidence relative to marriage would not be granted.

12. Appeal and error ¶933(4)—Affidavit for continuance showing facts putting movant for new trial on notice presumed to have come to knowledge of movant at date of application.

In action by alleged common-law wife for death of husband defended on ground of prior existing marriage, appellate court will presume to uphold denial of new trial for newly discovered evidence as to marriage that affidavit for continuance showing that deceased was married in Mexico was filed as of date of application for continuance and came to knowledge of movant at that time.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; R. B. Minor, Judge.

Action by Tiburcia Lopez against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Long and Henry B. Cline, all of San Antonio, for appellant.

C. C. Huff, of Dallas, and F. C. Davis and Marshall Butz, both of San Antonio, for appellees.

FLY, C. J. Appellant, describing herself as Tiburcia Lopez Vda de Simon Garcia, instituted this suit for damages against the railway company and Charles E. Schaff, its receiver, to recover damages alleged to accrue to her on account of the negligent killing of Simon Garcia, alleged to have been her husband by a common-law marriage. The marriage was denied by appellees, and other defenses presented. The cause was submitted to a jury on five special issues, the first being:

"At the time of the death of Simon Garcia, was the plaintiff, Tiburcia Lopez de Garcia, his lawful wife?"

The jury was instructed that, if Simon Garcia had a lawful living wife when it was claimed the common-law marriage was consummated, there could be no common-law marriage, and, if it was found that there was no legal marriage, no other questions need be answered. The jury found that appellant was not the legal wife of Simon Garcia, and upon that finding judgment was rendered denying a recovery to appellant.

There are 19 assignments, 12 of which involve discussions of the evidence as to the marriage of appellant to Simon Garcia, the remainder complaining of the refusal to grant a new trial, one ground of which was the discovery of new and important testimony. They are all overruled for the reasons hereinafter given.

There was testimony that showed that Simon Garcia was legally married to Demetria Hernandez in the republic of Mexico, and came to San Antonio, Tex., with her in 1912; that in 1914 or 1915 he entered into illicit relations with appellant, but did not live with her until about seven months before his death, when he abandoned his wife, and appellant followed him to Smithville and was cohabiting with him at the time of his death, which occurred on June 4, 1916. There was no evidence of any divorce from Demetria, the lawful wife, who was left with his mother and brother, and still lives with them. The jury, even though there had been no lawful wife, could have rejected the claim of a common-law marriage. Appellant stated at one time that she was 53 years old, but amended it by saying it was 43 and Simon Garcia was 39. There was no evidence, direct or circumstantial, tending to show that Simon Garcia had been divorced from his wife, Demetria. Appellant contended that they had never been married, but the jury was justified in believing they had been legally married, and that such relation existed when Simon Garcia was killed.

[1, 2] It is the contention of appellant that the presumption that Simon and Demetria Garcia had been divorced would arise because appellant swore that there had been an agreement between her and Simon Garcia to live together as man and wife. The fact that a man leaves a lawful wife and lives in a state of cohabitation with another woman without a legal ceremony cannot form a basis for a presumption that he had been divorced from his legal wife. Of course, no authority is produced for such a proposition. On the other hand, it is a rule of evidence that, where marriage is once established, it is presumed to continue until the contrary is proved. Odum v. Woodward, 74 Tex. 41, 11 S. W. 925; Summerhill v. Darrow, 94 Tex. 71, 57 S. W. 942. The cases cited by appellant present very different facts from those found in this case, and no case has been cited where a marriage will be presumed to have been annulled by divorce to legalize adultery.

[3] When there has been a formal marriage, according to legal requirements, the law will presume the competency of the parties to enter into the marriage contract, and will presume that any former marriage of either of the parties was dissolved by death or divorce. This is based on the desire of the law to protect innocence, morality, and legitimacy rather than presume the continuance of the first marriage. When a marriage is proved according to statutory forms, it will be presumed to be legal until shown to be illegal. Schaffer v. Richardson, 125 Md. 88, 93 Atl. 391, and cases therein reviewed. No case has been brought to our notice where cohabitation for a few months and testimony of one of the parties to the cohabitation that there had been an agreement that they would marry would destroy the presumption of the continuation of a legal marriage theretofore consummated. The law is disposed to raise presumptions in favor of the legality of marriages entered into under legal forms, but not one consummated as appellant claims her marriage to Simon Garcia was consummated. The law merely tolerates a common-law marriage, but does not encourage or favor it.

[4] The fact that appellant, when she began cohabiting with Simon Garcia, did not know that he had ever been married would not give her the right under the statute to recover damages for his death. The statutory cause of action to recover damages for a death is "for the sole and exclusive benefit of the surviving husband, wife, children and parents of the person whose death shall have been caused." Article 4698, Rev. Stats. No mention is made in that statute of a woman living with a man unlawfully having the right to recover because she did not know he was married. The law is for the benefit of the woman who has been joined in lawful wedlock to the man who has been killed.

[5] The evidence failed to establish a common-law marriage, even though there had been no prior marriage of Simon Garcia. Appellant testified that on April 2, 1914, she had an agreement with Simon Garcia to live with him as his wife. She stated the conversation to have been as follows:

"We said that we would live together as man and wife, and would live happily, and that we were going to get married. He talked that way to me, and when he said that I said 'Yes.'"

After that, she said, they lived together as man and wife. The only witness who corroborated appellant as to Simon Garcia calling her his wife was Mrs. M. Moke, who stated that she saw the couple at a dance in May, 1915, and Simon Garcia introduced appellant to the witness as his wife and said "that she was a very nice companion to him." Again she said: "Yes, sir; Simon Garcia said that night that this woman would be a nice friend to him; he admitted that she was a nice companion to him." She might have been all that and still not his wife. According to appellant they did not then agree to marry, but "were going to get married"—that is, at some future time.

[6] We know of no law supporting the claim of appellant that, although Simon and Demetria may have been lawfully married, if he abandoned her immediately after the celebration of the marriage, any "innocent third party, who is otherwise eligible, has the lawful right to contract a second marriage with such man." A marriage celebrated under forms of law is a valid and binding marriage, whether cohabitation takes place or not. However, the evidence is sufficient to show that Simon and Demetria, after marriage, reared a child and necessarily lived together.

[7] The marriage of Simon and Demetria Garcia could be proved by oral testimony, and the general rule is that a ceremonial marriage may be proved by the testimony of eye-witnesses, without the production of a marriage certificate and without explaining its absence. 18 R. C. L. 423. Proof of a ceremonial marriage in a foreign country carries with it the presumption that it was performed in accordance with the laws of that country. And the marriage in a foreign country may be proved by the testimony of any person who was present at the ceremony. 18 Ruling Case Law, p. 427.

[8] Demetria and Simon Garcia not only reared a brother of his, but after his death Demetria was recognized by his mother and brother as his widow, and came to live with them. Simon Garcia supported his wife, mother, and brother. They lived together in the most perfect harmony. He did not live with appellant in San Antonio, but when he went to Smithville, about seven months before his death, appellant followed him and entered into her illicit relations with him. Appellant has not even the lapse of many years, as in some of the cases cited by her, to sanctify the cohabitation into which she entered with Simon. According to her own testimony, it could not have been more than two years, and according to that of other witnesses, found by the jury to be true, not more than seven or eight months. No children came from the illicit relations between Simon Garcia and appellant, and they cannot be considered, as is often done, to legalize certain acts and create a marriage for their protection. In the case of Nixon v. Land Co., 84 Tex. 408, 19 S. W. 560, both parties to the first marriage had married again, and many years had elapsed before the validity of the second marriage was attacked. A common-law marriage did not figure in that case nor any of the others cited by appellant.

[9] In order to obtain a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, it must clearly appear that it was not known before the trial; that it is material and would probably change the result; could not have been discovered before the trial by the exercise of reasonable diligence; that it is not cumulative or merely to be used for purposes of impeachment. The evidence sought was not material because, the evidence being insufficient to show a common-law marriage, appellant had no cause of action, whether a former marriage existed or not. The newly discovered testimony could have been used for no other purpose except to impeach the witnesses who swore that Simon was married to Demetria Garcia in Mexico. It is firmly settled in Texas that a new trial will rarely, if ever, be granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence, when its object is to impeach the witnesses of the successful party. Jones v. Neal, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 412, 98 S. W. 417; Railway v. Murtile, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 273, 108 S. W. 998.

[10] Appellees denied that appellant ever entered into a common-law marriage, but that she was a woman of loose and immoral character, and that her relation to Simon Garcia was meretricious and illegal. It was not incumbent upon them to plead the evidence by which they intended to show that appellant had never married Simon Garcia. They could prove a prior existing marriage to support the allegation. It is a matter of small importance, if the marriage took place in Mexico between Demetria and Simon Garcia, whether it was in Torreon or Morales.

[11, 12] Appellant attached to a bill of exceptions an affidavit made by Demetria Hernandez de Garcia to an application made by appellees for a continuance, purporting to have been sworn to on April 18, 1918, more than a year and a half before this cause was tried, in which it was stated that Simon Garcia and Demetria Hernandez were married in Torreon, Mexico, in 1903, and yet appellant states that she had no notice that an attempt would be made to show that a marriage between Simon and Demetria had been celebrated in Mexico. Where she got the affidavit of Demetria Hernandez de Garcia or when she came into possession of it is not disclosed. It must be presumed that it was filed in support of the application for continuance on its date and came to the knowledge of appellant at that time. No claim is made that appellant was caused to investigate the records of Torreon as to a marriage, and could not know that witnesses would state that the marriage took place in Morales. No investigation of any sort was made until an adverse judgment to appellant was rendered. There was no diligence shown in procuring the testimony, and no effort made to ascertain the status of Demetria and Simon Garcia. Appellant knew for more than a year before the trial that one of the defenses of appellees to her cause of action would be that Simon Garcia was already married to Demetria Hernandez in Mexico, and yet no effort was made to obtain testimony controverting that defense. It is practically admitted that appellant knew that Demetria had sworn that she was married to Simon Garcia, because it is said in the brief:

"It looks as if the prior marriage was placed at Torreon, Mexico, to deceive appellant and her attorneys and thus prevent them from making the proper inquiry in time for the trial."

They made no inquiry, proper or otherwise, although they knew that the prior marriage was to become an issue on the trial of the cause.

The judgment is affirmed.

SAN ANTONIO & A. P. RY. CO. v. MCGILL et al. (No. 6187.)

{Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, Austin.
April 28, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 16, 1920.)

1. Railroads §376(4) — Duty as to object discovered defined.

When trainmen, discovering object on track, in the exercise of proper care, did not recognize it as a human being, it was not their duty to stop the train until they discovered that it was a man.

2. Railroads §400(8)—Negligence as to object discovered on track held for jury.

In an action for death on railroad track, whether trainmen saw deceased in a position of peril and realized that the object was a man at a distance within which they could stop the train held a question for the jury, notwithstanding positive testimony of trainmen in defendant's favor.

3. Railroads §398(4)—Verdict on theory of discovered peril sustained by evidence.

In action for death on a railroad track, evidence held sufficient to sustain a verdict in favor of plaintiff on a theory of discovered peril, notwithstanding the positive testimony of trainmen in defendant's favor.

4. Railroads §376(4)—Duty to stop on discovering person on track held correctly defined.

An instruction that the defendant railway company owed the deceased no duty, except to exercise ordinary care in the use of all means within its power, consistent with the safety of the train and the people thereon, to avoid injuring deceased after his peril was discovered, is not erroneous as requiring the trainmen to exercise more than ordinary care.

5. Trial §260(1)—Instruction already covered properly refused.

Court did not err in refusing to give a special requested instruction where the matter was covered by given instructions.

6. Death §72 — Evidence as to condition held not improper.

In an action for death, evidence that one of the children of deceased was going to school when his father was killed and afterwards went to work, and that deceased had supported his family by labor, was not improper as immaterial and calculated to arouse sympathy.

7. Appeal and error §1050(2)—Admission of immaterial evidence harmless.

In an action for death, admission of evidence that a child of decedent quit school on the death of his parent and went to work held not reversible, if error.

Error from District Court, Falls County:
Prentice Oltorf, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Virginia McGill, for herself and as next friend of her seven minor children, against the San Antonio & Aransas Pass Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Boyle, Ezell & Grover, of San Antonio, and Pat M. Neff and Walton D. Taylor, both of Waco, for plaintiff in error.

Nat. Llewellyn, of Marlin, for defendant in error.

BRADY, J. Mrs. Virginia McGill, for herself and as next friend of her seven minor children, brought this suit against San Antonio & Aransas Pass Railway Company for damages on account of the alleged negligent killing of their husband and father, J. D. McGill.

The case has been before this court before, the opinion on the former appeal being reported in 202 S. W. 338. The verdict and judgment on the former trial were for the plaintiffs for the sum of $10,000, and on this trial for $3,500, one-half to Mrs. McGill, and the remainder in equal proportions to the children.

The only issue submitted to the jury was discovered peril. The material facts are substantially the same as on the first trial, which are stated in the opinion of this court referred to above. Any additional or variant facts deemed material will be stated in the discussion of certain assignments relating to the sufficiency of the evidence.

Upon the former appeal the case was reversed and remanded, because of errors of law in the giving and refusing of certain charges. These errors seem to have been corrected on the present trial.

The first and second assignments of error raise the point that the court should have given a peremptory instruction for plaintiff in error, and that the verdict and judgment are not supported by even a scintilla of evidence showing or tending to show discovered peril. This same question was raised before, and this court held that the evidence was sufficient to raise the issue and for its submission to the jury. This conclusion is again challenged; and it is further claimed that the testimony is materially different on this trial. There is said to be a variance in the testimony of the witness Ben Springer as to the speed of the train, in that on the latter trial he stated that he would guess the train was running 12 or 15 miles an hour, but would not undertake to say that it was not running at least 18 miles an hour, and that he would not undertake to say in what distance the train could have been stopped. For the purposes of this appeal, the alleged variance in this witness' testimony will be assumed.

It is also asserted that on the former trial there was no evidence before this court as to any grass and weeds growing up against the ties at the point deceased was lying when he was struck and killed, whereas on the present trial it was shown by at least three witnesses, introduced by plaintiffs and living near the scene of the accident, that grass was growing thick at the point of the accident, some 6 inches high, right up against the end of the ties, and that between the rails the grass was flush with the top of the rails. It is further claimed that the overwhelming preponderance of the testimony shows that all along by the ends of the ties there were numerous patches of old weeds 10 and 12 inches high. From the record it seems that the testimony of these witnesses did not relate to the situation, as to grass and weeds, at the point of the accident, but rather to the conditions in the vicinity, and generally along the railroad track and right of way. However, if it be concluded that this testimony reflected the conditions at the scene of the accident, yet the testimony on this point is conflicting. The witnesses Geo. Ellison, a brother-in-law of deceased, and Ben Springer, who was an employé of plaintiff in error at the time and was on the train that struck Mr. McGill, is to the effect that at the place where McGill was killed the track was clear, slightly up grade, and that there were no grass, weeds, or anything on that side of the track, or no grass or weeds to amount to anything.

It is conceded by counsel for plaintiff in error that the liability of a railway company, under the rule of discovered peril, may be shown by circumstances as well as by direct or positive evidence, and also that positive evidence of the employés of the railway company in charge of the train may be overcome by circumstances, but in such case the circumstances must be reasonably clear and satisfactory, and no resort can be had to mere conjecture. Railway v. Porter, 73 Tex. 304, 11 S. W. 324; Railway v. McMillan, 100 Tex. 562, 102 S. W. 103.

It is true that the engineer testified that he did not see the object, which afterwards proved to be McGill's body, until the train was about 200 feet from the deceased, when he saw an object near the right-hand rail or east rail of the train, which was going north; that at the time he could not tell whether the object was living or inanimate, and had passed the object before he discovered it was a human being; that the rails were clear when he was 200 feet away from the object, and that when he saw the same he immediately sounded the whistle and rang the bell, but the object did not move; that when he had reached a point about 60 feet from the object he first realized that it was something he ought not to strike, and he then applied the emergency brake, cut off the steam, and did everything within his power to avert striking the object; that the train was then moving at about 18 to 20 miles an hour. This witness, however, also testified that he stopped the train, after shutting off the steam and applying the emergency, in about 200 feet, which in his opinion was a good stop, and that, if he had applied the brakes when he first saw the object, the train would not have killed McGill, but would have struck him lightly. At the time of the trial, he was still in the employ of plaintiff in error.

The fireman on the train testified that the train ran four or five car lengths, or about 160 feet, after the emergency brake was applied. It thus appears from the testimony of these witnesses that, if the engineer had cut off the steam and applied the emergency as soon as he saw the object on or near the track, the train would have been stopped in time to have averted the accident, or to have avoided killing McGill.

[1] It seems to be the rule, as announced in Railway Co. v. McMillan, supra, that if, when the trainmen discovered the object on the track, they, in the exercise of proper care, did not recognize it as a human being, it was not their duty to stop the train until they discovered that it was a man on the track. The question then is: Was there evidence before the jury to justify the inference that, notwithstanding the positive testimony of the engineer and fireman that they did not recognize the object as a human being, or something that should not be struck, until within 60 feet of it, or in passing it, they did, in fact, recognize that it was a human being when 200 feet away, and, in the exercise of ordinary care, should then have used the means at their command to avoid the injury. We have concluded that there was such evidence, which will be briefly indicated.

A retired expert engineer testified that on an engine on a straight track, with electrical headlight, one ought to be able to see an object on the track one-half a mile, but can see a man a shorter distance; that the bulk of a man sitting on the track, or an obstruction which ought not to be hit, could be seen for a half mile, and that one could tell at a distance of 300 or 400 yards that the object was a man, if it was lying in the middle of the track, or on the outside and close to the rail. His testimony was to the effect that an engineer could see such an object and realize it was a man at a distance of 300 or 400 yards as easily on the outside and close to the rail as if the body were on the inside, since it would be in plain view of the rays of the headlight, the same as if it were on the track. His testimony as to the distance in which the train could be stopped varies from that of the fireman and engineer, he having named the greater distance.

Now, in view of the testimony of the fireman that the train could have been and was stopped in a distance of about 160 feet, and of the engineer in a distance of 200 feet, and the testimony of the retired expert engineer that the object should have been recognized as a human body at a distance of 300 or 400 yards, we think it clear that it was for the jury to decide whether the trainmen saw McGill in a position of peril, and realized that the object was a man at a distance of 200 feet from it, notwithstanding their denial that they realized it was a human being at that distance, and whether, in the exercise of ordinary care, it was their duty at that very time to take the steps which afterwards proved would have averted the accident.

Plaintiff in error relies especially upon the following cases: Railway v. McMillan, supra; Caldwell v. Railway Co., 54 Tex. Civ. App. 399, 117 S. W. 490; and Railway v. Sallee, 56 Tex. Civ. App. 23, 120 S. W. 216—each of which is thought by us to be distinguishable on the facts.

In the McMillan Case it was pointed out by the Supreme Court that, after discovering the deceased, and recognizing that he was a human being, it was impossible to have stopped the train before he was struck, and also that the facts contradict any suggestion that, if the train had been checked, he would have gotten off the track. There does not appear to be any evidence whatever from which the jury might have concluded that the engineer or fireman recognized the object to be a man in time to have stopped the train, as we think appears in the instant case.

In the Caldwell Case it seems that the body was first discovered as an indistinguishable object on the track when the train was 300 feet from it, but was not discovered by the trainmen as the body of a human being until the train was within 75 or 80 feet from him. In that case the train ran 550 feet before it stopped after striking the deceased, and the evidence showed that the train could not have been stopped within less than 510 feet after applying the brakes and partially applying the reverse lever.

In the Sallee Case the issue of discovered peril was not submitted by the court; and there was no evidence tending to controvert that of the engineer and fireman to the effect that they used ordinary care in keeping a lookout to discover persons upon the track.

[2, 3] While the evidence is circumstantial, we think it was sufficient to make it an issue for the jury that the servants of plaintiff in error discovered deceased in a position of peril in time to have avoided the accident, after realizing that he was a man, and is likewise sufficient to support the verdict. Therefore the first and second assignments of error are overruled.

[4] The next assignment complains of the charge of the court "that the defendant railway company owed deceased no duty except to exercise ordinary care in the use of all means within its power, consistent with the safety of the train and the people thereon, to avoid injuring J. D. McGill, after his peril was discovered," because this placed a more onerous burden upon defendant than was required by law, in that it was required only to exercise ordinary care, and not required to use all of the means at its command. We think the charge is not open to this criticism, and that it embodies a correct rule of law. Railway v. McMillan, 100 Tex. at page 564, 102 S. W. 103.

On the former trial this same charge was given, except that it did not prescribe the standard of ordinary care in using all the means at the command of the operatives, but the charge was corrected to conform to the ruling of this court. We do not think that this charge can fairly be construed as instructing the jury that the railway company's employes were required to use all the means at their command, but that it merely informs the jury that it was their duty to use ordinary care to use all the means that the circumstances required to avoid injuring deceased. This we understand to be the law, and the assignment is overruled.

[5] It is sufficient reply to the next assignment, complaining of the refusal of the trial court to give special instruction No. 7 requested by defendant, that the law of the case was fairly given in the main charge and in special charges asked by defendant, and specially covered in special charge No. 12 requested by defendant the defense suggested in special instruction No. 7.

[6, 7] The remaining assignments of error relate to the admission, over defendant's objection, of certain testimony by which Fred McGill, one of the children of deceased, was permitted to state that at the time his father was killed he was going to school, and afterwards he stopped and went to work; and another witness was permitted to state that Mr. McGill had supported his family by his labor.

It is claimed that this testimony was immaterial and was prejudicial, in that it was reasonably calculated to arouse the sympathy of the jury and prejudice them against the defendant. The specific claim seems to be that this testimony was a persistent effort to parade the poverty of deceased or of his family before the jury, to enlist their sympathy.

We have examined the authorities cited in support of these assignments, and do not consider any of them in point. They each either involve testimony not relating to the true issues of the case or directly showing poverty.

One of the issues of this case was the pecuniary loss of Mrs. McGill and her minor children through the negligent killing of the husband and father. In the effort to show that McGill did not contribute much to the support of his family, because he was a drinking man, and that the children did most of the work, counsel for plaintiff in error had developed on cross-examination of Joe Haynes, a witness for plaintiff, that McGill was a tenant farmer on his place, and that at the time he was killed he had a hired hand, because his children were in school. It seems that the testimony here objected to was in line with the testimony elicited by the attorneys of the railroad company; and it is shown by the court's qualification to the bill of exception that he sustained the objection to part of this testimony, but had not time to stop the witness before the answer was made, and that no motion was made to exclude. We think the testimony was relevant and material to show that McGill was supporting and educating his family, and upon the issue of the value of his services to his family. In any event, we do not think the admission of this evidence presents reversible error.

Being of the opinion that no reversible error has been shown, the judgment is affirmed. Affirmed.

SOUTHERN TRACTION CO. v. KIRKSEY. (No. 5512.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin.
May 12, 1920.)

1. Railroads — 301—Travelers' rights defined.

Travelers on a public highway intersected by an electric railway do not have equal rights at the crossing with the railway company.

2. Railroads — 351(12)—Instruction on contributory negligence held improperly refused.

In an action for the death of one struck at a highway crossing by an electric car, refusal of an instruction that if deceased saw the car, or could have seen it, and yet permitted his automobile to come in contact with the car, there could be no recovery, was improper, though the request did not submit the issue of proximate cause; for if deceased was guilty of negligence it was the proximate cause.

3. Trial — 240—An instruction argumentative in form is properly refused.

An instruction argumentative in form is properly refused, though it contains a correct abstract principle of law.

4. Trial — 248 — Abstract instructions are properly refused.

Abstract instructions are properly refused.

5. Railroads — 317—Violation of statute or ordinance negligence per se.

The violation of a statute or ordinance regulating the speed of electric cars is negligence per se.

6. Railroads — 347(10)—Rate of speed evidence of negligence.

The rate of speed at which an interurban electric car approaches a public crossing may be considered on a question of negligence, even though there is no statute regulating such speed.

7. Witnesses — 350—Witness not compelled to answer on cross-examination whether he has been indicted for felony.

For purposes of impeachment a witness will not be required to answer on cross-examination whether he had been indicted for felony and so the admission of such evidence is erroneous.

8. Railroads — 347(11)—Evidence of intoxication of motorist held admissible.

In an action for the death of a motorist struck at a crossing, evidence that he was drunk at the time is admissible as tending to show negligence.

9. Negligence — 132(3)—Evidence of habit of intoxication held admissible.

Where it was asserted that a motorist struck at a crossing was negligent, evidence of his reputation that he was in the habit of getting drunk and driving an automobile at dangerous and rapid speed was admissible on the issue of negligence, although evidence of isolated instances would not be.

Appeal from District Court, Hill County; Horton B. Porter, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Pearl Kirksey against the Southern Traction Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Templeton, Beall & Williams, of Dallas, and Wear & Frazier, of Hillsboro, for appellant.

Scott & Ross and Shurtleff & Cummings, all of Waco, for appellee.

JENKINS, J. This cause was decided by this court November 24, 1915, with the result that the judgment of the district court, awarding damages to appellee on account of the death of her husband, alleged to have been killed by the negligence of appellant, was reversed and judgment was rendered for appellant. That decision was based upon our finding that the evidence showed that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. 181 S. W. 545. The case was taken to the Supreme Court (217 S. W. 139), and that court has decided that we were in error in so holding, but remanded the case to this court for decision as to other issues raised by appellant's assignments of error.

The decision of the Supreme Court above referred to disposes of a dozen or more of appellant's 64 assignments of error. We will not discuss in detail the remaining assignments of error, but, having reached the conclusion that the judgment of the trial court should be reversed, we will refer specifically to those assignments which we deem necessary to assist the trial court upon another trial hereof.

[1] Appellant assigns error upon the following paragraph of the court's charge:

"You are charged that people traveling along and over public highway, whether in automobile or otherwise, at points of intersection of such highway by lines of electric railways, have equal rights at such points of intersection in the crossing thereof with the railway company."

We sustain this assignment. Our views with reference to a similar charge were fully set forth in Baker v. Collins, 199 S. W. 519, and need not here be repeated. For other authorities sustaining our views in the case above cited see Traction Co. v. Kelleher, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 421, 107 S. W. 68; Railway Co. v. Harrison, 163 S. W. 332; Railway Co. v. Garcia, 75 Tex. 583, 13 S. W. 223.

[2] We sustain appellant's forty-first assignment of error as to the refusal of the court to give the following requested charge:

"You are instructed that if you should believe from the evidence that the deceased was, just before and at the time of the accident, causing his automobile to run along the public highway as it approached the crossing in question at a rapid rate of speed, and that he saw the defendant's car as it ran along defendant's line of railway before it reached said crossing, or if you believe from the evidence that by the exercise of reasonable care and caution he could have seen said car, and that he permitted his automobile to come in contact with defendant's car at a time and under conditions that would constitute negligence on the part of deceased, as that term is defined in the main charge, you will return a verdict in favor of the defendant, even though you may believe that the defendant was guilty of negligence." Railway Co. v. Kauffmann, 46 Tex. Civ. App. 72, 101 S. W. 817; Railway Co. v. Kutac, 72 Tex. 651, 11 S. W. 127; Railway Co. v. Bracken, 69 Tex. 74.

The cases above cited announce the doctrine that the failure of one about to enter upon a railroad track to look and listen is negligence as a matter of law. It may now be regarded as the settled law of this state that such failure will not of itself amount to negligence as a matter of law, but if the jury should find that such failure was negligence on the part of the person injured, and that such negligence was a proximate cause of the injury, there will be no right of recovery, and the jury should be so instructed. It is true that requested charge did not submit the issue of proximate cause, but, under the undisputed evidence, if the deceased was guilty of negligence in driving his automobile against appellant's car, there could be no question but that such negligence was a proximate cause of his death.

[3] Appellant assigns error upon the court's giving special charge No. 1, requested by appellee. The charge is correct as a principle of law, but it should not have been given for the reason that it is argumentative in form. This observation applies to a number of charges requested by appellant and refused by the court.

[4] The first part of special charge No. 8, requested by the appellant, is an abstract statement, and should not be given; but upon another trial the court should instruct the jury substantially as set forth in the following part of said requested charge, namely:

"If, therefore, you believe from the evidence that any of those operating the defendant's car at the time of the accident saw the deceased riding in his automobile on the public highway and approaching defendant's line of railway where it crossed said public highway at a time and under the conditions when there was no obstruction between the deceased and defendant's said car, and if you further believe that those in charge of the defendant's said car, acting as a reasonably prudent man would have acted under the same circumstances, had reason to believe that the deceased saw defendant's car as it ran along said line of railway and approaching and near to said crossing, those in charge of defendant's said car would in such an event have had a right to presume that the deceased would check his car and not run the same in contact with defendant's car upon said crossing."

Of course, this would not apply after appellant had discovered the peril of deceased, if it had done so; but discovered peril was not an issue in this case.

[5, 6] Appellant complains of the charge of the court in submitting the issue as to the rate of speed at which it was operating its car in approaching the crossing where the deceased was killed; the argument being that this was error, for the reason that there is no statute regulating the rate of speed at which an interurban car may be run outside of a town or city. It is true that there is no such statute. If there was, a violation of the same would be negligence per se. But it is nevertheless true that the rate of speed with which a car approaches a public crossing is a circumstance which may be taken into consideration on the issue of negligence. The same is true also as to failure to blow a whistle, ring a bell, sound a gong, or to give other warning of approach to such crossing.

[7] Upon the trial of this cause, J. W.

Morrison testified to facts which tended to show that the deceased was drunk at the time he ran his automobile against the inter-urban car. This was material testimony, and if believed by the jury may have properly influenced them in determining the issue of contributory negligence on the part of deceased. It does not follow that because a man was drunk he was reckless or negligent in the manner in which he drove his automobile, but such fact may be considered by a jury in determining the issue of negligence.

This witness was compelled, over appellant's objection, to answer upon his cross-examination whether he had within the last five years been charged with a felony, and in answer to such question he stated that he had within that time been indicted for a felony, to wit, an assault with intent to rape. This testimony was admitted for the purpose of impeaching this witness Morrison. There is a conflict upon this point between the decisions of the Court of Criminal Appeals in this state and of our Supreme Court; the former holding that such testimony is admissible; the latter that it is not. Railway Co. v. Oreason, 101 Tex. 837, 107 S. W. 527; Railway Co. v. Johnson, 83 Tex. 633, 19 S. W. 151; Hill v. Dons, 37 S. W. 639; Railway Co. v. De Bond, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 691, 53 S. W. 593; Boon v. Weathered, 23 Tex. 678; Kennedy v. Upshaw, 66 Tex. 452, 1 S. W. 412. The admission of the impeaching testimony above referred to constituted reversible error.

[8, 9] Appellant offered to prove by several witnesses that the general reputation of the deceased was that he was in the habit of getting drunk and driving an automobile at a rapid and dangerous speed, in disregard of his own safety and the safety of others. This testimony the court refused to permit to be given to the jury, upon the ground that such testimony would not tend to establish the fact that the deceased was driving recklessly, and not in the exercise of ordinary care, at the time he was killed. It would have been permissible for appellant to prove, if it could, that the deceased was drunk at the time he drove his automobile against appellant's car, for the reason that this fact would tend to show negligence on the part of the deceased. It would tend to prove such fact, for the reason that intoxication tends to lessen and sometimes to destroy the powers of observation and the element of caution. As said by Scotland's bard:

"Inspiring bold John Barleycorn,
What dangers thou canst make us scorn!"

The fact of intoxication being relative, any fact which would legitimately tend to establish such fact was also relative. We think the fact that a person was in the habit of getting drunk, and while in such condition driving recklessly upon public highways, roads, and street crossings, would be a matter for the proper consideration of a jury as to whether or not he was intoxicated at the time of his injury, and we think that his habit in this regard could be proven by general reputation. We do not think it would be permissible to prove particular or isolated instances as to his reckless driving while drunk.

We hold that for the reasons stated this cause should be reversed and remanded for a new trial in accordance with this opinion; and it is so ordered.

Reversed and remanded.

HOYT v. ROSS et al. (No. 56.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 5, 1920.)

1. Action \S 50(5)—Maker of note and one promising maker to pay it cannot be jointly sued.

The maker of a note and the indorser thereof without recourse, who subsequently promised the maker to pay the note, are not jointly liable on the note, and causes of action against them are inconsistent, and cannot be joined, since the holder cannot ratify the agreement for payment by the indorser without releasing the maker.

2. Venue \S 22(1)—Defendant can be served in another county only if jointly liable with resident of that county.

To obtain service on a defendant in a county other than that in which a suit is brought under Kirby's Dig. § 6072, service must be obtained in the county where the suit is brought on a codefendant jointly liable with the nonresident defendant, and it should appear from the face of the complaint that plaintiff was entitled to recover a judgment against all of the defendants under Kirby's Dig. § 6074.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County; G. W. Hendricks, Judge.

Suit by W. T. Hoyt against E. B. Ross and others. From a judgment dismissing the suit against defendant Ross, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Poe, Gannaway & Poe, of Little Rock, for appellant.

Carmichael & Brooks, of Little Rock, for appellees.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellant instituted suit against appellees in the Third division of the Pulaski circuit court, to recover $250 and interest. It was alleged in the complaint that E. B. and J. B. Ross, husband and wife, executed a series of notes, including the $250 note sued on, to the Ollar-Overland Company, to cover the unpaid purchase price of a certain automobile; that the notes contained a provision that upon failure to pay any one of them, or the interest thereon, all should become due; that they also contained a provision retaining the title to the automobile in the Ollar-Overland Company until the notes were paid; that, before the maturity of the $250 note aforesaid, the Ollar-Overland Company for a consideration transferred said note to appellant, without recourse; that, before the maturity of the note in question, without the consent or knowledge of appellant, the Rosses returned the automobile to the Ollar-Overland Company in payment of the balance due on the purchase price, under agreement that it would pay the $250 note and accrued interest, which it had theretofore assigned to appellant.

The Ollar-Overland Company was, and is, a corporation domiciled in Pulaski county. E. B. Ross and J. B. Ross were, and are, residents of Lonoke county. A judgment was sought against all of them, based upon personal service had on the Ollar-Overland Company in Pulaski county and the Rosses in Lonoke county, under section 6072 of Kirby's Digest, which provides that—

"Every other action may be brought in any county in which the defendant, or one of several defendants, resides, or is summoned."

The Rosses appeared specially, and filed a motion to quash the service upon them, for the reason that they were not jointly liable with the Ollar-Overland Company on the obligation sued upon. The court sustained the motion to quash the service, and dismissed the action against them, from which judgment of dismissal an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court.

[1,2] Appellant insists that the court erred in holding that appellees were not jointly indebted to appellant in the sum of $250 and interest thereon. Appellant contends that E. B. Ross and J. B. Ross are indebted to him in the sum of $250 by virtue of a promissory note signed by them to the Ollar-Overland Company, and by it indorsed to him, without recourse, before maturity, for a valuable consideration, and that the Ollar-Overland Company is indebted to him for the same amount, because it agreed with the Rosses for a consideration to pay the note to him. Under the allegations of the complaint, two wholly inconsistent causes of action are pleaded. On the one hand, the note, signed by the Rosses and indorsed, without recourse, by the Ollar-Overland Company, is made a basis of the action. The indorsement without recourse clearly exempts the Ollar-Overland Company from joint liability with the Rosses on the note. On the other hand, the contract made by the Ollar-Overland Company with the Rosses, for a new consideration, to pay the note to appellant, is also made a basis of the action. The effect of this agreement, if ratified by appellant, was to release the Rosses as makers and accept in their stead the Ollar-Overland Company. Appellant could not ratify the contract in part and reject it in part. It was made for his benefit, and an acceptance in part amounted to a ratification in toto. There was no joint liability on either cause of action, and the causes of action, being inconsistent, were improperly joined. In order to obtain service upon a defendant, or defendants, in a county other than the county in which a suit is brought, service must be obtained on a codefendant jointly liable with him, or them, in the county where the suit is brought. It should appear from the face of the complaint that the plaintiff was entitled to recover a judgment against all the defendants. Section 6074, Kirby's Digest; Stiewel v. Borman, 63 Ark. 30, 37 S. W. 404. No joint liability appearing on the face of the complaint in the instant case, the judgment is affirmed.

FORREST CITY BOX CO. v. LATHAM.
(No. 53.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 928(2) — Instructions not abstracted presumed correct.

Where the instructions are not abstracted, it will be conclusively presumed that the jury was correctly instructed on the questions of law in the case.

2. Logs and logging \S 8(5)—As to possible profit on logging contract, testimony of one who carried out the contract that he lost money on it was admissible.

In action against a box company for breach of plaintiff's contract to cut and deliver logs, which contract the defendant gave to another at the same price per thousand, where plaintiff offered testimony tending to show profits he would have made if allowed to perform the contract, it was error to exclude testimony of the person who took the contract that he lost money in carrying it out, although himself experienced and using approved methods; such testimony being competent to show that no profit could be made out of the contract.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Union County;
C. W. Smith, Judge.

Action by C. R. Latham against the Forrest City Box Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. E. Patterson, of El Dorado, for appellant.

SMITH, J. Appellee recovered judgment for damages on account of an alleged breach of a contract which he claims to have had with appellant company to cut and deliver certain logs. The existence of the contract was denied, but on appellee's behalf one Reynolds testified that he had been engaged in logging for appellant for two years, when Mr. Girard, the superintendent of appellant, asked him to include in his contract the logs which form the subject-matter of this litigation. Reynolds was unable to do so, but promised Girard that he would find him a man who would take the contract. Reynolds testified that he was authorized to offer $4 per thousand for cutting and floating out the logs, and pursuant to this authorization he employed appellee to do the work.

On appellant's behalf it was denied that Girard made any such contract, or that he had the authority to do so, and it is contended by appellant that the logs in question were included in Reynolds' contract. Girard knew appellee was at work, but supposed he was employed by Reynolds. On appellee's behalf the testimony tends to show that Girard had the authority to make the contract, or to authorize Reynolds to do so, and that he knew the contract had been made, and that appellee was engaged in its execution.

According to appellant, Reynolds abandoned his contract, and it became necessary for appellant to employ another party to get out the logs, and that this contract was given to one Bunn Robinson at $4 per thousand.

[1] The instructions are not abstracted, and it will therefore be conclusively presumed that the jury was correctly instructed on the questions of law in the case, including the circumstances and conditions under which Girard could bind appellant, and, without discussing the various discrepancies pointed out in the testimony, it may be said that, if the testimony offered on appellee's behalf is accepted as true, it is legally sufficient to support a finding that Girard had the authority to make the contract for the company, or, rather, that it was within the apparent scope of his authority to do so.

[2] Appellee offered testimony tending to show the profit he could and would have made under the contract if he had been allowed to perform it. Bearing upon this question of profit, Bunn Robinson testified that he took the contract to float and raft the logs in question for $4 per thousand, and that he had experienced men working for him, that in floating the logs he used the methods ordinarily employed by himself and other experienced men, but that in rafting the logs he used chain dogs, instead of pins, as that method was less expensive, took less time and was easier done.

After stating that he had logged and rafted with his father, who was an experienced rafting and logging man, Robinson was asked this question:

"Under this contract or arrangement you had for taking out these logs at $4 per thousand, delivered, managed in the way your father had managed and others with whom you had had experience, what was the cost in this instance of delivering the logs from the brake to the mill more than $4?"

Objection to this question was made on the ground that "that is not the criterion." This objection was sustained, whereupon counsel for appellant offered "to show by this witness that he took the contract from defendant to float and raft the logs in controversy from the brake to the mill at $4 per thousand, and did in the usual way float and raft the logs to the mill, and that the cost of so doing exceeded $4 per thousand, and that witness lost money on the operation." The court declined this testimony offered, and exceptions were saved to that ruling.

We think the offered testimony should have been admitted. It was competent to show that no profit could be made out of the contract, and that was the purport of the excluded testimony. The witness proposed to testify about the identical logs which form the subject-matter of this litigation, and that, notwithstanding the fact that he was an experienced logger, and employed approved methods, he sustained an actual loss, although he was paid the price claimed by appellee.

It is finally insisted that the verdict is excessive; but, as the judgment is to be reversed on another ground, we do not pass upon that question.

For the error indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause will be remanded for a new trial.

McCONNELL v. SEBASTIAN COUNTY,
GREENWOOD DIST. (No. 44.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

Taxation — 74—Notes held nontaxable as rent notes.

An instrument, whereby landowner leased land for specified period under agreement requiring him to execute warranty deed to lessee upon lessee's payment of stipulated rental during all of such period, held a lease, with option to lessee to purchase by continuing the payments for the full term, and not a contract for sale; the notes executed to the owner pursuant thereto being rental notes, and not purchase-money notes, and being therefore nontaxable under Kirby's Dig. § 6902.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sebastian County; John Brizzolara, Judge.

Petition by J. A. McConnell against Sebastian County, Greenwood District. From an adverse judgment, petitioner appeals. Reversed and remanded.

A. M. Dobbs, of Hartford, for appellant.

McCULLOCH, C. J. Appellant began this proceeding in the county court by filing a petition praying for a correction of his personal assessment made by the township board of assessors. The assessment list, of which appellant complains, includes certain promissory notes executed to appellant by J. S. Woods and wife, and the assessors listed the property for taxation on the theory that the notes were executed for the purchase price of the real estate. The contention of appellant is that they were immature rent notes, and not subject to taxation for the year in which the assessors listed them. Appellant owned certain lots in the town of Hartford, and he entered into a written obligation with Woods and wife, as follows:

"Know all men by these presents: This indenture, made and entered into by and between Joseph A. McConnell and Rachel S. McConnell, his wife, hereinafter called lessors, and J. S. Woods and Sarah E. Woods, husband and wife, hereinafter called lessees, all of Hartford, Arkansas, this 10th day of October, 1918, which terms, lessors and lessees shall be taken to mean heirs, executors, and administrators, wherein the context will admit, witnesseth:

"That for and in consideration of the mutual agreements, conditions and covenants, hereinafter set out, the lessors hereby leases, lets and demises to the lessees for a period of seven years, beginning on the 1st day of October, 1918, all the following described lands lying in the Greenwood district of Sebastian county, state of Arkansas, to wit: Lots seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven and twelve in block thirteen original town of Hartford. To have and to hold to the said lessees for the period of this lease together with all privileges, improvements and appurtenances thereunto belonging, except the barn now located thereon which lessor may remove.

"The said lessees covenant with the said lessors that they shall cause to be paid the lessors the sum of twenty-five dollars per month for the period of this lease, commencing payment on the first day of each month after this lease date and promptly pay the said sum when due; that the said lessees shall keep said place in repair and pay all taxes of whatsoever kind that may be assessed by state, county or city and improvement taxes of all descriptions which may become due and shall keep said premises insured against loss by fire in some reputable insurance company for the full period of the lease in such sum as may be deemed within the amount allowed by law and the value of the property, and shall further commit no waste nor sublet nor assign this lease without written consent of the lessors.

"The lessors hereby covenant with the lessees that they shall have quiet enjoyment of the said premises for the period of said lease upon prompt performance of the covenants and agreements made by them and the said lessors further agree and bind themselves as a part of the consideration of this contract that if the said lessees shall well and truly perform their covenants, agreements and promises herein contained for the full period of this lease, that at the expiration thereof the said lessors shall cause a good and sufficient warranty deed to be executed to the said lessees, clear and free from all incumbrances and warranting and defending to the said lessees the title in fee to the aforesaid premises."

The question in the case is whether or not the notes executed pursuant to the above contract were rent notes or purchase-money notes, for if of the former character they were not taxable according to the terms of the statute, which provides that a person shall not be required to list for taxation any obligation for the payment of rent, except that portion which has "accrued on the lease and shall remain due and unpaid at the time of listing." Kirby's Digest, § 6902. We are of the opinion that the proper interpretation of the contract is that it constitutes a lease with an option to purchase by continuing the payments for the full term. The parties had the right to make either a lease contract or a contract for sale and they elected to put it in the form of a lease, so that the relation of landlord and tenant should subsist until the final payment when under the contract itself that relation should be changed into that of vendor and purchaser. Ish v. Morgan, 48 Ark. 418, 3 S. W. 440. The lawmakers, in the enactment of the statute referred to above, undertook to classify the property which should be subject to taxation, and drew the line between immature rent notes and other obligations. Since the parties themselves in making the contract elected to create the relation of landlord and tenant, so that the notes executed pursuant thereto constituted rent notes, the state is bound by that election, and cannot exact the payment of taxes, which would amount to a change in the nature of the obligation created by the parties themselves.

The circuit court was not correct in its decision upholding the assessment, and the judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

ROYAL NEIGHBORS OF AMERICA v. McCULLAR et al. (No. 52.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Insurance §825(2)—Payment of premium for jury.

In action on benefit certificate, held, on the evidence, that whether the certificate had been invalidated by failure to pay a premium was for the jury.

2. Evidence §130—That husband sent home money for insurance dues no evidence of their payment, being res inter alios acta.

In action on benefit certificate, defended on the ground of forfeiture for nonpayment of a premium, it was error to admit, for the purpose of showing that the attention of the insured was "called to the importance of paying the dues, so that it could not be urged that she had forgotten to do so, and to show that she had the money with which to make the payment," her husband's testimony that, being in the army at the time of the alleged nonpayment he sent insured $50 and insisted on her paying her lodge dues up for the remainder of the year; the maxim "Res inter alios acta alteri nocere non debet" applying.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Craighead County; R. H. Dudley, Judge.

Suit by Elmo McCullar and others against the Royal Neighbors of America. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Hawthorne & Hawthorne, of Jonesboro, and Benjamin D. Smith, of Mankato, Minn., for appellant.

Lamb & Frierson, of Jonesboro, for appellees.

SMITH, J. This suit was brought to recover the sum named in the benefit certificate issued by appellant company on the life of Mrs. Nora McCullar, who died October 27, 1918. The certificate was payable to her infant children, and this suit was brought by appellee as next friend to collect the insurance. The premiums or assessments were payable monthly, and the constitution and by-laws of appellant provided that the failure to pay any one of these assessments would invalidate the certificate, and the defense interposed to the suit is that Mrs. McCullar failed to pay the premium falling due in September, 1918. There was a verdict and judgment for the face of the certificate, and this appeal is from that judgment.

[1] It is first insisted by appellant that there is no competent testimony that the premium was paid, and that a verdict should therefore have been directed in its favor. We think, however, there was sufficient testimony to take the case to the jury upon that issue, and the testimony tending to support the verdict may be summarized as follows:

John McCullar testified that he was the grandfather of the beneficiaries named in the certificate, and that his son's wife (the insured) and his nephew's wife were both named Nora, and that they both lived near Jonesboro, and that the mail of each woman was frequently delivered to the other, and that on September 7, 1918, he received a letter from his niece inclosing a receipt for dues paid appellant by his daughter-in-law, and that he gave this receipt to Orlin Turner, a son-in-law, with the request that he mail it on the following Monday morning to Mrs. Nora McCullar, the insured. His daughter, Mrs. Turner, remembered the incident and testified that the receipt was for two dollars and some odd cents, and was dated in September. J. W. Nelms, a disinterested witness, testified that he was present when the conversation between John McCullar and Turner occurred, and that he saw the receipt at the time, and remembers that it was dated in September. Mrs. Alice Riggs testified that a lodge of the appellant company once existed at Lake City, but no meetings had been held since 1915, and that she was the recorder at Lake City, and that the assessments were payable to her. These assessments were payable from the 20th of one month to the 15th of the next. Mrs. Riggs' testimony makes it very apparent that she was not expert nor experienced in keeping accounts, and she testified that she did not always mail out the receipts the day she received the money, as she was frequently too busy to do so. The testimony also shows that at about the time in question Mrs. Riggs had a spell of sickness herself, and that a member of her family became sick and died. Payments to Mrs. Riggs were made by check, by cash, and sometimes by money order, and she kept these payments at her home until she went to town, when she remitted them to appellant. The receipts for admitted payments made to Mrs. Riggs which were produced at the trial were not signed by her.

A receipt dated September 18th was produced; but this was for August. Mrs. Riggs' testimony in regard to this receipt shows that her accounts were not accurately kept. She testified that she had advanced the money covered by that receipt, and that it was not repaid to her until after Mrs. McCullar's death, and that the last payment made by Mrs. McCullar was $2.50, at a time when she only owed $2.35, and that this left 15 cents in her hands, which she had forgotten about. Each assessment had a separate number, and it is insisted that the receipt about which John McCullar, Turner and his wife and Nelms testified was a receipt dated September 17th. But this cannot be true, as that receipt covered assessment No. 8, and was for only 50 cents, and was not actually issued until November or December, when Mrs. Riggs met W. H. McCullar, the husband of the insured, and told him that she had previously paid and remitted that assessment for his wife. The officers of appellant testified that no remittance had been made covering the disputed assessment.

From this testimony the jury might have found that the receipt which had been misdirected to the niece of John McCullar covered the assessment in question. Indeed, if there was such a receipt it could have covered no other assessment.

[2] We would therefore affirm the judgment as being supported by testimony legally sufficient for that purpose but for the fact that certain incompetent testimony was admitted which may have influenced the jury in arriving at the verdict which was returned. W. H. McCullar, the husband of the insured, was permitted to testify that he was in the army from April 27, 1918, to January 12, 1919, and that he was not at home when his wife died; but that in August, 1918, he sent her $50 and insisted on her paying her lodge dues up for the remainder of the year. An objection was overruled to the question which elicited this testimony, and in making that ruling the court stated:

"That would be no evidence, gentlemen of the jury, that the wife paid the dues, however."

But this is the inference to be drawn from that testimony, and the court's ruling is defended upon the ground that the letter was merely offered to show that the attention of Mrs. McCullar was called to the importance of paying the dues, so that it could not be urged that she had forgotten to do so, and to show that she had the money with which to make the payment. The maxim "Res inter alios acta alteri nocere non debet" excludes this testimony.

"Of maxims relating to the law of evidence, the above (Res inter alios acta alteri nocere non debet) may be considered as one of the most important and most useful; its effect is to prevent a litigant party from being concluded or even affected, by the acts, conduct, or declarations of strangers. On the principle of good faith and mutual convenience, a man's own acts are binding upon himself, and are, as well as his conduct and declarations, evidence against him; yet it would not only be highly inconvenient, but also manifestly unjust, that a man should be bound by the acts of mere unauthorized strangers; and if a party ought not to be bound by the acts of strangers, so neither ought their acts or conduct be used as evidence against him." Brooms' Legal Maxims (8th Ed.) 748.

This maxim was applied in the case of Hamburg Bank v. George, 92 Ark. 472, 123 S. W. 654, in which it was held incompetent to corroborate a witness in this manner. See, also, Fechheimer-Kiefer Co. v. Kempner, 116 Ark. 482, 486, 173 S. W. 179; Carter v. Younger, 123 Ark. 266, 267, 272, 185 S. W. 435; Donaghey v. Williams, 123 Ark. 411, 425, 426, 185 S. W. 778; Raymond v. Raymond, 134 Ark. 484, 490, 204 S. W. 311.

For the error in admitting the incompetent testimony, the judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

FLETCHER v. SIMPSON et al. (No. 50.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §893(2)—Case in equity on appeal is heard de novo.

A case in equity is heard de novo by the appellate court on the record made below.

2. Appeal and error §522(1)—Mode of incorporating oral evidence in the record stated.

Under Arkansas practice, oral evidence introduced in chancery cases may be made a part of the record by having it taken down in writing in open court and by leave filed with the papers in the case, by bill of exceptions, or by reducing the testimony to writing and embodying it as a recital in the record of the decree.

3. Appeal and error §635(3)—Decree will be affirmed on appeal where transcript does not contain all the evidence.

Where decree recited that it was heard upon the pleadings and exhibits thereto and upon certain depositions and "upon the exhibits to the depositions of said witnesses filed with their testimony and upon oral explanation by the witnesses * * * to the court of certain of the exhibits," but none of the exhibits referred to in the depositions appeared in the transcript, the decree would be affirmed; for, all the evidence upon which the decree was rendered not having been brought into the record, the Supreme Court could not properly review the evidence to ascertain whether it supported the decree.

Appeal from Ashley Chancery Court; B. G. Hammock, Chancellor.

Suit by C. M. Simpson and others against R. M. Fletcher. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Appellees brought this suit in equity against appellant to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of certain land and personal property by C. M. Simpson to R. M. Fletcher. The complaint alleges that appellant is insolvent, and that the property is being neglected and deteriorating in value. The prayer of the complaint is that, if the appellant is unable to perform his contract by reason of his insolvency, the land and personal property be sold and the proceeds be applied to the payment of the purchase price, and that appellees have judgment for the residue against appellant.

Appellant filed an answer and cross-complaint, in which he alleged that he was induced to enter into the contract by reason of the false representations of C. M. Simpson; that Simpson represented the farm purchased to contain more cleared land than it had; that he represented that part of the land was across the bayou, and that it was similar in character to the main body of the land, which had been viewed by appellant; that appellant was induced thereby not to go on the land across the bayou and examine it; that the land across the bayou comprised 140 acres, and was practically worthless; that there was a large deficiency in the amount, kind, and value of the personal property sold.

The prayer of the cross-complaint is that appellee be required to deliver to appellant all the property sold to him, and that, in the event delivery cannot be made, appellant be given credit for the value of all property not delivered.

On the 28th day of September, 1918, Claude M. Simpson and R. M. Fletcher entered into a written contract for the conveyance of 1,280 acres of land near the town of Morrell, in Ashley county, Ark., and all the personal property on said place, consisting of mules, cattle, wagons, farming tools and machinery, stock of merchandise, and all the feed and grain on hand. W. J. Simpson, brother of C. M. Simpson, was in charge of the place as his agent. Fletcher was not able to make the initial payment at the time the contract was executed, and W. J. Simpson continued in charge of the place, and gathered and sold the greater part of the crop before R. M. Fletcher entered into possession of the place. By the terms of the contract a cash payment was to be made, and the balance of the purchase money was on deferred payments. Later on in the fall R. M. Fletcher took possession of the place through his agent, A. G. Russell.

Appellees introduced testimony tending to show that R. M. Fletcher did not comply with the contract on his part in meeting the deferred payments for the purchase money; that Fletcher was insolvent, and was allowing the personal property on the place to greatly deteriorate in value.

On the other hand, Fletcher introduced testimony tending to show that there was a material deficiency in the quantity of cleared land on the farm as represented to him by Simpson to induce him to make the contract, in addition, that 140 acres of the land was situated across a bayou, and that Simpson represented to him that it was of the same kind and character of land as that shown to Fletcher and examined by him; that the 140 acres of land turned out to be situated some distance from the bayou; that it was in the edge of the hills, and was practically valueless; that Simpson gave him a list of the quantity, kind, and value of the personal property on the farm; that the list of such property so shown to Fletcher was greatly in excess of the quantity and value of the personal property on the place, and actually turned over to Fletcher. Evidence was also introduced by appellees tending to show that no false representations were made by Simpson, nor fraud perpetrated by him to induce Fletcher to make the contract.

The chancellor found the issues in favor of appellees, and a decree was entered accordingly. The decree, after reciting that the cause was heard upon the pleadings and exhibits thereto, continues as follows:

"And upon the depositions of W. J. Simpson, Robert Raines, W. E. Waddell, Fred A. Snodgrass, C. M. Simpson, C. L. Willis, A. G. Russell, Walter Edwards, and R. M. Fletcher, and upon the exhibits to the depositions of said witnesses filed with their testimony and upon oral explanation by the witnesses A. G. Russell and R. M. Fletcher and C. M. Simpson to the court of certain of the exhibits filed, and upon the oral argument of counsel for the respective parties, and upon written briefs filed by counsel for the respective parties, and the court, being well and fully advised in the premises, doth find."

To reverse that decree appellant has prosecuted this appeal.

Mehaffy, Donham & Mehaffy, of Little Rock, for appellant.

Williamson & Williamson, of Monticello, for appellees.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] Appellees move the court to affirm the decree for the reason that the transcript does not contain all of the evidence in the case upon which the decree of the chancery court was based.

A case in equity is heard de novo by the appellate court on the record made below. Under our practice oral evidence introduced in chancery cases may be made a part of the record by having it taken down in writing in open court and by leave filed with the papers in the case, by bill of exceptions, or by reducing the testimony to writing and embodying it as a recital in the record of the decree. Casteel v. Casteel, 38 Ark. 477; Benjamin v. Birmingham, 50 Ark. 433, 8 S. W. 183; Jones v. Mitchell, 83 Ark. 77, 102 S. W. 710; Beecher v. Beecher, 83 Ark. 424, 104 S. W. 156; Rowe v. Allison, 87 Ark. 206, 112 S. W. 895; Bradley Lumber Co. v. Hamilton, 109 Ark. 1, 159 S. W. 35; Phillips v. Jokische, 117 Ark. 221, 174 S. W. 520; Weaver-Dowdy Co. v. Brewer, 129 Ark. 193, 195 S. W. 367, and cases cited; Alston v. Zion, 136 Ark. 376, 206 S. W. 673.

As shown by the statement of facts, the decree recites, among other things, that it was heard upon the depositions of W. J. Simpson, Robert Raines, W. E. Waddell, Fred A. Snodgrass, C. M. Simpson, C. L. Willis, A. G. Russell, Walter Edwards, and R. M. Fletcher, and upon the exhibits to the deposition of said witnesses filed with their testimony and upon oral explanation by the witnesses A. G. Russell, R. M. Fletcher, and C. M. Simpson to the court of certain of the exhibits filed.

As will appear from the cases above cited, as well as numerous other decisions of the court, where it is shown on the record that witnesses were examined in open court, this court cannot say how much the opinion of the chancery court was influenced, and ought to have been influenced, by their testimony. Therefore a conclusive presumption in favor of the decree must prevail if the evidence sustains the decree, so far as it is possible for a decree based on the complaint to be sustained by the evidence. In the case at bar the decree is within the issues made by the complaint and the answer and cross-complaint. It is therefore responsive to the issues.

It appears from the record that on August 20, 1919, the court ordered the stenographer to file the depositions taken at Little Rock with the exhibits thereto. None of the exhibits referred to in these depositions appear in the transcript.

W. J. Simpson, a brother of C. M. Simpson, was in charge of the place when Fletcher examined it with a view of purchasing it. He showed Fletcher all the real and personal property on the place except the cotton. He continued in charge of the place for several months after the contract of sale was executed. He had a sales book of the cotton grown on the place, which was gathered and sold by him after the contract of purchase was executed. He agreed to file as an exhibit to his deposition a statement of the sale price of all the cotton and cotton seed sold by him, together with the expense account against the same.

C. L. Willis was the real estate agent who made the sale, and he said that he would file as an exhibit to his deposition a list of all the personal property which was to be embraced in the contract of sale, together with the value thereof. Other exhibits were also to be attached to the depositions. As above stated, none of them appear in the transcript. It will be readily seen that their contents might be very important to a proper determination of the issues. The decree shows at least inferentially that these exhibits were before the chancellor. We refer to that part of the decree which recites that the case was heard upon oral explanation by the witnesses A. G. Russell, R. M. Fletcher, and C. M. Simpson to the court of certain of the exhibits filed.

The record of the decree does not recite which of these exhibits were explained by the witnesses. It will be remembered that C. M. Simpson sold the farm of R. M. Fletcher. A. G. Russell was the agent of R. M. Fletcher, and took charge of the place within a few months after the contract was executed. The record does not disclose which of these exhibits the court desired to be explained by the witnesses, nor what explanation of them was made by the witnesses. This court cannot know what effect this omitted testimony had or ought to have had upon the chancellor. What was there said by the witnesses might have had, and should have had, a material bearing upon the decision of the chancellor. These witnesses had already testified in the case. Two of them were the principal parties to the suit, and it can be readily seen how their explanation of the exhibits might have caused the chancellor to find the issues in favor of appellees. The exhibits and the explanation of them might have had a very important bearing upon the determination of the issues of fraud and false representations alleged to have been made by C. M. Simpson to R. M. Fletcher.

Since all the evidence upon which the decree was rendered has not been brought into the record and is not now before us, we cannot properly review the evidence for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the same supports the decree. Therefore the decree must be affirmed.

LILLY v. BARRON. (No. 43.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 347(2)—Time for appeal does not run from finding without judgment.

Where the court made a finding that plaintiff was entitled to judgment, and that one defendant, on payment thereof, should be entitled to judgment over against the other defendant, but did not render judgment thereon, limitations for an appeal from a judgment subsequently rendered run only from the judgment; such finding not constituting a judgment.

2. Bankruptcy \S 423(2)—Claim for converting note held barred by discharge.

Where the vendor, upon the purchaser's conveyance of land to a third person, who assumed the purchaser's liability to the vendor, required third person to execute a note in lieu of purchaser's note, claimed to have been lost, as a condition to execution of deed of release, and thereafter transferred the note claimed to have been lost to an innocent purchaser, the third person's claim against the vendor was a provable debt under the Bankruptcy Act, not being a contingent claim, and the liability not having accrued by reason of fraud, and therefore was released by the bankrupt's discharge.

3. Fraud \S 12—Actionable misrepresentations defined.

As a general rule, actionable false representations must be relative to existing facts; and if a promise is accompanied with an intention not to perform it, and is made for the purpose of deceiving the person to whom it was made, and inducing him to act, it constitutes fraud.

Appeal from Mississippi Chancery Court; Archer Wheatley, Chancellor.

Action by Mrs. S. B. Driver against C. B. Rodgers, and others. From a judgment for defendant J. W. Barron against defendant O. R. Lilly, Minnie E. Lilly, the latter's administratrix appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

On the 1st day of August, 1916, Mrs. S. B. Driver sued C. B. Rodgers and others to recover judgment against them for the sum of $1,650 and to foreclose a vendor's lien on certain property which had been sold to the defendants by O. R. Lilly. She alleged that the $1,650 was a balance of the purchase price of said property, and that the parties had given O. R. Lilly a note for $1,650, and that Lilly had duly assigned the note to her. J. W. Barron was allowed to become a party defendant, and filed his answer to the action, and also a cross-complaint against O. R. Lilly. In his cross-complaint Barron alleged that he had paid Lilly the amount of the note sued for, and that Lilly had transferred it to the plaintiff, for the purpose of defrauding him out of the amount so paid.

The facts are as follows: J. W. Barron and O. R. Lilly originally purchased a tract of land and platted the same as the Barron and Lilly addition to the city of Blytheville, Ark. Later Lilly sold his undivided one-half interest in the addition to C. B. Rodgers, and Rodgers in turn sold it to J. W. Barron. Barron paid Rodgers $1,000 for his half interest in the lots, and as part payment he assumed the balance of the purchase price of the lots. Before Barron purchased the lots from Rodgers, Lilly advised him that Rodgers had made payments upon the notes until there was a balance due on it of $935. This was about March 6, 1911, and Lilly executed a deed releasing his lien upon the lots, and Barron executed to Lilly a note for $1,000. Lilly was to surrender the old note, but was not able to find it. In a short time afterwards, Barron was in Lilly's office again, and asked him about the old note, and Lilly said that he could not find it. Barron then asked him if he had put the note up with any one as collateral, and Lilly said that he had not. Lilly never delivered the note to Barron, and it is the note here sued on. At the time Lilly told Barron that he had credited the note with the payment Rodgers had made, and that this left a balance of $935 due on it. Barron executed the new note for $1,000 to Lilly, in order to get Lilly to execute a deed of release to the lots. According to the testimony of O. R. Lilly, he had a settlement with J. W. Barron in 1914. Barron went to Lilly's office with a lot of notes that they jointly owned. The notes amounted approximately to $10,000. Nearly all of them were worthless, but Barron thought that he could collect some of them, and Lilly transferred his interest to Barron to indemnify him against loss on the transaction involved in this lawsuit. O. R. Lilly was duly adjudged a bankrupt on the 16th day of January, 1916, and was ordered to be discharged from all debts and claims which are made payable by the Bankruptcy Act against his estate. The claim of Barron involved in this suit was not proved against his estate.

The cause was heard on the 4th day of September, 1918, and a decree in favor of the plaintiff was entered of record on that day. The court found that on the 6th day of March, 1911, O. R. Lilly assigned the note for $1,650 sued on to the plaintiff, and that no part of the principal or interest on the same has been paid, and that there is now due on said note the sum of $2,666.72, which is declared to be a lien on the lots involved. The court further found in favor of Barron on the cross-complaint, and—

"that the said Lilly was guilty of specific fraud practiced upon the said Rodgers and Barron, and that Lilly is primarily liable to the said Rodgers and Barron, and that if the said Barron and Rodgers pay the amount due the plaintiff, as recited above, then by virtue of the said payment the said Rodgers and Barron, or either of them making said payment, shall be entitled to judgment for said amount, and the costs thereof, against the said Lilly."

It was therefore by the court decreed that, if the sum adjudged to be due plaintiff was not paid within 30 days, the vendor's lien should be foreclosed, and that the lots be sold for the payment thereof. On September 22, 1919, J. W. Barron filed his motion in the cause, alleging that he had paid the amount of the judgment, to wit, $2,757.42, and asked that he have summary judgment against O. R. Lilly for that sum. Lilly resisted the motion, and the court rendered a decree in favor of Barron against Lilly for said amount. The case is here on appeal.

O. R. Lilly having since died, the case has been revived in the name of his administratrix.

J. T. Coston, of Osceola, for appellant.

Buck & Lasley, of Blytheville, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is claimed that appellant is barred of relief because no appeal was taken from the decree rendered on the 4th day of September, 1918, within the time prescribed by the statute. In that decree the court found that O. R. Lilly was guilty of fraud practiced upon Barron, and was primarily liable to Barron, and that if Barron should pay the amount due the plaintiff, to wit, $2,666.72 that the said Barron should be entitled to judgment for said amount against O. R. Lilly. No judgment for that amount, however, was rendered against Lilly in favor of Barron.

[1] The finding of the court was for the plaintiff, but there was no judgment on the finding. This being true, there was nothing to appeal from. A finding of fact does not constitute a judgment. The judgment of the court must be pronounced in some form. The finding of the court is not final in its character, and does not terminate the litigation between the parties. It does not determine the issues in the case. The effective action of a court is by its decree or judgment, and not by its finding. Reynolds v. Craycraft, 26 Ark. 468; State v. Jones, 25 Ark. 375; Moss v. Ashbrook, 15 Ark. 169; Sennett v. Walker, 92 Ark. 607, 123 S. W. 769; Chappell v. Chappell (Md.) 82 Md. 647, 33 Atl. 650; Green v. Probate Judge, 40 Mich. 244; Baum v. Currituck Shooting Club, 94 N. C. 217; Kilmer v. Bradley, 80 N. Y. 630; Judge v. Powers, 156 Iowa, 251, 136 N. W. 315, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 280.

[2] The case, therefore, remained within the jurisdiction of the chancery court. Subsequently the chancellor, on motion of appellee, rendered a decree in his favor against the appellant. In apt time appellant prosecuted an appeal from that decree. One of the grounds relied upon by counsel for appellant for a reversal of the decree is that Lilly was adjudged a bankrupt and a discharge in bankruptcy granted him in January, 1916, and that appellee, Barron, failed to prove his claim against Lilly in the bankruptcy proceedings. Barron did not prove his claim in the bankruptcy proceedings. He now claims that his claim was not discharged by the bankruptcy proceedings, because it was a contingent one, and therefore not provable under the Bankruptcy Act. The claim was not a contingent one. All the facts necessary to fix liability upon Lilly in the matter had already occurred. Rodgers had executed a note to Lilly for $1,650 for the purchase price of certain town lots, and Lilly had a vendor's lien upon the lots. Rodgers sold his interest to Barron, and Barron assumed the purchase price, which Rodgers owed to Lilly. It was agreed between Lilly and Barron that the latter should execute his note to the former for $1,600 in lieu of the $1,650 note. The $1,650 note could not be found at the time the transaction occurred, but it was understood that it should be canceled and delivered to Barron. Consequently Lilly's liability to Barron existed at the time the bankruptcy proceedings were had, and the liability of Lilly to Barron was a provable debt under the Bankruptcy Law. Remington on Bankruptcy (2d Ed.) vol. 1, § 641. See, also, Williams v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 236 U. S. 549, 35 Sup. Ct. 289, 59 L. Ed. 713.

Again, it is contended that the liability was not a provable claim in the bankruptcy proceeding, because of the fraud of Lilly, and that this was not known by Barron at the time of the bankruptcy proceeding. The fraud contended for is that Lilly deposited the $1,650 note as collateral security for a debt of his own, and that he had told Barron that it could not be delivered to him, because he had lost or mislaid it. It is true that Barron testified that Lilly told him that the $1,650 note had not been deposited with any one as collateral security; but it must be remembered that this conversation occurred after the transaction had been completed. At the time of the transaction it does not appear that Lilly represented to Barron that the note had not been deposited by him as collateral security to any of his creditors. Indeed, when Lilly's whole testimony is read and considered together, it is fairly inferable from it that the note was not deposited as collateral security until some time after his transaction with Barron. His testimony in this regard is not disputed by Barron. Indeed, Barron frankly admits that he has not yet suffered any loss by reason of the transaction. In other words, the payment of the balance of the original purchase-money note of $1,650 and the accrued interest was made by the various purchasers of the town lots.

[3] As a general rule, in order for false representations to be the basis of fraud, such representations must be relative to existing facts. An exception to the general rule is that if the promise is accompanied with an intention not to perform it, and is made for the purpose of deceiving the person to whom it was made, and inducing him to act in the premises, the same constitutes fraud. No such state of facts exists here, however, and the liability of Lilly to Barron does not accrue on account of fraud or false representations, but because Lilly converted the note to his own use at some period of time after the transaction with Barron had been completed. Therefore he should have proved his claim in the bankruptcy court. See Crawford v. Burke, 195 U. S. 176, 25 Sup. Ct. 9, 49 L. Ed. 147.

It follows that the decree must be reversed, and the cause will be remanded for further proceedings according to the principles of equity and not inconsistent with this opinion.

JENKINS et al. v. JENKINS. (No. 47.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Wills §358—Judgment admitting will to record appealable as "final order of judgment."

Under the statutes, a judgment admitting a will to record is a final order or judgment from which an appeal lies within 12 months after the rendition thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Final Order.]

2. Wills §364—No appeal from probate of will in common form by infants more than a year after probate.

Under the statutes, infant heirs who were not notified of the probate in common form of ancestor's will will not be permitted to appeal therefrom, in view of Kirby's Dig. §§ 8041, 8043, where the year provided by the statute for appeal therefrom has expired; the statutes containing no saving clause in favor of the infants.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County; W. B. Sorrells, Judge.

Proceeding by Edith Jenkins and another by their next friend, N. T. Jenkins, to be allowed to appeal from the probate of the will of P. G. Jenkins, deceased. Petition dismissed, and petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding by Edith Jenkins and John Brunson Jenkins, Jr., minors, by their next friend, N. T. Jenkins, to be allowed to appeal from the probate of the will of P. G. Jenkins, deceased.

As grounds therefor they allege that they are children of Brunson Jenkins, deceased; that Brunson Jenkins and P. G. Jenkins were brothers; that Brunson Jenkins died before P. G. Jenkins; that the will of P. G. Jenkins was probated in common form, and that the petitioners were not notified of the probate thereof; that but for the will and probate of the same, they would have shared in the estate of P. G. Jenkins, deceased.

The will of P. G. Jenkins, deceased, was probated in common form on the 10th day of January, 1916, and the present proceeding was instituted in the probate court on June 13, 1919.

The petition of Edith Jenkins and John Brunson Jenkins, minors, to be allowed to contest the probate of the will of P. G. Jenkins, deceased, was denied by the probate court, and it was adjudged that their petition be dismissed. They prosecuted an appeal to the circuit court, and it was there adjudged that the cause be dismissed. The case is here on appeal.

Arthur D. Chavis, of Pine Bluff, and Carmichael & Brooks, of Little Rock, for appellants.

Taylor & Jones, of Pine Bluff, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). The record shows that Edith Jenkins and John B. Jenkins were minors at the time P. G. Jenkins died and his will was admitted to probate in common form; that is, without notice. They seek to contest the will on the ground of undue influence in its execution, and claim that on account of their minority they have the right to have the will probated in solemn form, or, in other words, to contest it, although more than one year has elapsed since the will was probated.

[1] Under our statute the judgment admitting a will to record is a final order or judgment from which an appeal lies within 12 months after the rendition thereof. Hogane v. Hogane, 57 Ark. 508, 22 S. W. 167. The appeal in that case was dismissed because it was not taken within the time limited by the statute.

In Ouachita Baptist College v. Scott, 64 Ark. 349, 42 S. W. 536, it was held that where a will is admitted to probate in common form in the probate court the persons interested may make themselves parties by perfecting an appeal to the circuit court within 12 months, and that this, under our practice, amounts to a contest of the will. The court said:

"If the will has been probated in the more solemn form (that is, upon notice to all interested to appear in the probate court at the probate), then, of course, this particular question does not arise. If, however, as in the present case, the probate is in the common form, and parties interested have not been summoned to appear and make objection, then we think it but a fair and reasonable construction to put on the statute that parties interested may file the affidavit provided in the statute within the 12 months allowed, and thus make themselves parties to the probate proceedings for the purpose of taking an appeal from the order of probate to the circuit court, wherein in such case the real contest of the will may be made on the grounds set forth in their petition, which of course, will necessarily show their relationship to the deceased. This ruling is one of first impression in this court, but is in harmony with the suggestions contained in all of our more recent decisions, although these decisions contain mere suggestions or intimations on the subject, and nowhere decide the particular question. Petty v. Ducker, supra; Hogane v. Hogane, 57 Ark. 508. Furthermore, since the decisions of this court have left no other remedy to the contestant, who has not been given a day in court, this ruling meets the requirements of the constitutional provision, which declares that 'every person is entitled to a certain remedy in the laws for all injuries or wrongs he may receive, in his person, property or character.' Const. Ark. art. 2, § 13. The contestants having filed their affidavit within one year from the probate of the will, as required by statute, the circuit court properly exercised jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal, which in such matters amounts to the contest of the will."

[2] The statute under construction in that case is the one applicable here, and it contains no saving clause in favor of infants, and the court can make none. A saving from the operation of the statute for the disability of minority must be expressed or it does not exist. Hence it has been held that where the time for contesting probated wills is limited by statute and there is no saving clause in favor of infants, none exists. 40 Cyc. pp. 1257, 1258; Cleveland's Adm'r v. Lyne, 5 Bush. (Ky.) 383; Folmar's Appeal, 68 Pa. 482; Warfield v. Fox, 53 Pa. 382.

With regard to other statutes by which the rights of minors and feme covert are affected, the court has held that a law general in its nature binds them, although they are not specially named, and that their disability does not relieve them from the limitation of the statute unless there is a saving clause showing that they were intended to be excepted. Nelson v. Cowling, 89 Ark. 334, 116 S. W. 890; Collier v. Smith, 132 Ark. 309, 200 S. W. 1008; Hogg v. Nichols, 134 Ark. 280, 204 S. W. 211.

Section 8041 of Kirby's Digest provides that when the proceeding to probate a will upon notice is taken to the circuit court all necessary parties shall be brought before the court.

Section 8043 provides that any person interested, who, at the time of the final decision in the circuit court resided out of this state, and was proceeded against by order of appearance only, and any other person interested who was not a party to the proceeding by actual appearance, or being personally served with process, may, within three years after such final decision in the circuit court, by a bill in chancery impeach the decision and have a retrial on the question of probate. The concluding part of the section provides that an infant, not a party, shall not be barred of such proceedings in chancery until 12 months after obtaining full age.

In the construction of this statute the court has held that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to review a decision of the probate court upon the probate of a will, where there was no appeal to the circuit court within the time prescribed by the statute. The court held that if the appeal to the circuit court be barred, then no final decision of the circuit court can be had on the probate or a rejection of the will, and that the section is wholly inapplicable. Mitchell et al. v. Rogers, 40 Ark. 91.

The Court of Appeals of Kentucky reached the same conclusion upon a precisely similar statute. Cleveland's Adm'r v. Lyne, 5 Bush (Ky.) 383.

It follows that the petitioners fall within the operation of the statute, and, more than one year having elapsed from the date of probating the will and the time of filing their petition to contest the will, the circuit court properly dismissed their cause of action. Any other holding would make the statute an enlarging rather than a restraining one.

Therefore the judgment will be affirmed.

CONOLLY et al. v. ROSEN et al. (No. 51.)
(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Landlord and tenant §63(3)—Where tenancy disputed title may be denied.

Where the question whether tenancy had ever existed was disputed, defendants in possession may deny plaintiffs' title and right to possession without delivering possession.

2. Deeds §139—Exception which referred to prior deed void for uncertainty.

The same certainty being required of an exception as a grant, an exception of six acres in the southeast quarter, etc., sold to C., which referred to the deed to C. for description, is void for uncertainty, where the deed referred to described land as the fractional southeast quarter, etc., containing six acres.

3. Reformation of instruments §45(5)—Denial of reformation held not against preponderance of evidence.

Where reformation of an exception in deed void for uncertainty of description was sought on the ground the six acres sought to be excepted were sufficiently identified for the court to give effect to the parties' intention, held, that a decree denying reformation was not clearly against the preponderance of the evidence as abstracted.

4. Quieting title §49—Decree held to sufficiently protect grantors against mortgage assumed by grantee.

Where the grantors made the mortgagee party to a suit in which they asserted an exception and he disclaimed any desire to foreclose unless necessary to protect his interests, a decree quieting the grantee's title to the land claimed to have been excepted, which made no order with reference to the mortgage executed by the grantors and assumed by the grantee, was not objectionable as failing to protect the grantors' interests.

Appeal from Garland Chancery Court; S. W. Leslie, Special Chancellor.

Suit by Berney Conolly and others against Dave Rosen and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. G. Davies, of Hot Springs, for appellants.

Geo. P. Whittington and H. P. Chappell, both of Hot Springs, for appellees.

SMITH, J. This suit was begun as an action in unlawful detainer by appellants, who were plaintiffs below, and it was alleged by them in their complaint that they had sold appellees a certain tract of land, reserving therefrom the 6 acres which forms the subject-matter of the litigation, and that appellees had unlawfully and wrongfully taken possession of said 6 acres and were forcibly and fraudulently detaining the same after demand therefor had been made in writing. There was a general denial of the allegations and a prayer that appellees' title be quieted. By consent the cause was transferred to equity, and upon the trial there appellees' title to the land in question was quieted, and this appeal is from that decree.

[1] It is first insisted that appellees should not have been heard to deny appellants' title to the land and their right of possession thereof unless and until appellees had delivered to appellants the possession of the land. This insistence is based upon the assumption that a tenancy existed on appellees' part, and may be disposed of by saying that the existence of this tenancy is one of the disputed questions of fact in the case. According to appellees, that relationship never at any time existed.

[2] Appellants had title to an 80-acre tract of land by inheritance from their father, and by separate deeds conveyed the land to appellees, except a certain 7 acres which their father had previously conveyed to one Gibson Mills, and as there is no question in regard to this 7-acre tract it passes out of the case. In the granting clause of the deed the following exception is found:

"Excepting also 6 acres in the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of said section 18, township 3 south, of range 19 east, sold to C. O. Cooley, for a description of which reference is had to the record of the deed for the same in the office of the recorder of Garland county, Ark."

It thus appears that the attempt to except the 6 acres, in addition to the 7 acres, was made by referring to a prior deed for a particular description of the 6 acres thus excepted. This Cooley deed was offered in evidence, and the description there employed reads as follows:

"The fractional southeast quarter of the northeast quarter in township 3, section 18, range 19, containing 6 acres, more or less, in the county of Garland and state of Arkansas."

It is quite obvious that this description is void for uncertainty, and that uncertainty is not removed by reading the two deeds together.

In the case of Mooney v. Cooledge, 30 Ark. 640, it was decided that—"The same certainty of description is required in an exception out of a grant, as in the grant itself."

In that case there was an attempt to except an acre from the grant, but there was nothing in the exception, or the evidence, to locate it upon any particular part of the tract, and the court held that the exception was void for uncertainty, and that the grantee took the entire tract, including the one acre. See, also, Scott v. Dunkle Box & Lumber Co., 106 Ark. 83, 152 S. W. 1025.

[3] The case as submitted in the court below was, in effect, one to reform the deed, and it is insisted by appellants that the testimony shows an intent to except 6 acres, and, further, that the 6 acres are sufficiently identified for the court to give effect to the intention of the parties by reserving the 6 acres from the deed and awarding the possession thereof to appellants and quieting their title thereto.

No opinion was rendered or finding of facts made by the court below, but the decree indicates that the court found the facts against appellants' contention, as the decree rendered quieted appellees' title, and the testimony is not sufficiently abstracted for us to say that the chancellor's finding is clearly against the preponderance of the evidence.

So far as the testimony is abstracted, it appears that an irreconcilable difference of opinion exists as to the meaning and purpose of the exception set out above. It is undisputed that Patrick Conolly and his wife (father and mother of appellants) on April 3, 1880, executed a deed to one Calvin Cooley, purporting to convey the 6 acres under the description set out above; this being the deed to which reference was made in the deed from appellants to appellees. Cooley for a time occupied a part of the land under his deed, but he went away, and no account was given of his whereabouts at the time of the trial. After Cooley left appellants paid taxes on the entire tract and occupied the 6 acres as a portion of the whole.

Appellees testified most unequivocally that it was represented to them that they were getting all the land except the 7 acres owned by Mills, and that they bought under this representation and would not have purchased otherwise, and that the exception was put into the deed because appellants did not want to warrant title to land which their father had previously conveyed, but upon the delivery of the deed possession of all the land was delivered to appellees except the Mills' 7 acres, and for several months no question was raised about their being entitled to all the land except the Mills' 7 acres. The testimony on appellants' behalf sharply contradicts the testimony just recited, but the record in the case has not been sufficiently abstracted for us to say that the decree is based upon a finding of fact clearly against the preponderance of the evidence.

Much testimony was offered concerning the damages claimed; but this question passes out of the case upon the affirmance of the decree below.

[4] Complaint is also made against the decree that it does not adequately protect the interests of appellants against a certain mortgage executed by them to one Stearns, the payment of which was assumed by appellees as a part of the consideration for their deed. Stearns was made a party, and filed an intervention in which he disclaimed any desire to have a decree entered ordering the foreclosure of his mortgage unless that action was necessary to protect his interests. The court made no order in regard to this Stearns mortgage, and we find it unnecessary to do so.

The court quieted appellees' title as against appellants to the 6 acres, but that decree did not free any portion of the land from the Stearns mortgage. Appellees have title to all the land, but they have it subject to the Stearns mortgage, and as its foreclosure is not asked, it is unnecessary to make any order in regard to it.

Decree affirmed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v.
ROAD IMPROVEMENT DIST. NO. 1 OF CLEVELAND COUNTY.
(No. 57.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

Highways §136—Telegraph company's right of way under contract with railway held permanent easement, assessable as real estate.

Under a contract reciting that a telegraph company owned a telegraph system along a railway right of way, which was shown to be a permanent construction, which contract granted an exclusive right to operate and maintain the system, the telegraph company has a permanent easement, notwithstanding clause permitting termination of contract on one year's notice after the expiration of 25 years, but not requiring removal of the lines, which clause applies only to provisions relating to maintenance, so that the telegraph system is real property, which can be assessed for road district benefits under Road Law 1919, No. 612, § 5.

Appeal from Cleveland Chancery Court; John M. Elliott, Chancellor.

Suit by the Western Union Telegraph Company against Road Improvement District No. 1 of Cleveland County. From a decree dismissing the suit for want of equity, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bridges & Wooldridge, of Pine Bluff, for appellant.

Rowell & Alexander, of Pine Bluff, and Coleman, Robinson & House, of Little Rock, for appellee.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellant instituted suit against appellee in the Cleveland chancery court to set aside the benefits assessed and fixed against its property by the board of commissioners of appellee district, on the ground that the property owned by it in said Road Improvement District No. 1 is personal, instead of real, property. Appellee filed answer, denying that its property in said district, against which benefits were assessed, is personal property.

The cause was submitted upon the pleadings and an agreed statement of facts, to which a contract between appellant and the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company was attached as Exhibit A and made a part of the evidence in the case, from which the court found that the property in question was real estate, and decreed that the petition of appellant be dismissed for want of equity. From the decree of dismissal, an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court.

The appellee, Road Improvement District No. 1 of Cleveland County, was organized under Act No. 612 of the Legislature, approved April 1, 1919. The benefits to the property in question were assessed by the board of commissioners of said district under section 5 of said act, which is as follows:

"Said commissioners shall proceed to assess the lands within the district and shall inscribe in a book each tract of land and shall assess the value of the benefits to accrue to each tract by reason of such improvement, and shall enter such assessment of benefits opposite the description together with the estimate of the probable cost to the land owner. Their assessment shall embrace not merely the lands, but all railroads, tramroads, telegraph, telephone and pipe lines, and other improvements on real estate that will be benefited by the improving of the roads; and wherever the word 'lands' is used in this act, it shall be construed to embrace all property subject to taxation herein. The commissioners shall place opposite each tract the name of the supposed owner as shown by the last county assessment list. The commissioners shall also assess all damages that will accrue to any land owner by reason of the proposed improvement, including all injury to lands taken or damaged; and where they return no such damages as to any tract of land, it shall be deemed a finding by them that no damages will be sustained."

The agreed statement of facts is as follows:

"That the above road district was created under Act No. 612 of the General Assembly of the state of Arkansas, approved April 1, 1919. That the commissioners, as provided in said act, have assessed the benefits against the lands within the district, and have filed the same in the office of the clerk of the county court of Cleveland county.

"That there are $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles of telegraph line within the boundary of said district. That benefits to said telegraph line have been assessed by the assessors of said district at \$25 per mile for said $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, aggregating, benefits in the sum of \$137.50.

"That the property of said telegraph company within said district consists of 165 white cedar poles, upon which are strung various wires; that these poles are guyed on curves with standard anchor rods and guy wire; that two cross-arms are attached to these poles, with through bolts and arm braces to support the wire; that these wires are on standard steel pins and insulators; that the only office of the telegraph company in the district is at Rison, Ark., at which station the company has a standard switchboard, with three common sets of Morse instruments, etc. The wires enter the depot of the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company through 125 feet of 10-pair rubber-covered cable.

"That the $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the telegraph line of the complainant is located on the right of way of the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company; the company furnishing all labor to maintain the wires; the telegraph company furnishing all material for maintenance. For furnishing the labor to maintain the telegraph lines the railway company gets free use and joint use of certain wires owned by the telegraph company.

"That the complainant, telegraph company, owns no real estate within said improvement district, unless the rights obtained under contract hereto attached constitute an easement which is taxable under the law as real estate.

"That the poles upon which the wires are strung are placed in the ground on the right of way of the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company under a contract between the said telegraph company and the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company, a copy of which is attached hereto, as Exhibit A, and made a part of this statement of facts, which contract is now in force between said telegraph company and railway company, and has been since its execution.

"That under said contract said telegraph company has the privilege and right of placing its telegraph poles upon which its wires are strung along and upon the right of way of said railway company, that the poles and wires of said telegraph company are so placed and maintained upon the right of way of said St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company through the county of Cleveland, Ark.

"That the telegraph line and property of the complainant in Arkansas are assessed for the purpose of taxation by the tax commission in Arkansas. That the said tax commission has assessed the telegraph line and property of the complainant for the year 1919, and for several years past, as personal property, and has not and does not assess any part of the line and property of complainant as real estate.

"That said tax commission certifies out from its office to various county clerks through which complainant's telegraph line may run, its assessment of complainant's property as personal property, and that the assessment of complainant's property in Cleveland county is so certified to the county clerk of said county, which assessment includes the mileage of complainant's telegraph line within said improvement district.

"That said tax commission directs the assessors of the various counties to place the amount of the assessment of complainant's property on the personal property tax record, and that complainant pays taxes on its property and so certified upon same as personal property."

The contract attached as an exhibit and made a part of the evidence is of such great length that it is impractical to set it out in this opinion in toto. The three clauses of the contract relating more directly than any others to the question to be determined on this appeal are the preamble, a part of the ninth, and all of the thirteenth clause, which are as follows:

Preamble.—"That whereas, the telegraph company owns lines of telegraph along the railway company's railroad from Birds Point, Mo., opposite Cairo, Ill., to Gatesville, Tex., and along the various branches thereof, which telegraph lines are now operated under the provisions of an agreement dated the 2d day of July, 1888, made by and between the telegraph company and the St. Louis, Arkansas & Texas Railway Company in Arkansas and Missouri, whose property has been sold under foreclosure of mortgages; and it is desirable in the interest of both parties hereto, that a new agreement be entered into between them superseding and taking the place of said agreement hereinbefore mentioned, and extending to all railroads now owned, leased, or controlled, and to all railroads hereafter owned, leased, or controlled, by the railway company party hereto, and extensions or branches thereof."

Part of Ninth Clause.—"The railway company, so far as it legally may, hereby grants and agrees to assure to the telegraph company the exclusive right of way on, along, and under the line, lands, and bridges of the railway company, and any extensions and branches thereof, for the construction, maintenance, operation, and use of lines of poles and wires and underground or other lines for commercial or public telegraph and telephone uses or business, with the right to put up or construct or cause to be put up or constructed, from time to time, such additional wires and such additional lines of poles and wires and underground or other lines as the telegraph company may deem expedient, and the railway company agrees to clear and keep clear said right of way of all trees, undergrowth, and other obstructions to the construction and maintenance of the lines and wires provided for herein, and the railway company will not transport men or material for the construction, maintenance, or operation of a line of poles and wire or wires or underground or other line in competition with the lines of the telegraph company party hereto, except at and for the railway company's regular local rates, nor will it furnish for any competing line any facilities or assistance that it may lawfully withhold, nor stop its trains, nor distribute material therefor at other than regular stations."

Thirteenth Clause.—"The provisions of this agreement shall supersede said agreement hereinbefore mentioned, and shall extend to all railroads now owned, leased, controlled, or operated, and to all railroads hereafter owned, leased, controlled, or operated, by the railway company or by any company or corporation in which the railway company may own a majority of the stock, or whose action it may be able to control by the ownership of stock or otherwise, and the provisions of this agreement shall be and continue in force for and during the term of 25 years from the 13th day of July, 1901, and shall continue after the close of said term until the expiration of one year after written notice shall have been given after the close of said term by either party to the other of an intention to terminate the same, and in case of any disagreement concerning the true intent and meaning of any of said provisions, the subject of such difference shall be referred to three arbitrators, one to be chosen by each party hereto, and the third by the two others chosen, and the decision of such arbitrators or a majority thereof shall be final and conclusive."

The other sections of the contract relate to the duties and requirements of each party in the construction and maintenance of the telegraph lines, the use of certain wires to transmit railway messages, the employment of joint employees, management of joint offices, and other reciprocal services necessary for the operation of the lines.

It is contended by appellant that the occupation of the right of way of the St. Louis Southwestern Company by appellant was only permissive, and subject to termination at the expiration of the contract, or upon one year's written notice, 25 years after the date of the contract. On the other hand, the occupancy of said right of way by appellant is characterized by appellee as an interest or permanent easement in the land. After a careful reading of the entire contract and a consideration of all its parts in the light of the situation of the parties and the facts and circumstances surrounding them at the time of its execution, we are convinced that the parties to the contract intended a permanent, and not a limited, occupancy or easement. By reference to the preamble of the contract, it will be seen that appellant owned lines of telegraph on the right of way of said railroad company from Birds Point, Mo., to Gatesville, Tex., which lines were being operated, under a contract of July 2, 1888, at the time this contract was signed. The contract of 1888 was not exhibited, nor is it disclosed how or when the telegraph company acquired the ownership of the lines, whether by prescription or conveyance. The fact of ownership of such lines by the telegraph company was regarded of sufficient importance to recite it in the contract. It is also disclosed by the preamble that the telegraph lines, so owned, constitute a telegraphic system covering parts of three states, which system was in actual operation at the time the new contract was signed.

The agreed statement of facts revealed that the construction was of a permanent character. The poles, upon which the wires were strung, are cedar, set in the ground, and guyed on curves with standard anchor rods. Two cross-arms were attached to each pole with through bolts and arm braces. The wires are on standard steel pins and insulators. The wires enter the depots through cables, and the system is equipped with standard switchboards and Morse instruments. Section 9 of the contract, in express words, grants an exclusive easement to the appellant over the right of way for the purpose of enlarging and extending the telegraph system. No provision was incorporated in the contract for a removal of the lines or system from the right of way at the expiration of 25 years, or on one year's written notice thereafter. The contract contained no forfeiture clause. Telegraph companies are invested with the power of eminent domain in this state, and in the exercise of the power may acquire an easement along a railroad right of way. This being true, and the telegraph company being in possession, the railroad company could not eject it at the expiration of the time limit in the contract.

All these things point unerringly to the conclusion that the parties intended a permanent, and not a temporary, easement. It is almost inconceivable that a party owning a large system of telegraph over a railroad right of way, presumptively by grant, would give it in exchange for an occupancy for years, even though the time be for 26 years certain, and, after that, uncertain, dependent on a year's written notice by the railroad company. The thirteenth paragraph of the contract, containing provisions to the effect that the new agreement shall supersede the agreement made in 1888, and shall be and continue in force for and during the term of 25 years from the 18th day of July, 1901, and, after the term, until either party shall give one year's written notice of an intention to terminate same, does not necessarily conflict with a permanent easement or interest in the land. These clauses may be very reasonably attributed to the method and reciprocal duties of the parties incident to the operation of the system, and not as relating to the right of the telegraph company to remain upon the right of way and construct its lines along and under the lands and bridges of the railway company.

This is the construction placed upon a contract of like tenor and effect in the cases of Western Union Tel. Co. v. Georgia Railroad & Banking Co. (D. C.) 227 Fed. 276, and Western Union Tel. Co. v. State, 9 Baxt. (Tenn.) 509, 40 Am. Rep. 90. We regard the reasoning in those cases as accurate, and the conclusions based thereon as sound. We therefore adopt the construction of those courts placed upon contracts of similar import as the one now before us for interpretation. Under this interpretation of the contract, the property of the telegraph company is real estate, and the commissioners of the road district had a right, under section 5 of Act 612, Acts of the General Assembly of 1919, to assess benefits against it.

The decree of the chancery court is therefore affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Brokers \S 102—Purchaser may not recover from broker for fraudulent misrepresentations not relied on.

A purchaser is not entitled to damages against a broker for misrepresentation of a tract of land received in exchange, where purchaser relied upon her own investigation and not on the broker's representations.

2. Appeal and error \S 338(3)—Cross-appeal filed after time for original appeal not available as original appeal.

A cross-appeal filed after expiration of the statutory time for original appeals is not available as an original appeal.

3. Appeal and error \S 14(4)—Intervener not "coappellee," within statute granting right to cross-appeal.

Kirby's Dig. \S 1225, provides for "a cross-appeal against the appellant or any coappellee," and in a suit against a broker for damages for misrepresentation in which plaintiff has appealed, an intervener also seeking damages for misrepresentations as to other property is not a "coappellee," under the statute.

Appeal from Washington Chancery Court; Ben F. McMahan, Chancellor.

Suit by Ellen A. Myers against Elmer Linebarger, in which Mrs. Rosa E. Trone intervened. From the decree plaintiff appeals and defendant cross-appeals. Decree affirmed on plaintiff's appeal, and cross-appeal dismissed.

Walker & Walker, of Fayetteville, for appellant.

W. N. Ivie, of Rogers, and H. L. Pearson, of Fayetteville, for appellees.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. Appellant, Ellen Myers, formerly resided in the town of Riviera, Tex., and owned several lots there, one of which was situated a building used as a hotel. Mrs. Rosa E. Trone owned a farm in Washington county, Ark., containing 108 acres, of which about 36 acres were in cultivation and on which there was an apple orchard containing 285 bearing trees. Each of those parties desired to sell or exchange their respective properties, and appellee, Elmer Linebarger, who lived at Fayetteville, was authorized by each of the parties to negotiate a sale, and he finally brought the parties together on terms for the exchange of their properties. He was to receive from Mrs. Myers the sum of $100 as his commission, and was also to receive from Mrs. Trone, and did receive from her, as his commission a conveyance of one of the lots in Riviera, Tex., which Mrs. Trone had received in the trade with appellant.

This action was instituted by appellant against appellee, Linebarger, to recover damages sustained by reason of alleged misrepresentations by the latter to appellant concerning the farm which appellant received from Mrs. Trone in the exchange. The court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, but on appeal to this court the judgment was reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings. 134 Ark. 231, 203 S. W. 580. The cause was then transferred to the chancery court, apparently without objection, and Mrs. Trone filed an intervention, in which she, too, sought to recover damages from appellee, Linebarger, on account of alleged misrepresentations to her concerning the property which she received from Mrs. Myers. The cause was heard by the court and a decree was rendered in favor of appellant against appellee, Linebarger, to the extent of the commission he was to receive, namely, the sum of $100, which was ordered to be credited on the note executed by appellant to Mrs. Trone and assigned to appellee. In other respects appellant's complaint was dismissed for want of equity. The court also rendered a decree in favor of Mrs. Trone against Linebarger for cancellation of her conveyance to the latter of the lot in Riviera which he received as compensation for negotiating the exchange. Mrs. Myers appealed from so much of the decree as dismissed her complaint against Linebarger and the latter appealed from the decree against him in favor of Mrs. Trone. Those appeals were granted by the chancery court at the time of the rendition of the decrees, but neither of them were perfected. A few days before the expiration of the statutory time allowed for obtaining appeals to this court Mrs. Myers lodged a transcript here and was allowed an appeal by the clerk of this court. After the expiration of the statutory time for original appeals Linebarger prayed a cross-appeal, which was granted.

[1] The chancery court in its decree recited findings to the effect that Linebarger had made misrepresentations to Mrs. Myers as to the condition of the tract of land she received from Mrs. Trone with respect to the number of apple trees and the number of acres in cultivation, and as to certain fencing and other matters to some extent material, and the decree also recited a finding that Mrs. Myers did not rely wholly on the representations of Linebarger, but that she made a separate investigation of the property through one T. J. Kramer and relied on the facts thus ascertained in making the exchange.

Appellant has not abstracted the testimony, but relies for a reversal of the judgment on the contention that there should have been a decree in favor of appellant on the findings of the court. Appellee has abstracted the testimony deemed to be material to his side of the controversy, and it appears therefrom that the representations which he made to appellant were upon information and purported to be such, and that she did not consummate the trade on the faith of those representations, but made investigation through Mr. Kramer, with whom she was acquainted, and that she relied on Kramer's judgment. In the state of the record presented to us we must presume that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings of the court that appellant pursued an investigation in her own way and relied upon that and not upon the representations made to her by appellee. This being true, she is not entitled to recover damages. In order to establish liability, either by way of rescission of a contract or recovery of damages, it must appear that the representations were such as the party had a right to rely on and did in fact rely on. Brown v. Le May, 101 Ark. 95, 141 S. W. 759. This disposes of the contention of appellant, and the decree dismissing her complaint will be affirmed.

[2, 3] Appellee, Linebarger, did not perfect his original appeal against Mrs. Trone, and the cross-appeal is not available as an original appeal, because it was asked for and allowed after the statutory time for granting appeals. A cross-appeal was not proper, because the controversy between Linebarger and Mrs. Trone was entirely separate and the record of the controversy between them cannot be brought up for review on cross-appeal obtained on the appeal of Mrs. Myers. Shapard v. Mixon, 122 Ark. 530, 184 S. W. 399. The statute provides for "a cross-appeal against the appellant, or any coappellee." Kirby's Digest, § 1225. Mrs. Trone was neither the appellant nor was she the coappellee with Linebarger on the appeal of Mrs. Myers. Linebarger's cross-appeal is therefore dismissed.

MURPHY et al. v. MURPHY. (No. 49.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Wills \Rightarrow 302(6)—Holographic will held established by "unimpeachable evidence" of required number of disinterested witnesses.

In proceedings to probate holographic will, evidence of seven disinterested witnesses familiar with decedent's handwriting that will and signature thereto were in decedent's handwriting held to sustain verdict for proponent, such evidence being "unimpeachable evidence" within Kirby's Dig. § 8012, requiring such evidence of three disinterested witnesses to establish such a will, notwithstanding contradictory evidence; the jury by its verdict having expressed its belief in such witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Unimpeachable Evidence.]

2. Wills §324(1)—Credibility of witnesses to will held for jury.

In proceedings to probate holographic will under Kirby's Dig. § 8012, requiring unimpeachable testimony of at least three disinterested witnesses to handwriting of decedent, the credibility of the witnesses was for the jury.

3. Appeal and error §1001(1)—Verdict supported by substantial evidence not disturbed unless contrary to physical facts.

Verdict must be upheld on appeal if there is any substantial evidence to support it, but where the facts are undisputed and by applying to them the well-known laws of nature and the physical facts, it is demonstrated beyond controversy that the verdict is based upon what is untrue, appellate court will declare as a matter of law that the evidence is not legally sufficient to warrant the verdict.

4. Evidence §6, 8—Appellate court takes notice of laws of nature and physics.

Appellate courts will take notice of the unquestioned laws of nature, of mathematics, of mechanics and of physics.

5. Evidence §511—Expert witnesses may testify as to genuineness of disputed handwriting.

Expert witnesses may be introduced to prove the genuineness of disputed handwriting.

6. Wills §302(6)—Testimony as to genuineness of purported holographic will held not contrary to physical facts.

In proceedings to probate holographic will, evidence as to genuineness of will held not contrary to physical facts or opposed to any unquestioned law of nature.

7. Wills §386—Verdict for proponent, supported by substantial evidence, not disturbed.

In proceedings to probate holographic will involving issue as to genuineness of purported will, verdict for proponent will not be disturbed on appeal, where supported by substantial evidence.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Garland County; Scott Wood, Judge.

Proceedings to probate will by Mrs. Minnie Murphy, contested by M. J. Murphy and others. Judgment for proponent, and contestants appeal. Affirmed.

On June 15, 1918, P. J. Murphy, a resident of Hot Springs, Ark., died there, leaving surviving him his widow, Minnie Murphy, and some collateral heirs, but no lineal descendants. After his death a search was made for a will, but none could be found. In the latter part of January, 1919, Mrs. Minnie Murphy went to South Dakota on business. While she was there in February, 1919, Anna Feeney, her sister, had occasion to examine a trunk containing the books and papers of the deceased, and found the following:

"I want My wife Mrs. Minnie Murphy to have all My real estate, Money and personal property which I own or interest in at My Death.
P. J. Murphy."

Mrs. Minnie Murphy offered this writing for probate as the last holographic will of her deceased husband. It was first presented to the clerk of the probate court in vacation, and five disinterested witnesses testified that they had examined the writing in question, and that the body of the writing, as well as the signature thereto, was in the genuine handwriting of P. J. Murphy, deceased. The collateral heirs of P. J. Murphy, deceased, made themselves parties to the proceeding, and contested the will. The probate court admitted the instrument to probate and record as the holographic will of P. J. Murphy, deceased.

Appellants appealed to the circuit court, where a trial was had before a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of appellee, and from the judgment rendered, appellants have duly prosecuted an appeal to this court.

R. G. Davies, A. B. Belding, and L. E. Sawyer, all of Hot Springs, for appellants.

A. J. Murphy, of Hot Springs, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). Subdivision 5 of section 8012 of Kirby's Digest provides that where the entire body of the will and the signature thereto shall be written in the proper handwriting of the testator, such will may be established by the unimpeachable evidence of at least three disinterested witnesses to the handwriting and signature of such testator.

In the case at bar the proponent introduced seven disinterested witnesses, who had been closely associated with P. J. Murphy, deceased, during the last five or six years of his life, and who by correspondence and by examination of his handwriting in their social and business intercourse with him were perfectly familiar with his handwriting. They testified that the entire body of the will and the signature thereto were in the genuine handwriting of said P. J. Murphy. Five experienced bank officials, who qualified as experts in handwriting, also testified that they had made a careful comparison of the purported will with other writings of said P. J. Murphy, which were admitted to be genuine, and all of them stated that such a comparison showed the entire body of the purported will and the signature thereto to be in the genuine handwriting of said P. J. Murphy. These expert witnesses were examined and cross-examined in detail as to their reasons for the opinion that the entire body of the will and the signature thereto were in the genuine handwriting of P. J. Murphy. They observed the peculiarities and characteristics of his admittedly genuine writings, and testified that it was their opinion, from a comparison of these writings with the purported will, that the entire body of the will and the signature thereto were in the genuine handwriting of said P. J. Murphy.

On the other hand, witnesses were introduced by the contestants who testified that they were perfectly familiar with the handwriting of P. J. Murphy, and it was their opinion that the purported will was a forgery. Expert witnesses were also introduced by the contestants, who after a comparison of the purported will with other admittedly genuine writings of said P. J. Murphy testified that it was their opinion that the purported will was a forgery. They called attention to the spelling and also the characteristics of the genuine handwriting of said P. J. Murphy which caused them to believe that the purported will was a forgery. The purported will and the admittedly genuine writings of said P. J. Murphy were also submitted to the jury for their inspection.

It is first contended by counsel for the contestants that the verdict cannot be upheld because evidence was introduced by them tending to contradict the evidence introduced by the proponent of the will, and that on this account the will was not established by the unimpeachable evidence of at least three disinterested witnesses to the handwriting and signature of the testator, as required by section 8012 of Kirby's Digest. In other words, they contend that the evidence of the proponent is not unimpeachable within the requirements of the statute where there was any evidence of a substantial character introduced which tended to contradict it, no matter whether such evidence was introduced by the proponent of the will or by the contestants.

We cannot agree with this contention. In Arendt v. Arendt, 80 Ark. 204, 96 S. W. 982, the court held that by "unimpeachable witness" is meant one whom the jury find to have spoken truthfully, and whose conclusion they find to be correct. See, also, Mason v. Bowen, 122 Ark. 411, 183 S. W. 973, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 713.

[1] In the case at bar seven disinterested witnesses testified that for five or six years prior to the death of said P. J. Murphy, by reason of social and business intercourse with him, they were perfectly familiar with his handwriting, and that the entire body of the purported will and the signature thereto were in his proper handwriting. They testified in detail as to their opportunities for knowing his handwriting, and it is plain that their opportunities for knowing his handwriting were such as to qualify them to testify with regard to the genuineness of the purported will. Their testimony was consistent in itself, and the witnesses were not impeached, either by contradictory statements made by themselves or by the testimony of other witnesses introduced for that purpose in the manner provided by the statute.

[2] It is true that the contestants introduced evidence tending to contradict their testimony. The contestants opposed the probate of the will on the ground that it was a fraud and a forgery. This presented an issue which must be determined under the rules of evidence governing all contests in courts. Under the issue presented the doors of justice are opened for the introduction of all legal evidence relative to the question. So the contestants introduced evidence tending to show that the purported will was a forgery. This was done by witnesses who testified that they knew the handwriting of said P. J. Murphy. Expert witnesses were introduced by both sides. After all, the credibility of the witnesses was a question for the jury. The jury has said by its verdict that it believed the witnesses for the proponent of the will. Therefore the jury has found that the seven witnesses who testified that the entire body of the will, as well as the signature thereto, was in the proper handwriting of said P. J. Murphy, and that their evidence is unimpeachable.

[3, 4] Again, it is contended by counsel for the contestants that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the physical facts. We cannot agree with counsel in this contention. Under the settled rules of this court we must uphold a verdict on appeal if there is any substantial evidence to support it. Of course, where the facts are undisputed, and by applying to them the well-known laws of nature and the physical facts, it is demonstrated beyond controversy that the verdict is based upon what is untrue, and cannot be true, this court will declare as a matter of law that the testimony is not legally sufficient to warrant the verdict. St. L. S. F. R. Co. v. Stewart, 137 Ark. 6, 207 S. W. 440. The reason for the rule is stated in St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. v. Ellenwood, 123 Ark. 428, 185 S. W. 768, and need not be repeated here. The court has repeatedly held the law to be that, if after consideration of all the evidence the trial court is of the opinion that the verdict of the jury was contrary to the weight of the evidence, it is the duty of that court to set aside the verdict. Upon appeal we must uphold the verdict if there is any substantial evidence to support it. As said in that case, appellate courts will take notice of the unquestioned laws of nature, of mathematics, of mechanics, and of physics; and, where by applying such laws to the facts it is demonstrated beyond controversy that the verdict is based upon what is untrue and what cannot be true, this court will declare as a matter of law that the testimony is not legally sufficient to warrant the verdict.

[5] It is well settled that expert witnesses may be introduced to prove the genuineness of a disputed handwriting. 11 R. C. L. § 41, p. 620. The opinion of handwriting experts may be of great assistance to the jury. Their experience and studies have so qualified them that from the comparison of the disputed writing with other writings admitted to be genuine they can detect peculiarities in the writing which might escape the observation of those less experienced.

[8, 7] The record shows that the deceased was a man of but little education, and that he was a poor speller. The purported will contains one word which was misspelled and which in the admittedly genuine writings of the deceased was never misspelled. The personal pronoun "I" is a small letter in the purported will, while in the admittedly genuine writings it is always a capital letter. Other peculiarities in the handwriting and spelling of the testator are pointed out. We need not go into details about these matters, however. While they are strong evidence that the document is not genuine, such evidence is not conclusive. It cannot be said that the testimony of the witnesses for the proponent of the will is contradicted by physical facts or is opposed to any unquestioned law of nature. The issue to be determined by the jury was the genuineness of the handwriting of P. J. Murphy. The testimony of many witnesses who were familiar with his handwriting was heard by the jury, and was in direct conflict. The testimony of the experts was also in conflict. The jury had before it the purported will and several admittedly genuine writings of P. J. Murphy as a standard of comparison. The question of the genuineness of the handwriting depended upon the truth or falsity of the testimony of the witnesses. Their testimony related to matters and conditions which might or might not be true. The testimony of none of the witnesses is contrary to any law of nature. It is beside the question that the evidence is conflicting. The jury passed upon the credibility of the witnesses, and the trial court did likewise in overruling the motion for a new trial. There was evidence of a substantial character to support the verdict, and to hold otherwise would be to substitute our judgment for that of the jury and of the trial court. This, under the settled rules of this court, we cannot do, and the judgment must be affirmed.

KANSAS CITY SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. SPARKS. (No. 9.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 24, 1920.
On Rehearing, June 25, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1005(2)—Verdict supported by substantial evidence not disturbed.

Where there is any substantial evidence to support a verdict, it will not be disturbed on appeal, the trial court having overruled a motion for new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence.

2. New trial \S 72—Verdict contrary to the weight of the evidence should be set aside.

It is the duty of the trial court to set aside a verdict which in its opinion is contrary to the weight of the evidence.

3. Appeal and error \S 1005(4)—Verdict not disturbed where refusal to set aside as contrary to evidence not arbitrary.

A verdict will not be disturbed on appeal as contrary to the weight of the evidence, where the trial court refused to set the same aside on that ground, and its determination did not appear to be arbitrary or capricious.

4. Master and servant \S 279(5)—Evidence held to show negligence on part of track laborer's foreman.

In an action by track laborer, injured when an old rail which was being loosened fell on his foot, evidence of the negligence of the master's foreman held sufficient to warrant the jury in finding for plaintiff.

5. Master and servant \S 204(1)—Federal Act did not eliminate defense of assumption of risks in cases other than those enumerated.

As the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. \S 8657-8665) eliminated the defense of the assumption of risk in particular cases, such defense is still available to a railroad company in cases other than those enumerated.

6. Master and servant \S 288(12)—Track laborer's assumption of risk of old rail turning over held for jury.

While a servant assumes the risk of all dangers incident to the employment, as well as those which he must observe from the manner in which the work is done, a track laborer, helping to remove old rails, does not, as a matter of law, assume the risk of injury from the turning over of a rail when separated from the other rails.

7. Negligence \S 101—Under federal act contributory negligence merely diminishes recovery.

Under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. \S 8657-8665), contributory negligence of the servant merely diminishes the recovery.

8. Appeal and error \S 231(9)—Where instructions involved, objection should point out particular part claimed to mislead.

Where the instructions which were lengthy were somewhat involved, an objection should point out the particular part deemed misleading, and a mere general objection will not sustain a complaint on appeal to isolated portions of the instructions claimed to mislead.

9. Trial \S 267(3)—Modification of an instruction requested by the master held proper.

Where a track laborer, injured when an old rail which was being removed turned over on his foot, asserted that the foreman struck a cleaver, used to separate the rail from the angle bar, and the defendant asserted the la-lborer struck it, insertion, in a requested instruction to find for defendant if the laborer himself struck the cleaver, of the word "negligently" before the word "struck" was proper; the instruction being peremptory in its nature.

On Rehearing.

10. Appeal and error \S 930(1)—Evidence supporting verdict should be considered in the light most favorable to the successful party.

In reviewing the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, it is to be considered in the light most favorable to the successful party.

11. Master and servant \S 288(1)—Track laborer's assumption of risk held question of fact.

In an action founded on the federal Employers' Liability Act (Comp. St. \S 8657-8665), by a track laborer, hurt in assisting to remove an old rail, the evidence as to the occurrence of the accident, being conflicting, held insufficient to establish as a matter of law that the laborer assumed the risk.

12. Trial \S 296(11)—Instructions in an action under federal Employers' Liability Act as to damages held correct, when considered together.

In an action by a servant, based on the federal Employers' Liability Act (Comp. St. \S 8657-8665), providing that contributory negligence shall not bar recovery, but shall diminish damages, an instruction that, if the servant and master were both guilty of negligence, damages should be diminished in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the servant as the proximate cause of the injury held to state the correct rule, and to be sufficient when read with preceding instruction.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Polk County; Geo. R. Haynie, Judge.

Action by C. C. Sparks against the Kansas City Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Sparks brought this suit against the Kansas City Southern Railway Company and Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. \S 8657-8665), to recover for personal injuries sustained by him while engaged in the work of track repairing. At the time Sparks was injured, with other servants of the railroad company, he was engaged in taking up old rails from the track and laying new rails. During the progress of the work it became necessary to make a connection to let a train over. The rails were fastened together with fishplates, or angle bars. In order to make the connection it was necessary to disconnect the old rails and to connect the old rail with the new rail. In order to disconnect the old rails they cut the bolts out of the joints where they were fastened with the angle bar.

According to the testimony of the plaintiff, Sparks, he had a hammer, and J. W. Ross, the foreman, had the cleaver. Ross was holding the cleaver, and the plaintiff would hit it and cut the nuts off of the bolts. The plaintiff then knocked the bolts out of the rail. He then hit the angle bar two or three times with the hammer, but it was rusty and would not come loose. Ross, who was standing on the outside of the track, then took the hammer and hit the outside angle bar a lick or two, and it then became loose. The cleaver was lying there, and the plaintiff picked it up. He put the cleaver in between the angle bar and the rail to prize the angle bar loose. He could not prize it loose. Ross then struck the cleaver with the hammer. This knocked the angle bar loose. The rail then rolled over, striking the plaintiff's left ankle and foot, and injured it severely.

According to the testimony of J. W. Ross he did not use the hammer. He was holding the cleaver, and the plaintiff was striking with the hammer. There was a certain place to stand where there was no danger of getting hurt. He had instructed plaintiff where to stand so that he would not get injured. The plaintiff did not stand in the place designated. It seemed to be wrong handed for the plaintiff, and he shifted his position. If plaintiff had stood where the witness told him to stand, the angle bar would not have hit him. Other facts will be stated or referred to in the opinion.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

Jas. B. McDonough, of Ft. Smith, for appellant.

Norwood & Alley, of Mena, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] It is earnestly insisted by counsel for the defendant that the judgment should be reversed because the verdict of the jury is contrary to the weight of the evidence. In making this contention counsel has not taken into consideration the distinction between the rules which govern trial courts and this court with respect to setting aside verdicts. It is the duty of the trial court to set aside a verdict which it is of the opinion is contrary to the weight of the evidence, but this court has repeatedly held that where the trial court has overruled a motion for a new trial based upon the insufficiency of the evidence, and where there is any substantial evidence to support it, the verdict of the trial court will be upheld on appeal. St. L. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Ellenwood, 123 Ark. 428, 185 S. W. 768.

[3] In the present case the trial court overruled the motion for a new trial, and his ruling in that respect was tantamount to a finding that the verdict was not against the preponderance of the evidence. There is nothing to indicate that he acted arbitrarily in making such finding, and no remarks of the trial court appear in the record to bring the present case within the rule announced in Twist v. Mullinix, 126 Ark. 427, 90 S. W. 851, as insisted by counsel for the defendant.

[4] This brings us to a consideration of the question of whether there was any evidence legally sufficient to support the verdict. According to the testimony of the plaintiff, he was holding the cleaver between the angle bar and the rail, trying to pry them apart, when the defendant's foreman suddenly struck the cleaver with a sledge hammer, knocking the angle bar and rail apart so that the rail fell on his foot and severely injured him. The court instructed the jury that if it should find from a preponderance of the evidence that the cleaver was placed at the end of the angle bar, and that the foreman negligently struck the cleaver with the sledge hammer, thereby injuring the plaintiff, and if it should further find that the plaintiff at the time was exercising ordinary care, the verdict should be for the plaintiff. No objection is made to this instruction. The evidence, if believed by the jury, was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding for him, but it is earnestly insisted that the court should have told the jury, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff assumed the risk. This action was brought under the federal Employers' Liability Act.

[5] In the case of Seaboard Air Line Railway v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 34 Sup. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475, the court held that, the federal Employers' Liability Act having expressly eliminated the defense of assumption of risks in certain specified cases, the intent of Congress is plain that in all other cases such assumption shall have its former effect as a bar to an action by the injured employé.

[6] According to the plaintiff's testimony, the foreman suddenly struck the cleaver with the sledge hammer, thereby causing the injury. The work was not so obviously dangerous that an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances would not have engaged in it. The servant assumes the risks of all dangers that are incident to the employment, and he cannot recover for injuries which result to him therefrom. He also assumes the risk of injury from the manner in which he knowingly sees and observes that the work is being done. It cannot be said, however, that under the undisputed proof as declared by the record plaintiff's injury resulted from one of the risks incident to his employment, or that the danger was so obvious and imminent that no ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances would have engaged in the work.

[7, 8] It is also insisted that the court erred in giving instruction No. 1. It is as follows:

"If you find in this case that the foreman, J. W. Ross, placed the cleaver in the crack between the angle bar and the rail, and that the plaintiff, with due care for his own safety, struck the cleaver with a hammer, and this lick caused the rail and angle bar to spring loose and injure the plaintiff, if you so find from the evidence, and you further find from the evidence in this connection that the foreman, Ross, instructed or directed the plaintiff to strike the cleaver, and at the time that he, Ross, knew where the plaintiff was standing, and by the use of ordinary care on his part might or could have known that the plaintiff was standing in a place of danger, then it was the duty of the foreman to apprise the plaintiff of the fact that he was in a dangerous place, and if you find he failed to do this, but directed the plaintiff to strike the cleaver, and the plaintiff did so, and was not negligent in obeying said instructions, and you find this act of the said foreman was a negligent act on his part, and this negligence was the cause of the injury, then, in that event, if you so find, you will not diminish the amount of plaintiff's recovery, in case he does recover, on account of the fact that he struck the cleaver and that this lick caused the rail to spring over and against the plaintiff, unless you further find that the foreman and plaintiff were both negligent, and in that event you will diminish plaintiff's recovery of damages in proportion to the amount of his negligence, in case you find damages in his favor."

According to the testimony of the plaintiff, the foreman struck the cleaver at the time the plaintiff was injured. On the other hand, according to the testimony of the foreman, he did not strike the cleaver at that time. He said that he instructed the plaintiff where to stand, and that the plaintiff was using the hammer at the time he was injured. The foreman was present and working with the plaintiff. He knew the position the plaintiff assumed in doing the work. It is true he said that he had instructed the plaintiff where to stand while using the hammer. The jury might have inferred, however, from the foreman's testimony that he knew the plaintiff was in a dangerous place, and that he again apprised him of his danger in using the hammer at the place where he was standing. This instruction, and No. 2, immediately following it, deals with the question of the reduction of damages under the federal Employers' Liability Act. Instruction No. 2 is as follows:

"You are instructed that if you find by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff was injured, as alleged, while in such employ of the defendant, and that the proximate cause of his injury was the negligence of the defendant, or its employé, at the time, your verdict will be for the plaintiff. On the other hand, if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff and defendant were both negligent, and that the negligence of both the plaintiff and defendant caused the injury, you will diminish the damages found in favor of the plaintiff in case you find damages in his favor, in proportion to the amount of negligence you find attributable to plaintiff as the proximate cause of the injury."

The federal statute provides that the fact that the employe may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by a jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employe. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that where the causal negligence is attributable partly to the master and partly to the injured servant, the latter shall not recover full damages, but only a diminished sum bearing the same relation to the full damages that the negligence attributable to the master bears to the negligence attributable to both; the purpose being to exclude from the recovery a proportionate part of the damages corresponding to the employe's contribution to the total negligence. Seaboard Air Line Railway v. Tilghman, 237 U. S. 499, 35 Sup. Ct. 653, 59 L. Ed. 1069. This principle was given by the trial court, and it was the evident purpose to advise the jury as prescribed by the statute in their determination of the amount of damages. The instructions complained of are too lengthy and are somewhat involved. Counsel for the defendant only saved a general exception to the instructions. If he had any objection to a particular part of it as misleading, he should have called the court's special attention to that part, so that the court might modify or explain the words used. Not having done so, he is not now in an attitude to complain.

[9] Counsel for the defendant also asks for a reversal of the judgment because the court modified instruction No. 2 asked by it by adding the word "negligently" between the words, "himself and strike the cleaver." The instruction as asked by the defendant is as follows:

"Plaintiff alleges in the first paragraph of his complaint that he was in the employ of the Director General of Railroads on the 17th day of February, 1919, and was working in an extra gang and was at the time engaged in removing the steel rails, which steel rails were to be replaced with new steel rails. He further alleges that while engaged in this service under the instructions of the foreman in charge of the work he received great and permanent injuries because of the negligence of the foreman. He alleges that he had placed an iron cleaver at the end of an angle bar, and that J. W. Ross, foreman of the gang, struck the cleaver with a sledge hammer, and thereby caused the injury to the plaintiff. If the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff himself struck the cleaver, and that the foreman did not strike the cleaver, the jury will find for the defendant."

The court was right in inserting the word "negligently." The instruction as asked by the defendant was peremptory in its nature, and exempted the defendant from liability if the plaintiff himself struck the cleaver, regardless of whether his act in so doing was negligent or not. Other instructions asked by the defendant bear this same vice, and, if given, would have been, in effect, a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant. Therefore the court did not err in refusing to give them.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment will be affirmed.

On Rehearing.

[10] It is earnestly insisted by counsel for appellant that the court erred in not holding as a matter of law that appellee assumed the risk, and in support of his contention states that the court has misunderstood the facts. It is well settled that, in testing the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, the court must view the facts in the light most favorable to appellee.

[11] Counsel for appellant, in making his contention that the court misunderstood the facts, only takes into consideration the evidence adduced in behalf of appellant. He does not take into consideration at all the fact that appellee's own testimony flatly contradicts the testimony of the witnesses for appellant. It will be remembered that appellant's foreman testified that he did not strike the cleaver at all at the time appellee was injured. He says that he was holding the cleaver, and that appellee was striking with the hammer; that he told appellee where to stand, in order to keep from being hurt in the event the rail flew back after the angle bar was removed from it; that the appellee was hurt by reason of quickly stepping from a place of safety to a place of danger, before he could be notified not to do this by the foreman.

On the other hand, this testimony of the foreman and that of other witnesses who corroborated his testimony is flatly contradicted by the testimony of appellee himself. It will be remembered that the foreman and his crew were engaged in removing an old rail from the track at the time appellee was injured. We quote from the record of appellee's testimony the following:

"Q. Now, what were you doing to the rail? A. Disconnecting it at the joint.

"Q. Now, go ahead in your own way and explain to the jury how you did that. A. I had the hammer at the time, and Mr. Ross had the cleaver, and he was holding it, and cut the nuts off of the bolts. I just knocked the bolts out of the rail that was holding the angle bars. I hit the angle bar two or three times with the hammer, and it wouldn't come loose. Mr. Ross says, 'Let me have the hammer.' He was standing on the outside of the track. After I struck two or three licks with the hammer myself, then I gave him the hammer, and he hit the outside angle bar a lick or two, and it came loose. The cleaver was lying there, and I picked it up, and, like the rail was there, I was standing sort of in here, and they were connected there, and this inside angle bar was still fastened. The cleaver was lying there, and I picked it up and twisted it, and I jumped back in there, and as I did that Mr. Ross raised the hammer and hit the cleaver.

"Q. What happened then? A. The rail sprung the angle bar out, and the rail caught me just a little above the ankle."

Continuing, appellee stated that the angle bar was between 28 and 36 inches long, and that there would be half of that distance projecting beyond the end of the rail; that the angle bar attached to the rail was what struck his leg, and that he did not know that the angle bar was fastened to the rail. Continuing, appellee said:

"I picked up the cleaver, and, using it myself, I struck that way in between the angle bar and flange of the rail. I twisted it, and the cleaver jumped out, and then I stuck it back in there again at the same place, and at the time I done that Mr. Ross was standing outside the rail with the hammer in his hand, and he raised the hammer and struck the cleaver on the head, and drove it in between the angle bar and flange of the rail. That sprung the angle bar out from the rail, and then the rail jumped across and caught me.

"Q. When you were working with the cleaver in the crack there yourself, was you trying to ease it loose, or get it loose, without a sudden lick that would spring it? A. That couldn't hardly be, only I stuck the cleaver in there, with the intention, after I got it in there and sprung it out, the angle bar would come out, and it would leave the rail loose.

"Q. You thought it would drop loose from both rails, did you? A. I had an idea it would. I didn't know it was fastened on the other end of the rail.

"Q. You didn't know it was fastened to the rail that did spring over? A. No, sir; I did not.

"Q. I will ask you, when the lick was struck, if it sprang over suddenly before you could get away from it? A. It did."

The witness described the cleaver as a tool with a handle in it; one end is broad like a chisel, and the other is blunt like a hammer. The cleaver proper was something like 6 or 8 inches long, and the handle was about 2 feet long. The sledge hammer that was used in striking the cleaver weighed at least 12 pounds. Again appellee stated that he was working on the inside of the rail, and the foreman on the outside, at the time he was injured. He said that he was trying to prize the angle bar loose with the cleaver at the time he was injured, and did not know that the foreman was going to hit the cleaver; that he was beyond the reach of the rail, and the angle bar stuck out far enough to hit him when the rail flew back; that he did not know that. He expected the angle bar to drop down when he prized it loose from the rail, and did not know that the foreman was going to strike the cleaver until after he had done so. Thus it will be seen that appellee's testimony is in irreconcilable conflict with the testimony of the witnesses for appellant.

According to the testimony of appellee, he thought he could prize the angle bar loose from the rail with the cleaver or chisel, and when he had done so the angle bar would drop down to the ground. He stood in a position where he would be out of the reach of the rail itself when it sprung back. He did not know that the foreman was going to strike the cleaver with the sledge hammer. The foreman struck the cleaver suddenly with the sledge hammer, and thereby caused one end of the angle bar to become loose. The other end adhered to the rail, striking appellee on the ankle before he could get out of the reach of the angle bar. The act of the foreman in striking the cleaver suddenly with the sledge hammer, without warning to appellee, was the proximate cause of the injury. Therefore appellee's own testimony made a case for the jury, and the court did not err in submitting the question of assumption of risk to the jury. In this view of the matter it is not necessary to set out in detail the testimony of appellant; for it is readily apparent that the witnesses for appellant were contradicted by the testimony of appellee himself.

Again counsel criticizes the opinion of the court for saying in the original opinion that no objection was made to the instruction of the trial court on the question of negligence. Counsel points out that he made objections to the action of the trial court in giving it. What the court meant to say was that counsel did not argue in his brief that the instruction on the question of negligence was erroneous. We do not understand counsel to contend that the instruction given by the court on the question of negligence was erroneous. It is perfectly apparent, however, that, if there is testimony sufficient to warrant the submission of the question to the jury, there is no error in the form of the instruction. It plainly submits to the jury appellee's theory of the case, and makes the negligence of appellant depend upon the truth of appellee's testimony.

Again counsel criticizes the opinion of the court with regard to the instructions given on the measure of damages. Counsel insists that the court erred in saying that he did not make specific objections to these instructions. If it be assumed that his objections to the instructions amounted to a specific objection to them; still we do not think that the action of the court in giving the instructions was reversible error.

[12] The federal statute is that—

"The fact that the employé may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employé."

The two instructions on the measure of damages set out in our original opinion should be read together. In the latter part of instruction 2, the court told the jury that, if it should find from the evidence that the plaintiff and defendant were both guilty of negligence which caused the injury, the damages found in favor of the plaintiff should be diminished in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the plaintiff as the proximate cause of the injury. The idea meant to be conveyed was that, if the plaintiff had contributed to his own injury by his own negligence, the diminution in the damages should be in proportion to the amount of his negligence. We think the court had reference to the rule of proportion specified in the statute, and that the instructions, when read together, gave the jury the correct principle of law with reference to the exoneration of the carrier, and made it liable only for a proportionate part of the damages corresponding to the amount of the negligence attributable to the employé. Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Earnest, 229 U. S. 114, 33 Sup. Ct. 654, 57 L. Ed. 1096, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 172. Therefore there was no prejudicial error in giving the instruction.

We have examined the record and find no prejudicial error in it. Therefore the motion for rehearing will be denied.

SOVEREIGN CAMP WOODMEN OF THE WORLD v. ARTHUR. (No. 405.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 17, 1920.
On Rehearing, June 21, 1920.)

1. Insurance \S 756(1)—Constitution of fraternal benefit association suspending member for engaging in hazardous occupation self-executing.

Provision of constitution of fraternal benefit association, made part of benefit certificate, that if a member engages in a hazardous occupation without notifying the clerk and paying increased dues he "shall stand suspended and his benefit certificate be null and void," is self-executing.

2. Insurance \S 755(1)—Member of fraternal association engaging in hazardous occupation held not in good standing.

A member of a fraternal benefit association, being by provision of its constitution suspended and his benefit certificate null and void because of his engaging in a hazardous occupation without notice to the clerk and without payment of increased dues, was not a member in good standing at the time of his death, and his certificate had not been in force for five consecutive years immediately preceding his death, within the incontestability clause.

On Rehearing.

3. Insurance \S 748—A "mine" within association's constitution declaring hazardous occupations, held not an open working.

Within fraternal benefit association's constitution declaring engaged in hazardous occupations, requiring payment of increased assessments, structural iron workers, circus riders, trapeze performers, those engaged in the actual operation of railway trains, employes in electric current generating plants, enlisted men in the army and navy, and "those employed in mines," "mine" is used in its primary and restricted sense of an underground excavation for getting out minerals, and does not include open workings, like a bauxite mine, operation of which is like quarrying stone found just beneath the surface.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mine.]

Smith, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Faulkner County; George W. Clark, Judge.

Action by Harriet A. Arthur against the Sovereign Camp Woodmen of the World. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harriet A. Arthur sued the Sovereign Camp Woodmen of the World to recover the sum of $1,000, the amount of a benefit certificate issued upon the life of her son. The certificate was issued to Joe B. Arthur on the 1st day of April, 1913, and his mother, Harriet A. Arthur, was named as the beneficiary in the policy. Joe B. Arthur died from a gunshot wound inflicted by C. T. Herrick about the 1st of December, 1918. At the time Joe B. Arthur was working in the bauxite mines near Bauxite, Ark., and had been working there six or seven months.

W. A. Kinser was a foreman of the mines. According to his testimony, from about July 15, 1918, until the time of his death, Joe B. Arthur worked under him. He was asked how long Joe B. Arthur had worked in the mine and to state fully what work Arthur had been doing. His answer is as follows:

"I have no idea how long he was here, but think it must have been six or seven months. He worked in the open mines. His work caused him to be near and pass by where dynamite was being used, but when blasting was done signals were given so that everybody could get out of the way. He was working in open cut when banks were blasted down. Some one signals and all men leave. He was just simply mining and ditching is all he ever does for me. This work did not include driving and handling of teams, placing of railroad ties and tracks, but only what we call 'ditching,' which means that we were digging ditches for the drainage of water to pass out of mine."

Continuing, we quote from the transcript the following from the deposition of W. A. Kluser:

"Q. State, if you know, in what business the said Joe B. Arthur was engaged at the time he was killed, and also state how long previous to the time he was killed, to your knowledge he had been engaged in said business. A. He was engaged in ditching up to the time of his death and had been ditching for a week or ten days. Before this time he was working in the mines."

Another witness testified that Joe B. Arthur did not work in an underground mine, but was engaged in loading cars with bauxite by using a pick and shovel, and that his work was on top of the ground.

On cross-examination he testified that they first blow the ore up with dynamite to loosen it and then load it in the cars. They dig down in the ground 10 or 15 feet in places. When a pit is dug they blast the ore out and load it in the cars. He further stated that Arthur dug up some of the ore, and that some of it he just shoveled into the cars; that the usual way was to loosen up the ore by blasting, and then to shovel it in the cars which were on the track which had been laid in the pit.

The benefit certificate provided that the constitution of the order should be a part of it. Section 42 of the constitution provides that persons engaged in certain classes of business or employment shall not be admitted to membership in the order. Section 43 provides what occupations shall be admitted hazardous, and so much thereof as is necessary to the issue raised by the appeal reads as follows:

"Sec. 43. Persons engaged in the following occupations, to wit:

"(a) Structural iron workers, circus riders and trapeze performers, conductors and brakemen on railway freight trains, locomotive engineers and firemen, switchmen, hostlers, and other similar railway or steamship employes, excepting agents, office men and those engaged in employment not more hazardous; those employed in mines not otherwise prohibited; sailors on seas, electric linemen, employes in electric current generating plants and enlisted men in the army and navy during war, may be admitted to membership if accepted by the sovereign physician, but their certificate shall not exceed two thousand dollars each, and their rate of assessment shall be three dollars and sixty cents per annum for each one thousand dollars of their beneficiary certificate in addition to the regular rate while so engaged in such hazardous occupations.

"(b) If a member engage in any of the occupations or business mentioned in this section he shall within thirty days notify the clerk of his camp of such change of occupation, and while so engaged in such occupation shall pay on each monthly installment of assessment thirty cents for each one thousand dollars of his beneficiary certificate in addition to the regular rate. Any such member failing to notify the clerk and to make such payments as above provided shall stand suspended and his beneficiary certificate be null and void."

Section 68 is the incontestability clause, and reads as follows:

"When a beneficiary certificate has been in force for five consecutive years immediately preceding the death, while in good standing, of the member holding the same, the payment thereof shall not be contested on any ground other than that his death was intentionally caused by the beneficiary or beneficiaries, or by the hands of justice, or from the direct result of drinking intoxicating liquors, or from the use of opiates, cocaine, chloral or other narcotic or poison, or shall die while engaged in war except in defense of the United States of America or engaged in a hazardous or prohibited occupation."

It appears from the record that the insured had paid his regular dues, but that he did not pay the additional amount required by section 43 of the constitution, and did not notify the company of his change of occupation, or that he was working at a bauxite mine. The company did not have any knowledge that he was working at a bauxite mine until after his death.

The above case was tried before the court sitting as a jury, and the court found in favor of the plaintiff.

From the judgment rendered the defendant has duly prosecuted an appeal to this court.

T. E. Helm and Gardner K. Oliphint, both of Little Rock, for appellant.

R. W. Robins, of Conway, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is first sought to uphold the judgment on the ground that the insured was not employed in a mine at the time of his death, and that his policy was not forfeited under section 43 of the constitution, which is copied in the statement of facts. We cannot agree with counsel in this contention. The foreman under whom the insured worked stated in positive terms that he was engaged in ditching for a week or ten days before he was killed, and that before this time he was working in the mines. According to his testimony, they were digging ditches for the drainage of water to pass out of the mines.

Another witness testified that the insured had been engaged in digging and loading ore in cars; that the bauxite ore was first loosened by blasting, and was then loaded into the cars by the insured and other persons. In this way a pit between 10 and 15 feet deep was dug in the ground. A track was laid down in it, and the insured and others would load the ore into the cars on the track. The cars would then be drawn out of the pit. When the blasts were made the workmen would be notified so that they could get out of the way. It is true the mines were not under the ground but the undisputed testimony shows that the insured was engaged in working in the mines. A part of his duties was to load the ore in the cars after it had been loosened by blasting, so that it could be handled with a shovel. As they proceeded with this work they would dig down deeper and deeper into the ground, so that the pit was from ten to fifteen feet deep. Another part of the insured's duty was to help dig ditches for the purpose of draining the mines. There is no contradiction to this testimony, and it constituted working in the mine, just as much as was the work of the employé who did the blasting.

[1] It is contended that the work was not particularly dangerous, and that there was no reason to increase the dues of the insured for engaging in that kind of occupation. Be that as it may, the parties had the right to contract with each other and designate working in mines as a hazardous occupation, which required notice to the company and an increased payment of dues. The contract does not restrict the clause in question to those engaged in underground mining. The language used is, "those employed in mines, not otherwise prohibited," etc. Clause (b) of the section provides that, if the member engages in any of the occupations mentioned in clause (a) of the section, he shall within thirty days notify the clerk of his camp of his change of occupation, and shall pay on each monthly installment of assessments 30 cents of each thousand dollars of his beneficiary certificate in addition to the regular rate. It further provides that any member failing to notify the clerk and to make the payment as provided shall stand suspended and his beneficiary certificate shall be null and void. Thus it will be seen that the section of the constitution is self-executing. It provides in specific terms that if the member does not comply with the provisions of the section that he shall be suspended, and that his benefit certificate shall be null and void.

As we have already seen, the insured was engaged in working in the bauxite mine at the time he was killed by Herrick, and he had not complied with the provisions of the section of the constitution just referred to. The beneficiary certificate made the constitution a part of the contract of insurance. The Legislature of 1917 passed an act pertaining to the regulation and incorporation of fraternal beneficiary associations. Acts of Ark. 1917, vol. 2, p. 2087. Under section 8 of the act the certificate, the charter of the company, the constitution and laws of the society, and the application for membership and medical examination signed by the applicant, constitute the agreement between the society and the members. The society in question is a fraternal benefit association. In Acree v. Whitley, 136 Ark. 149, 206 S. W. 137, and in Sovereign Camp Woodmen of the World v. Newsom, 219 S. W. 759, the court held that the insurance certificate of a fraternal society, being an Arkansas contract, is governed by the statute just referred to.

[2] Again, it is contended by counsel for the plaintiff that the judgment of the lower court should be upheld under the incontestability clause of the benefit certificate. We do not agree with counsel in this contention. The clause referred to is section 68 of the constitution. It provides that when a beneficiary certificate has been in force for five consecutive years immediately preceding the death, while in good standing, of the member holding the same, the payment thereof shall not be contested on any ground other than those stated in the section. It appears from the record that the insured had not made the payments required by section 43 of the constitution when he became employed in the bauxite mines. He did not notify his camp of his change of occupation, and did not pay the additional monthly dues required by the section. The concluding part of the section provides that any such member failing to notify the clerk and to make such payments as above provided shall stand suspended and his beneficiary certificate shall be null and void. Thus it will be seen that the provision is self-executing, and that the benefit certificate was null and void because the member had not complied with the section in the respects just mentioned. Therefore he was not a member in good standing at the time of his death, and the certificate had not been in force for five consecutive years immediately preceding his death. Hence the incontestability clause of the constitution can avail the plaintiff nothing in this case.

It follows that the court erred in finding for the plaintiff, and for that error the judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law and not inconsistent with this opinion.

On Rehearing.

[3] Counsel for the plaintiff, in his brief on rehearing, earnestly insists that the words, "those employed in mines not otherwise prohibited," as used in the policy, do not stand alone, but are connected with the context, which plainly shows that the parties had in mind those employed in underground mining and not open workings. Upon reconsideration of the question, a majority of the court is of the opinion that counsel is correct in his contention. Insurance policies are written on printed forms specially prepared by experts for the insurance company, and the insured has no voice whatever in their preparation, and for these reasons it is well settled that insurance contracts must be construed strictly against the insurer.

Section 42 of the constitution and by-laws of the order specifically designates certain classes of business or employment as prohibited, and provides that persons engaged in such occupations shall not be admitted to membership in the order. Section 43 deals with hazardous occupations. It uses the words "those employed in mines not otherwise prohibited." The words "not otherwise prohibited" evidently refer to the prohibited occupations named in section 42.

This brings us to a consideration of the meaning of the words "those employed in mines." As just stated, the company was dealing with hazardous occupations, and the context showed what classes of occupations were deemed hazardous by the company. Now there are two meanings to the word "mine." In its primary and restricted sense, a mine denotes an underground excavation made for the purpose of getting out minerals. The enlarged meaning of "mine" is the place where minerals are found, and under certain circumstances it includes minerals obtained by open workings. Lindley on Mines (3d Ed.) vol. 1, §§ 88, 89. Bauxite is a mineral, but it is mined by open workings. The surface of the earth is cleared off, and the bauxite is blasted, and is then removed by open workings. Bauxite is mined in precisely the same way that stone or marble is quarried. There is no distinction whatever between the operation of a bauxite mine and the quarrying of stone or marble, where the latter is found just beneath the surface of the earth as in the case of bauxite. In such a case the marble or stone is removed by open quarrying or blasting, and bauxite is removed in precisely the same way. If the insurance company had considered bauxite mining to be a hazardous occupation, doubtless it would have also mentioned quarrying. The fact it did not do so, and the further fact that the words "those employed in mines" are used in connection with structural iron workers, circus riders, trapeze performers, and those engaged in the actual operation of railway trains, employes in electric current generating plants, and enlisted men in the army and navy, show that the words were used in connection with hazardous occupations. This indicates that the company used them in their primary or popular signification, to refer to underground mining, and not to open workings.

It follows that the motion for a rehearing should be granted, and that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

SMITH, J., dissents.

RURAL SPECIAL SCHOOL DIST. NO. 11 v. BAKER et al. (No. 45.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Schools and school districts ~~§ 44~~—Petition for dissolution containing names of majority of electors held sufficient.

Petition by electors of a rural special school district for dissolution of the district, containing the names of a majority of the bona fide electors at the time of the filing of the petition and the posting of the notices under Kirby's Dig. §§ 7548, 7549, held sufficient notwithstanding the subsequent addition of territory to the district making the petition contain fewer than a majority of the electors of the district subsequent to annexation; the annexation of the district not affecting the merits of the petition.

2. Schools and school districts ~~§ 44~~—Compliance with statute as to petition and notice jurisdictional in proceedings for dissolution.

In proceedings to dissolve rural special school district, a compliance with Kirby's Dig. § 7548, as to the filing of the petition and giving the notice prescribed is essential to jurisdiction.

3. Schools and school districts ~~§ 44~~—Special rural district to be attached to adjoining districts on dissolution.

The court in dissolving a rural special school district should have directed that the territory comprising the district be attached in whole or in part to adjoining districts as required by the statute, and was not authorized to apportion the territory and funds among common school districts as they existed prior to the organization of the district being dissolved.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Union County; Chas. W. Smith, Judge.

Petition by W. E. Baker and others against Rural Special School District No. 11. Judgment for petitioners, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

W. C. Medley, of El Dorado, for appellant.

Mahony & Mahony, of El Dorado, for appellees.

WOOD, J. On May 30, 1919, a petition was filed with the county clerk of Union county, signed by 40 persons who alleged therein that they constituted a majority of the qualified electors of rural special school district No. 11 (hereafter for convenience called special district). They described the territory constituting the district, which comprised all of common school districts No. 11 and No. 34 and part of common school districts No. 56 and No. 79. They alleged that the children living in certain portions of the district had been done a grave injustice, in that the distance of the proposed schoolhouse for the special district was so great that they would not be able to attend school, and the district was not able to furnish them transportation. They prayed for an order of the county court dissolving the district and placing the territory back in the common school districts from which the territory constituting the special district was carved when the same was organized.

On July 22, 1919, the county court took up the petition for consideration and found that notice of the intention to file the petition was not posted until May 31, and that by an order of the Union county court made on June 2, 1919, certain other territory was annexed to the special district, and that all the territory, including the territory annexed to the district on the latter date, should be considered.

The petitioners thereupon admitted that, if the annexed territory were to be construed, the petition did not contain a majority of the qualified voters within the special district. Whereupon the court entered a judgment refusing the prayer of the petition. The petitioners appealed to the circuit court.

In the circuit court the district answered, and denied that the petition for dissolution of the district was signed by a majority of the qualified voters residing therein, and alleged that there were more than 80 qualified voters in the district; that the petition contained only 39 names; that 6 of the petitioners, naming them, had not paid their poll tax, and therefore not qualified, and 3 others, naming them, who did not live within the district.

There was testimony before the circuit court to the effect that, when the petition asking for the dissolution of the district was filed May 30, 1919, it contained a majority of the qualified electors residing in the district as constituted at that time. That notices were posted, 30 days before the ensuing July term of the county court, in the district as then constituted, of the intention of the petitioners to ask for a dissolution. After the filing of the petition additional territory was annexed to the district. At the time the petition for the dissolution of the district was filed there were something like 70 qualified voters residing therein. The petition contained the names of 40 men who were qualified electors which constituted a majority of the electors residing in the territory at that time.

It was admitted by the petitioners that they did not have a majority of the qualified electors in the district if the territory annexed by the order of the county court on June 2, 1919, were construed as a part of the district.

The circuit court, among other things, found that the petition to dissolve the district was filed with the county clerk of Union county on May 30, 1919, and that said petition contained the names of the majority of the qualified electors residing in rural special school district No. 11, as then established and formed, and that due notice of the filing and pendency of said petition was given as required by law and by the posting of four notices in said school district in public places, one of which was upon the school house door used by that district; that on June 2, 1919, while said petition to dissolve said district was pending, a petition was filed before the county court to annex certain additional territory to said district No. 11 as then organized, which petition was by the county court granted on said date enlarging said district and taking in other qualified electors after the petition to dissolve said district No. 11 had been duly filed and notice thereof posted as required by law.

The court further found that the facts alleged in the petition as to the injustice and hardship upon a majority of the qualified electors residing in the district were true. The court thereupon entered a judgment granting the prayer of the petitioners, dissolving the district, and ordered that all territory therein embraced be placed back in the common school districts from which it was taken, and that the funds on hand be apportioned to the several districts as they existed prior to the organization of district No. 11.

This appeal is duly prosecuted from that judgment. The evidence was legally sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court on the issue as to the necessity for the dissolution of the district.

The other questions for our consideration are:

(1) Did the petition for the dissolution of the special district contain a majority of the electors residing in the district in compliance with section 1, Act 66 of the Acts of 1895, p. 82 (section 7548 of Kirby's Digest)?

(2) If the petition contained the required majority, did the court upon the dissolution of the special district err in the apportionment of the territory and funds constituting such district?

[1] First. The filing of the petition to dissolve and the posting of the notices as required by sections 7548 and 7549 of Kirby's Digest is analogous to the bringing of a suit for the dissolution of the district against any one who may oppose the dissolution. It would be wholly impracticable to ascertain who might be opposed to the dissolution; so the Legislature adopted the method of posting notices. The filing of the petition and the posting of the notice operates as a sort of lis pendens upon all persons who may be interested in the affairs of the district. The filing of the petition for the dissolution and posting the notices fixes the status of the district as to the action to be had upon the petition. No territory can thereafter be annexed to the district that will affect the merits of the petition. There was therefore no error in the ruling of the court that the petition contained a majority of the qualified electors residing in the special district as required by section 7548, Kirby's Digest.

[2] A compliance with the statute as to the filing of the petition and giving the notice prescribed is essential to the jurisdiction to dissolve. Hughes v. Robuck, 119 Ark. 592-595, 179 S. W. 163.

[3] Second. The decision of this court in Curtis v. Haynes Special School District H, 128 Ark. 129, 193 S. W. 523, is to the effect that—

"Where all of the territory of a school district is annexed to another district, the former goes out of existence, and is no longer a school district."

Under this decision, when the court entered the judgment dissolving special district No. 11, it should have directed that the territory comprising that district be attached in whole or in part to adjoining districts as required by the statute, following the construction thereof in Curtis v. Haynes Special School District H, supra.

The judgment dissolving special district No. 11 is affirmed. The judgment apportioning the territory and the funds thereof for the error indicated is reversed, and remanded for a new trial of that matter.

JOHNSON et al. v. MISSOURI PAC. R. CO. (No. 55.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Attorney and client \S 182(2) — Statutory lien on recovery applies to death action by administrator for next of kin.

In an action by an administrator for damages from wrongful death under Kirby's Dig. \S 6290, fashioned after Lord Campbell's Act, the recovery does not become assets of the estate, but is held by the administrator as trustee for distribution, so a contract by the administrator as to counsel fees falls within the attorney's lien statute, and the attorney has an enforceable lien.

2. Attorney and client \S 176—Contract signed by administratrix as individual as to fees in death action gives attorney a lien.

Where the administratrix of decedent employed attorneys, agreeing that they should receive one-half of the recovery, held that, though signed by the administratrix as an individual, yet, as she could maintain an action only in her representative capacity, such contract gave the attorneys a lien under attorneys' lien statute, and might be enforced against the defendant which made settlement with the administratrix independent of her attorneys.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Baxter County; J. B. Baker, Judge.

Action by Kathern King, administratrix, against the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company, in which Jo Johnson and others intervened. From the judgment dismissing the intervention after demurrer had been sustained thereto, interveners appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Allyn Smith, of Cotter, and Jo Johnson, of Ft. Smith, for appellants.

Troy Pace, of Little Rock, and Williams & Seawel, of Yellville, for appellee.

HUMPHREYS, J. Kathern King, administratrix of James E. King, deceased, by appointment of date August 4, 1917, instituted suit through her attorneys, Jo Johnson and Sizer & Gardner, against appellee on June 6, 1918, in the Baxter circuit court, to recover damages in the sum of $50,000 for the sole benefit of herself as surviving widow, there being no children, on account of the alleged negligent killing of her husband, James E. King, in August, 1917, by appellee, while in its employ as engineer.

On August 29, 1918, the appellants filed an intervention in the suit, alleging that appellee settled with their client for $8,500, and that, by the terms of their contract, attached to the intervention, they were entitled to a lien for one-half the amount, or $4,250, with interest, against appellee's railroad, under Act 293, Acts of the General Assembly of 1909. The contract attached to the intervention as Exhibit A provided, in substance, for the employment of Jo Johnson and such assistants as he might deem necessary to collect Kathern King's claim, by settlement or suit, against appellee, on account of injuries received by her husband while in its employ, which resulted in his death, for one-half of the amount recovered, after deducting expenses incident to the collection. The contract was signed at Cotter, Ark., by Mrs. Kathern King. It was alleged in the intervention that, while the contract was signed by Mrs. Kathern King individually, the employment was by her in her capacity as administratrix, as shown by correspondence with her attorney Jo Johnson.

A demurrer to the intervention was filed, sustained, and the intervention dismissed, from which judgment an appeal was duly prosecuted to this court.

[1] The first question presented by this appeal is whether the attorney's lien statute (Act 293 of the Acts of the General Assembly of 1909) has application to a suit by an administrator for the benefit of the next of kin. It was ruled in Carpenter v. Hazel, 128 Ark. 416, 194 S. W. 225, that "this statute has no application to suits by an administrator for the benefit of an estate of the decedent, for to give it that effect would constitute an invasion of the exclusive jurisdiction vested in probate courts by the Constitution," referring to the exclusive jurisdiction of the probate courts to authorize contracts for and distribute funds of the estate. The rule there announced has no bearing in a suit by an administrator for the benefit of the next of kin, brought under section 6290 of Kirby's Digest, fashioned after Lord Campbell's Act, because the funds collected do not become assets of the estate. Such funds are in the nature of trust funds held by the personal representative in trust for the next of kin, and not subject to distribution by the probate court. In construing section 6290 of Kirby's Digest, this court said, in the case of Little Rock & Ft. Smith Railway v. Townsend, Admr., 41 Ark. 382, that—

"The judgment, though recovered in the name of the personal representative of the deceased, does not become assets of the estate. The relation of the administrator to the fund, when recovered, is not that of the representative of the deceased, but he is a mere trustee for the widow and next of kin."

This construction of the statute was approved in the later case of Davis v. Railway, 53 Ark. 117, 13 S. W. 801, 7 L. R. A. 283. It follows that the attorney's lien statute applies to suits by administrators for the benefit of the next of kin. Attorneys may, therefore, make binding contracts with administrators representing the next of kin for fees, enforceable by a lien proceeding under act 293, Acts of the General Assembly of 1909.

[2] The sole remaining question to be determined is whether appellee can be held liable under the attorney's lien statute aforesaid by Kathern King's attorneys, the appellants herein, on account of a settlement of the case brought by them for her, in her capacity as administratrix, for the benefit of the next of kin of the deceased, under a contract or agreement for fees, signed by Mrs. Kathern

King. It is contended by appellee that such a contract did not, and could not, bind Kathern King in her representative capacity; that it only bound her in her individual capacity; that appellee's settlement with her was in her representative capacity; and that her outstanding contract for fees with her attorney, in her individual capacity, could not render appellee liable on account of a settlement with her in her representative capacity. Kathern King was appointed administratrix of James E. King, deceased, on August 4, 1917. The contract in question was entered into on October 18, 1917, and the suit, which was settled, was brought by the attorneys in the name of Kathern King, as administratrix of James E. King, deceased, on June 6, 1918. The subject-matter covered in the contract was a cause of action in favor of Mrs. Kathern King against appellee for personal injuries received by her husband, James E. King, while in its employ, resulting in the loss of his life. She had no individual cause of action against the railroad. Her only cause of action was on account of her kinship to the deceased. She had been appointed administratrix of her deceased husband at the time she made the contract. The contract, therefore, could only have been made in reference to her cause of action as administratrix for her benefit as widow. Not having any right to sue except in her capacity as administratrix, the contract she made must necessarily have been made in reference to her cause of action in that capacity. If she had had a cause of action in her individual capacity as well as her representative capacity, then there would be much in the contention of appellee. Having a right to sue in one capacity only, and that being her representative capacity, her contract to bring the suit was necessarily referable to the institution thereof in her representative capacity. The suit was brought by her attorneys for her in that capacity, and appellee, in settling with her in that capacity, recognized whatever rights her attorneys had in the subject-matter of the litigation growing out of the institution of the suit.

For the error in sustaining the demurrer to the intervention and dismissing same, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to overrule the demurrer to the intervention and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

HARGER et al. v. HARGER. (No. 42.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 14, 1920.)

1. Exceptions, bill of \S 56(2)—Authentication of bill held sufficient.

Judge's certificate that "The above and foregoing is a true and perfect bill of exceptions in this cause" held proper authentication of bill, though filing certificate of clerk appeared several pages ahead of judge's certificate, and though preceding such filing certificate was a blank certificate for judge's signature; such fact being insufficient to show conclusively that bill ended at place where clerk affixed filing certificate.

2. Master and servant \S 316(1)—Mine lessee held independent contractor.

Where coal mine owner leased mine under agreement requiring lessee to operate mine, keep it in good repair, sell coal mined to owner, and keep owner protected by liability insurance, and requiring owner to completely surrender possession to lessee, reserving merely the right to send inspectors to see that the property was cared for and not injured, owner was not liable for injuries to mine employé during operation of mine by lessee; lessee being an independent contractor.

3. Master and servant \S 332(3) — Testimony as to employment of lessee by mine owner held insufficient to go to jury.

In action for injuries to miner against the mine owner and its lessee, plaintiff's testimony that he was employed by owner, without giving facts and circumstances held insufficient to require submission of the question as to whether or not the owner was operating mine through the lessee as agent; such testimony being a mere statement of a conclusion.

4. Master and servant \S 118(2) — Mining "company" in statute held to include individual operators.

Acts 1907, p. 183, \S 1, making every "company," whether incorporated or not, engaged in the mining of coal, etc., liable for injuries to employé from negligence of employer or fellow servant, held applicable to an individual operating a mine.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Company.]

5. Master and servant \S 332(4)—Instruction as to employment by independent contractor held not erroneous.

In an action for injuries to mine employé, instruction submitting issue of whether plaintiff had been employed by both owner and lessee was not erroneous as to lessee, who in fact was employer, by reason of elimination from consideration of owner, who was not operating mine and had not employed plaintiff.

6. Trial \S 253(9)—Instruction as to mine operator's duty to warn employé held defective in omitting element of discovered peril.

In action for injuries to operator of train of coal cars in mine in collision with car on track which had become detached on previous trip, where there was evidence that foreman who had duty of warning operator of any dangerous conditions knew that the car was on the track and failed to warn operator, requested instruction that operator could not recover if it was his duty to count the cars, since in such case defendant had no duty to warn him, held defective in excluding the element of the foreman's duty to warn operator of the danger of which he had actual knowledge.

7. Trial \S 62(3)—Permitting testimony not properly rebuttal discretionary with court.

Permitting testimony not properly rebuttal testimony to be introduced during rebuttal is discretionary with the court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County; Jas. Cochran, Judge.

Action by Herbert Harger against Wallace Harger and the Western Coal & Mining Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed as to last-named defendant and affirmed as to first-named defendant.

James B. McDonough and Pryor & Miles, all of Ft. Smith, for appellants.

Evans & Evans, of Booneville, for appellee.
